There you see princes, warriors, pilgrims, bishops, pontiffs, and members of the religious Orders: and here, as in all his paintings, he has given a distinguished place to the children of SS. Francis and Dominic. But more charming than even this, are the kisses and embracings which the Elect interchange with the Angels who protected and guided them on the path of peril. Kneeling, they clasp each other in heavenly affection. The idea of the painter, probably, was to exhibit the angels, venerating in these bodies, humanity glorified. The greetings between the angels and the elect terminated, we see them linking hands and gracefully dancing on a sweet meadow, enameled with most beauteous flowers. Their garments glisten with innumerable little golden stars; the head of each is wreathed with a garland of white and red roses, whilst a brilliant little flame burns on the forehead of each angel. Then light, airy, graceful, and even during the dance absorbed in ecstatic contemplation, carolling and singing they advance towards the celestial Jerusalem; and the nearer they approach to it, the more ethereal and luminous do their bodies become; till at last, arrived at the gates of the holy city, they appear to be transmuted into most subtile and resplendent spirits; and then, two by two, holding each other's hand, they are introduced into eternal beatitude. Where did the painter find this sweet conception? How was he able to develop such varied beauties? We confess our inability to give or imagine a reply.

We cannot better illustrate the character of Fra Angelico's style than by the following extract from an elegant and accomplished writer on Christian Art, Lord Lyndsay:—

“ Expression, accordingly—the special exponent of Spirit, as Form is of Intellect, and Colour of Sense—is the peculiar prerogative of Fra Angelico. Ecstasy and enthusiasm were his native element, and the emotions of his heart animated his pencil with a tenderness and repose, a love and a peace in which no one has yet excelled or even equalled him. These are the unvarying characteristics of the Madonna in his paintings. The true theory of her likeness presumes her outward form to have been so exquisitely moulded and etherialized by inward purity and habitual converse with heaven, that Gabriel might have known her among mankind by her face alone, had he been in search of her, with no other token. Subsequently to the Nativity, the mother's love must be supposed to blend with the innocence of the Virgin, and a beauty to result from the union, combining the holiness and purity of both estates, as inconceivable as that union itself was supernatural. Hence, evidently, an ideal for the artist's imagination, impossible of attainment, but which he will ever seek after, whether by spiritualizing the lineaments of her most dear to him, or by appropriating and reanimating some one of the many ancient portraitures of the Virgin,—for there is no one fixed traditional resemblance, as of our Saviour. Every great painter accordingly, has his distinctive type, born (for the most part) of his domestic affections,—daughters of loveliness are they, sweet as the rose, pure as the dew, capable of the holiest and loftiest of thoughts, but in almost every instance marked with an individuality which distresses the imagination, while the absence of that individuality as invariably infers vagueness and insipidity. Now the peculiarity and merit (as it appears to me) of Fra Angelico is, that his Virgins are neither vague nor individual,—even while doing nothing, they breathe of heaven in their repose—they are visible incarnations of the beauty of holiness, and yet not mere abstractions—they are most emphatically feminine—the ideal of womanhood as the chosen temple of the Trinity; they are to the Madonnas of other painters what Eve may be supposed to have been to her daughters before the Fall—their lineaments seem to include all other likenesses, to assume to each several rotary the semblance he loves most to gaze upon. It was because Fra Angelico's whole life was love—diverted by his vow of celibacy from any specific object, that his imagination thus sought for and found inspiration in heaven. Next to the Madonna, I may mention the heads of our Saviour, of the apostles and saints in Fra Angelico's pictures, as excelling in expression and beauty, as well as those of the elect, in his representations of the Last Judgment; his delineations of the worldly, the wicked, the reprobate, are uniformly feeble and inadequate; his success or failure is always proportioned to his moral sympathy or distaste.

Of the family or connexions of Fra Bartolommeo as little is known as of those of Fra Angelico.

From an early age, he appears to have been of a virtuous and serious disposition, which was a good deal tried in the position in which he was placed in the beginning of his life. His youthful studies were prosecuted under the direction of Cosimo Rosselli, who, however, owing to advanced age, was assisted by his pupils, Cosimo and Albertinelli. Neither of these appears to have been a suitable companion for Bartolommeo, or, as he was called in Tuscan pronunciation, Baccio; and having, moreover, become convinced that Rosselli was not a master under whom he could hope to reach perfection in his art, he, together with Albertinelli, quitted Rosselli's school, and repaired to Baccio's house, where they applied themselves to studying the ancient masters.

The works of Leonardo da Vinci appear to have had peculiar attraction for Baccio, and to have laid the foundation of his subsequent style.

Baccio seems to have been one of the first of the Florentine artists who yielded to the remonstrances of Savonarola, when that extraordinary man commanded them to repair the injury to morals which their immodest productions had occasioned. He attached himself closely to the Friar, and his former bosom friend, Albertinelli, having espoused the party of the Arrabbiati, the opponents of Savonarola, all connexion between the two painters ceased for a time.

While engaged upon the fresco of the Last Judgment, in the chapel of the cemetery of the hospital of Santa Maria Nuova which he has begun at the request of the Dominicans, the popular rage against Savonarola reached its height, and Father Marchese thus narrates the occasion on which Baccio first declares his intention to join the Dominican Order :—

Meanwhile, the termination of Savonarola's career was approaching. Voices of menace and bloody deeds presaged the tremendous ruin that was gathering over his head. His enemies, who, up to that moment, were kept within certain limits, now resolved on vengeance, proceeded to open outrage. Baccio, seeing the terrible conspiracy, ceased to paint the Final Judgment, and left it imperfect. On the eighth of April, 1498, the Florentines, known as the Arrabbiati, marched in military array to the convent of San Marco, to wreak their fury on Savonarola, and those who had aided him in his attempt at Reform. More than five hundred citizens, commanded by Francesco Valori, took up their position within the walls, to defend Fra Gerolamo's life. Two hundred of the friars who were well armed, added themselves to Valori's combatants, and resolved to make a desperate defence. Baccio della Porta, who was not so good a soldier as he was a painter, wishing withal to act the part of a true friend, although terror-stricken, took refuge within the besieged convent. Here he found Fra Benedetto, the miniaturist, a much braver man, who stood prepared to fight to the death. Finding all the doors barricaded, and the defenders on the alert, the Arrabbiati set fire to the gates of the church and convent. The Piagnoni then showed themselves to be leal to their master, and began to discharge their cross-bows and harquebuses from the roof, belfry, and windows. The friars, though some of them would gladly have drawn the sword, collected round Savonarola in the choir, and there, prostrate before the Holy Sacrament, besought God to aid and have pity on them. Meanwhile, death and flight had thinned the ranks of the besieged. One of them, Valori, who despaired of victory, left the convent, and he, with his wife and tender son, were slain on the instant. The assailants, having forced their way into the church, contaminated it with blood and carnage; and when the adverse parties engaged in hand-to-hand conflict, one may fancy the horror of the spectacle mid flame and smoke, and the groans and blasphemies of the wounded and dying. A German, who was an excellent marksman, clambered up into the pulpit, and fired, without mercy, on the Arrabbiati. As the latter gained ground, they rushed to the choir, but such was the resistance which they experienced from the narrow dimensions of the place, and the bravery of the men who opposed them, that they failed to open a passage to its interior. Finally, having scaled the walls, they attacked the Piagnoni, in front and flank. At this juncture, poor Baccio, who at first gave some proof of valour, grew dreadfully alarmed, and cast away his unwonted arms, vowing to God, that if He snatched him from this peril, he would take the habit of S. Dominic, and close his days in religion. In order to stay the bloodshed, Savonarola spontaneously surrenered himself to his enemies, and Baccio witnessed the insults and magical death of his illustrious friend. Wounded to the very depths of his soul, appalled by that terrible calamity, incapable of receiving counsel or consolation, he abandoned the pencil, for with Savonarola perished that holy flame which gave aliment to his fervid imaginings. Baccio da Monte Lupo, the sculptor, fleeing before the wrath of Fra Gerolamo's murderers, spent a long time wandering through Italy; whilst Botticelli, Cronaca, Lorenzo di Credi, and other partisans of the Friar, overwhelmed with grief, for a while ceased to cultivate their beloved arts.

But Porta never forgot that dreadful day, nor his vow, and, like a true man, resolved to keep it. His brother, however, was a difficulty in the way; for, at his father's death, the care of the little Peter and the management of the paternal property devolved on him. Wherefore, having consulted Santi Pagnini, the Dominican, who was then domiciled in San Marco, the latter took charge of the younger brother during the period of the novitiate which Baccio was to perform far from Florence. Baccio then surrendered to Peter whatsoever property he had, together with his right to his patrimony, and having charged Albertinelli to finish the Final Judgment in Santa Maria Nuova, (for which he had received the greater part of the stipulated payment,) he set out at once for Prato. July 26, A.D. 1500, he fulfilled his vow, by taking the habit of the Preaching-Friars in his thirtieth year. Retaining his baptismal name, he was admitted amongst the religious of the choir. In the following year, he made his religious profession, and returned to the convent of San Marco, Florence. This sudden resolution gave great annoyance to Porta's friends; and as to Mariotto Albertinelli, Vasari informs us "that he was almost out of his mind for the loss of his companion; and soastounded was he by the fact, that he almost became desperate. Nevertheless, if Mariotto did not hate the Friars, of whom he was constantly speaking evil, and if he had not taken part with the faction against Fra Gerolamo, his love for Baccio would have made him take the habit in the same monastery." We will offer no remark on these words, as the facts already stated, as well as those that remain to be told, must clear up the truth.

The fate of Savonarola produced a deep effect upon the mind of Baccio; and although, after he had, as related by Father Marchese, taken the Dominican habit, he resumed his pencil, yet he worked without enthusiasm, and chiefly in obedience to his superiors.

The fire of genius, however, which smouldered in his breast, was fanned into a bright flame by a visit from the illustrious Raphael, then a young man. The interchange of ideas that must have ensued between them, and the communion of two such kindred spirits, was mutually and permanently advantageous to each, and the effects are still visible in the paintings of both.

The most celebrated of Fra Bartolommeo's pictures, is that known as the Virgin della Misericordia, at Lucca, the following description of which we extract from our author :—

This picture is about six-and-a-half Florentine braccia high, four-and-a-half wide. It is semi-circular, at the summit, and contains forty-eight figures, either half or whole, large as life. Mazzarosa, who made it the subject of a second letter, addressed to Pietro Giordani, 22nd September, 1828, speaks of it thus :—“A multitude of the faithful, of every age, sex, and condition, has recourse to Mary (who stands on a throne in the centre), supplicating Her to intercede for them in their common affliction. Mary, the Mother of mercies, as the words on the foot-stool indicate, receives their prayers, and, with hands and eyes raised to heaven, invokes the divine mercy on those who confide in her : nor in vain, because we behold, as it were, in a vision over her, the merciful Lord, who is poised in the air. His breast is visible, and the rest of His body is concealed by the clouds. We see, however, His naked side, and the wound is also perceptible, as the wind has gently moved the crimson robe with which the painter has most appropriately clothed Him. This figure, with its benignant expression of countenance and extended arms, most happily illustrates the words on the little scroll, ‘Misereor super turbam.’ Nothing can be more beautiful than the disposition of the figures according to sex and age. The mothers, with their children, are on the steps of the throne ; the younger children are behind these, whilst angels hover over the whole group. Each and all of them have their eyes riveted on the Virgin, and the adults and old men are at her sides. Three groups excel all the rest : one of them stands at foot of the throne, on the right of which there is a mother directing her little son to fix his eyes on the Virgin ; another is a mother, with two children, one of whom, having got behind her cunningly, tries to annoy the naked baby in the parent's arms, whilst the wrinkled nurse chides his playfulness. This is a group of singular truth and beauty, but somewhat inopportune, because it distracts the eye and the mind from the principal subject, and because these two women seem not to be impressed by the presence of the Virgin, on whom the eyes of all the others are turned most devoutly. The third is, perhaps, the most beautiful. It represents S. Dominic in the act of pointing out the Madonna, with the fore-finger of his right hand, to the Gonfalonier of the Republic, whilst with his left he encourages him to approach Her. It is thought that the S. Dominic is the portrait of Fra Sebastiano ; and that the Gonfalonier is Montecatini, who held that office at the period. A poor man, half naked, on the right of the Virgin, is exceedingly well designed and coloured. Mary is erect on the throne, and seems to have just arisen from her seat, as she has not yet removed her right foot, which rests on the little footstool ; whilst her left, on which she supports herself, has already touched the pedestal—a most natural action, as the left foot is always foremost in descending. The Virgin is robed in ample crimson drapery, shot with white. From her head falls an azure veil, of large and graceful dimensions, whose ends are borne by two angels on the wing. Full of sympathy for her poor applicants, whose miseries she knows, her beautiful face and eyes evidence her maternal tenderness. Her right hand is raised above her head, in the act of supplication; and her left points out the people beneath her. Showing to Christ those who need her mercy, she so looks at, and prays the Redeemer, as almost, if I may use the phrase, to wring the yearned-for grace from Him. . . . Here let us observe that Christ is visible to her alone, for she alone has her eyes fixed on Him. This was a most wise conception, for it preserves the unity of the action: any other disposition must have been an error, as Mary could not then be the principal object of the picture, as was required of the painter.

"Now, if you consider the tout-ensemble of this great painting, and all its parts, one by one, you will perceive that I have not exaggerated in calling it stupendous, and fit to be placed side by side with Raffaello's Transfiguration." And Missirini, after having described it figure by figure, concludes thus:—"Here the excellence of design, the primary and substantial characteristic of every production of art, is beyond all praise. In every part of the picture we find true sublimity, nay, and that inspiration with which the scenery of a gorgeous theatre is calculated to overflow the soul—here the powerful expression pierces our bosoms and stirs them to their depth. How shall I describe the movements, attitudes, or the graceful flow of the draperies for which the Friar was so famous? What shall I say of the vivid colouring which is not surpassed by Tiziano's tintings? The shadows are diaphanous, the opposition of the tints homogeneous, and the effect of the chiaroscuro magical."

His picture of Saint Mark, at Florence, is considered to be in painting what Michael Angelo's statue of Moses is in sculpture, and many eminent judges regard it as one of the finest pieces of figure painting in existence.

We have noted, and that briefly, but two of those men, who by the works of the pencil, have lent a lustre to the name of Dominican. It would occupy much more space than we are able to devote to the task to merely enumerate the host of sculptors, architects, painters on glass, and "nuvatori," who have belonged to this order, and whose lives and works form the subject of Father Marchese's work.

As an architect, and as a man of general knowledge, Fra Giovanni Giocondo, of Verona, born about 1430, was highly eminent. He was, according to our author, a master of military fortification, skilled in hydraulics, familiar with Greek and Roman literature, thoroughly conversant with antiquities, an excellent mathematician, and no contemptible natural historian. By Cæsar Scaliger, he was called "an old and new library of all that was good in science," a "Phoenix of intellects," and by Vasari, "a most rare man, and universally learned in all the faculties."

Father Marchese disposes, we think satisfactorily, of the question which originated with Tiraboschi, the learned Jesuit, and author amongst other works of "Storia della Letteratura Italiana," whether Fra Giocondo was a Dominican or Franciscan Friar, and in our minds establishes the claim of the former order to number the architect amongst its illustrious men. At all events, it appears certain that if Fra Giocondo ever embraced the Franciscan rule, it was in his latter days, though his bas relief portrait at Verona represents him in the Dominican habit, and thus strengthens the belief that he lived and died a Dominican.

Among his works was a bridge over the Seine, the military and engineering defences of Trevigi against the Emperor Maximilian, a design for the re-construction of the Rialto when destroyed by fire in 1518, and numerous other works displaying great architectural and engineering skill. He was at the same time occupied with philological studies, and produced a new edition of the letters of the younger Pliny, of the works of Cæsar, Cato, Vetruius, Frontinus, Aurelius Victor, and Julius Obsequen's "De Prodigis." He was moreover employed to assist Raphael, after the death of Bramante in the completion of St. Peter's, as appears from the following letter addressed by Raphael to his uncle, Simone di Battista di Ciarle da Urbino, dated 1st July, 1514.

As to staying in Rome, I may as well tell you, that I cannot stay anywhere else, so devoted am I to the building of S. Peter's; and I now occupy the place of Bramante. What place is there in the world which is superior to Rome, or what undertaking is there greater than that of S. Peter's? This is the greatest building that has ever been seen, and it must cost more than a million in gold. You must know that the Pope has determined to expend, on this building, sixty thousand ducats annually: indeed, he does not think of anything else. The Pope has given me, as my companion, a most learned friar: he is very old, and has passed his eightieth year. The Pope, knowing that he cannot live long, appointed him to be my colleague, for he is a man of great reputation, and exceedingly wise. I will learn of him any fine secret that he may possess regarding architecture, and I hope thus to become perfect in this art. His name is Fra Giocondo, and the Pope sends for us every day, and discourses a while with us about this building.

We must be content with merely mentioning the names of Fra Damiano da Bergamo, the celebrated Intarsiator, or worker in inlaying wood; of Sister Plautilla Nilli, painteress in oil; of Father Danti, mathematician, engineer, and architect; of Father Portigiani, skilled in casting in bronze, and an archi-act; of Father Paganelli, architect and engineer, and of Fathers Jayno and André, the one a Spanish, the other a French painter. Of Fra Damiano da Bergamo, Father Marchese tells us the following anecdote. The Emperor Charles the Fifth, when at Bologna in order to be crowned by Pope Clement the Seventh, was much struck with the beauty of Fra Damiano's work, surrounding the shrine of St Dominic, and expressed a desire to see the artist:—

On the 7th of March, A.D. 1530, the Emperor, accompanied by Alfonso d'Este, Duke of Ferrara, and some Princes of his court, proceeded to the Dominican convent; and halting before the humble cell of Fra Damiano, knocked, and demanded admittance. The Friar opened the door, and just as the Emperor entered, he closed it quickly—"Hold," said the Emperor, "you have shut out the Duke of Ferrara, who accompanies me." "I knew very well that it was he," replied the lay-brother, "and it is because I know him, that I will not permit him to stand under the vault of my cell!" "What?" asked Charles, "have you reason to complain of him?" "Hear me, Sire," answered Fra Damiano; "when I was coming from Bergamo to Bologna, in order to execute the works of the choir, I brought with me those few tools, which are absolutely necessary for the practice of this art, in the exercise of which I hope to spend my life worthily. Well, I had scarcely set foot on the territory of Ferrara, when the officers of the Duke compelled me—poor Friar as I am—to pay an exorbitant and unjust tax; but the rudeness with which they treated me, was still more intolerable; and this is the reason why the Duke of Ferrara shall never see the works which I now exhibit to your Majesty." This spirit of independence was quite novel to Charles, who was continually surrounded by servile sycophants. Nevertheless, he smiled, and told the lay-brother that he would interpose with the Duke of Ferrara, in order that every satisfaction should be given to him. The emperor then left the cell, and told the Duke the reason of Fra Damiano's choler; whereon, the latter promised to indemnify him for any loss he might have suffered, and he, furthermore, guaranteed to exempt himself and his pupils from all taxation as often as they passed through his little principality. The Emperor, accompanied by the Duke, then re-entered Fra Damiano's cell, and the Friar, to convince them that his histories were composed of pieces of wood, and not painted with the pencil, took up a plane, and passed it vigorously over their surface, without doing the least injury to the colouring, which remained in all its integrity and beauty. He then presented the Emperor with a beautiful little history of the Crucifixion, and he gave another to the Duke of Ferrara, who ever afterwards set the highest value on it.

We cannot wonder, after the perusal of these volumes, that the Dominican Order should feel proud of its artists and men of genius. Though other Orders have also, from time to time, contributed their scholars, painters, and sculptors, though the Benedictines can boast their Monaco, and their Clovio; the Franciscans, their Factor, and their Negroponte; and the Carthusians and Carmelites, their Coton, and their Lippi; yet it must be confessed, that in none of these Orders can such a splendid and numerous band be found arrayed, as in that of the Dominicans. With them, peculiarly, as indeed with all the Monastic Orders in the Middle Ages, was to be found the practical illustration of the motto "Laborare est Orare." Those glorious specimens of art which they have left behind, are each a prayer, a prayer more eloquent than could have been composed in words, and still remaining to teach devotion and piety to crowds of admiring beholders.

Who, indeed, can tell, but that often in the lonely hours of the night, in the calm solitude of his cell, after a day devoted to his labor of love, there rose before the eyes of the artist monk, visions of that heavenly palace, the earthly career of whose king and court, it was his delight to study and depict. Then might he have beheld the swiftly moving shining wings of angel and archangel; the sublime and beaming countenances of patriarchs and saints, and all the dazzling effulgence of the heavenly host, and heard the silver music of their harps, and the sound of their celestial voices, sweet, clear, and harmonious, rising up to the throne; and when the grey dawn of morning stole into his cell and dissipated the glorious vision, sprang up to fix it upon the enduring canvas, and to teach the artists of future times, the beauty of that inspiration which is derived from religious contemplation.

If, in the short and hasty notice which we have taken of this subject, we shall have succeeded in drawing some attention to the Art history of the Monastic Orders, and inducing such of our readers as have not yet read them, to peruse Father Marchese's work, we shall feel that we have done, in our humble capacity, "the state some service." The further the subject is pursued in all its branches and details, the more convinced will enquirers be of the truth of the words used by the learned author of the "Ecclesiastical Sketches," when speaking of the mendicant Friars—"In an age of oligarchal tyranny, they were the protectors of the weak; in an age of ignorance, the instructors of mankind; and in an age of profligacy, the stern vindicators of the holiness of the sacerdotal character, and the virtues of domestic life."

In concluding this paper it is right to add, that the Rev. Mr. Meehan has performed his duty as a translator faithfully, earnestly, learnedly, and eloquently; and has added to that reputation already gained by his able contributions to a series—"Duffy's Library for Ireland"—not sufficiently appreciated in its most valuable and important volumes.

THE

IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

~~~~~
No. XXIV. DECEMBER, 1856.
~~~~~

ART. I.—ODD PHASES IN LITERATURE.

SECOND PAPER.*

1. Les Fantaisies de Bruscamille. A Paris: Chez Jean Millot, 1612.

2. Essai Sur les Livres dans l'Antiquité. Par. H. Gérard. Paris, 1840.

In our former paper, in writing of Burlesque Orders, we omitted the following singular societies:—

The order of the society de la Culotte, the statutes of which were compiled in 1724 by Brother Béquillard.

The order de la Centaine derived from that of Fendeurs.

The order of Egyptians. Towards the year 1635, Mademoiselle de Pré, niece to the Marquis de Feuquières, at that time lieutenant to the king at Metz, founded, in that city, an order of knighthood to which she gave the name of l'Ordre des Egyptiens, said her cousin, the Abbé Arnauld, because "No one could be admitted who had not completed some ingenious theft. She was elected their queen, under the title of Epicharis, and all her knights carried, suspended from a green ribbon, a golden tablet, on which was inscribed the words: Rien ne m'échappe. Several officers of the army, and of parliament, who were at Metz, had themselves enrolled in this order, which was very fashionable, for it was necessary to have genius in order to gain admission ; this could not be accomplished without presenting the request in verse to Queen Epicharis. And I remember apropos of that, a very correct man, M. de Vivans, who was chamberlain to the duke of Orleans and captain of cavalry, who wished to join this order, but could not obtain a dispensation from the rule of petitioning in verse ; he had not been born a poet, though a Gascon, and was at last obliged to compose the following, which afforded more amusement than perhaps a better :

---

* For the First Paper of this series see IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW. No. XXIII. p. 439.

Princesse, recevez Virans ;
 Tout le monde vous y condamne ;
 Je reconnais qu'il a dessein
 De vous servir, ou Dieu me damne."

The order de la Félicité. This order, worthy product of the corruption which reigned during the last century, gave rise to a great number of works, which have become very rare ; as the Formulaire du cérémonial en usage dans l'ordre de la Félicité, 1745, in duodecimo ; l'Anthropophile ou le Secret et les Mystères de la Félicité, 1746, in duodecimo ; l'Ordre Hermaphrodite ou les Secrets de la sublime Félicité, 1748, in duodecimo ; le Moyen de monter au plus haut grade de la marine sans se mouiller, in duodecimo ; Dictionnaire de l'Ordre de la Félicité, par Fleury in octavo.

The order de Fendeurs on which there is extant an instruction, 1788, in octavo.

The orders of chevaliers Feuillants and of ladies Phillides.

This order established in Brittany, had for a pass word :—

Avez vous effeuillé les roses ? Et les pampres ?

The order de la Fidélité derived from that of Fendeurs.

The chevaliers de la Grappe, instituted at Arles, by Damas de Gravaison. The statutes and ordonnances were published in 1697, in duodecimo.

The order of the Lanturelus. The Marquis of Croismare, a friend of Madame de la Ferté Imbault, conceived at the period (1771) when the intrigues of Maupeou afflicted Paris, the notion of founding the order of the Lanturelus. He appointed himself grand master. Madame de la Ferté, named at first grand mistress, was afterwards elected queen by all the frequenters of the house, who had taken part in the new institution. Some pieces of verse, emanating from this society, having reached Catherine the Second's ears, she desired the Russian lords to obtain them for her daughter-in-law, and the princess received them. There remains at the present day no other record of this burlesque order, save the poetry inserted in the collections of the time.

The order de la Malice. There has been found a report and description of this order, in some leaves of a manuscript preserved in the print cabinet of the Royal Library. Nothing could be more inoffensive than this order, say the statutes, instituted by a very amiable and very worthy lady, Madame Agrippine de la Bonté Môme, Jan. 1st 1734. We insert some verses of the preface

Celui qui veut de la Malice
Devenir insigne profès,
Doit si bien tendre ses filets
Pendant le temps qu'il est novice,
Qu'il ne passe jamais un jour
Sans avoir fait quelque bon tour.
Mais que l'aimable politesse,
L'esprit fin, la délicatesse,
Brillent en toute occasion,
Et que jamais malice noire,
De fait ou bien d'intention,
Ne ternisse la belle gloire
Que dans l'ordre il faut acquérir.

After the statutes follow the orders which are very amusing.

Art. 1. There are no other degrees than those of grand mistress, lieutenant, chancellor and treasurer, four governors and four knights, whose election is obtained by a conscientious knowledge of their respective merits and talents in malice.

Art. 2.—All those who present themselves as candidates for this order should have the qualities requisite to enable them to fill the offices in which they will be employed.

Art. 3.—They will be obliged to prove themselves by a trial of two years, that they may be esteemed fit for subjection to an examination before the chancellor, in order that they may be qualified to receive titles of the order.

Art. 4.—The noviciate will be one year, and during that time the novices are obliged to give the lieutenant, twice every day, a description of the cunning and adroit means they would employ to entice into their snare those whom the order would desire to befriend by their friendship and benevolence.

Art. 5.—They would never be admitted to profession until they had faithfully complied with the obligations of the noviceship, which must be certified by the lieutenant when they are examined in full assembly.

Art. 6.—The professed are obliged to make these vows : privation from any thing that might be prejudicial to health, and of poverty, or detachment from the goods of others.

Art. 7.—In order to further those intentions, no domestics from Champaign, Switzerland or Picardy, were to be admitted.

Art. 8—Turkeys, geese or sheep were never to be reared in the house.

Art. 9.—But they would have, for good example, beautiful apes, cats, parrots, daws, foxes and magpies.

Art. 10.—The principal books of the library should be l'Espigle, Richard-sans-peur, Buscon, Gusman d'Alfarache, Gil Blas, le Prince Sans Pire, l'Histoire des Pages, et les Anecdotes des Pensionnaires, des Religieuses, &c., &c.

The decoration of the order consisted in a little medal suspended from a lilac ribbon, and bearing on one side an ape, and on the other the following verses:—

Pour vous imiter je suis fait,
C'est là mon plus noble exercice ;
Aussi, par un retour parfait,
Vous me ressemblez en malice.

The society of the brothers and sisters of the order de la Méduse, of which the rules were published at Marseilles, without date, in duodecimo, under the title of “Les agréables divertissements de la table.”

The order des Mopses, on which a book was published at Amsterdam, in 1745, in duodecimo.

The order de la Mouche à Miel. This order, instituted the 11th of June, 1703, figured among the amusements of the little court formed at Sceaux by the duchess du Maine. The medal of the order, engraven in the Récreations Numismatique, of Duby, presents the head of the duchess du Maine with the following legend: L. BAR. D. SC. D. P. D. L. O. D. L. M. A. M. (Louise, baronne de Sceaux, directrice perpétuelle de l'ordre de la Mouche à Miel) On the reverse, a bee going towards a hive with the device: Picola si, fa ma gravi le ferite (I am little, nevertheless I wound deeply.)

The Knights, on whom the order was conferred, pronounced the following vow: “I swear, by the bees of Mount Hymettus, fidelity and obedience to the perpetual directress of the order, to bear all my life the medal de la Mouche, and to fulfill, as long as I exist, the statutes of the order; and, if I fail in my vow, I consent that the honey be changed for me into gall, the wax into tallow, the flowers into nettles, and the wasps and hornets may pierce me with their stings.”

The medal was of gold and weighed twenty grains.

the order de la Persévérance, established in March, 1777.
 the reception of a member they erected three altars: to to friendship, and to humanity.
 the order of Ribalderie, instituted at Paris, 1612.
 the order of Sophisiens, instituted by Cuvelier in 1802. the order of the Tancardins, celebrated in the seventeenth y in the songs of Lainez.
 the knights de l'Union, established at Vienná (Dauphiné), 14.

societies, and literary or burlesque orders, were not numerous in other countries than France. Modénois nzone, who died in 1551, founded a literary society whose ers assembled at table. During the repast it was cus-y for them to compose a Greek or Latin epigram, a son-a madrigal on each of the dishes; at other times they not ask a drink but in the language with which the r of the banquet first served them. Another day, each bliged to relate all adages relative to an animal, a plant, ath, or a saint, &c.

society altogether composed of distinguished wits," writes ené, "was formed at Venice towards the year 1740.
 der to offer every opposition to the torrent of bad taste which they were inundated, they employed, at the same serious discussion and light criticism, occasionally even s of a more pungent humor, and even railed at bures that were very trifling, in order to dispute the pretenand undermine the success of the corrupters of language good taste. This singular Academy had taken the title ciété des Granelleschi, that is to say of those who had two elli for a coat of arms: a granelli is a fool, a ninny, a leton. In this Academy, enrolled under such a standard, nevertheless, a very great number of men as distinguished their rank, by the seriousness of their character, by the and extension of their knowledge, as by the piquancy their wit. Each sitting opened by a broadside of the most ulous productions conceivable, and the most analogous to emblem and their title. Their real sitting opened subently, and the lectures there delivered, the literary prins which they promulgated, excited the admiration of all, preserved to Venice the sacred fire of taste. Notwithding the care taken by their President to refrain at first saying any thing that had not the character of imbecility exacted by their statutes, he would sometimes forget himself, but, on discovering which, the Academy deprived him of his post. They elected in his place a man who was completely stupid but who considered himself perfect, having great pretensions to literary talent; he filled pages every day with the most gross idiotism, read it to every one, and mistook for signs of approbation the mocking and derision of those who laughed at his extreme simplicity. He was called Joseph Secohellari; the society sent him a deputation, received him into their corps, elected him unanimously prince and president of the Academy of the Granelleschi, with the title of Arcigranellone, a title created for himself. They installed their new president with great solemnity. They placed on him a crown of prunes, addressed to him a discourse, and presented him with some verses of the most comical seriousness, filled with ironical eulogies on the pride and happiness they experienced in crowning him. He had for a throne an old arm-chair very much elevated. Arcigranellone never failed to open the sitting by one of his own compositions inconceivably ridiculous, of which he had, perhaps, given the first copy. They frequently interrupted him by the enthusiasm of their plaudits, though they prevented the insertion of this chef-d'œuvre in the records of the Academy."

In the fourteenth century, a period marked by the decay of German literature, poetry was exclusively cultivated by the people, and they formed maîtrises or jurandes, to which they were admitted on fulfilling certain conditions which restricted them to the knowledge of insignificant rules on quantity and rhymes. They were very frequently received on paying a sum of money. The members of these societies adopted the denomination of meisters-sængers (master poets). To acquire celebrity they tried to invent some new rhythm, which they embellished under the name of irregular or whimsical; such as the rhythms of l'Escargot, de l'Encre, des Etudiants joyeux, de l'Or, des Roses, &c., &c.

Mayence, Strasburg, and Nuremburg possessed the most famous jurandes. They had them also at Memmingen, Ulm, Augsburg, and in the other villages of Suabia. Their reunions were held generally in the taverns, concluding always by orgies.

The greater number of these maîtrises continued from 1350 up to the first years of the sixteenth century, a period in which effected complete reformation in the German language. The others continued for a much longer time. The University of Strasbourg was in existence even so late as the end of the last century.

do not see figuring in the lists that have been preserved numbers of these jurandes but bakers and weavers &c.

One period of the restoration of letters, the Germans like the Italians, a great number of literary societies, who devoted to themselves, exclusively, the refining and perfecting of the national literature. One of the most ancient is from 1480, and was established at Heidelberg, under the name of Societas litteraria rhemana. They were occupied with Latin, Greek, Hebrew, astronomy, music, poetry and eloquence. The associates often recreated themselves with balls and other festivities, where might be seen, writes more Germanorum inveterato strenue polare.

In 1617, Teutleben, marshal of the court at Weimar, founded the society of the Fructifants, which lasted up to 1644 and counted, amongst its members, one king, one hundred and fifty three princes, and more than sixty barons, and savants.

In 1644, Jean Clay, called the younger, founded at Heidelberg, along with Philippe Harzdorf, l'Ordre des Bergers et des Fleurs de la Pegnitz, a society whose object was the improvement of the German language. A century later, Herold, who took part in it, published, under the soubriquet Varante, an historical notice of the society, in octavo. In the middle of the seventeenth century, Philippe de Zesen founded at Hamburg a Société des Beaux Esprits Allemands. The king of Hungary, Matthias Corvin, had conceived the grand and singular project of building a city, all academy, which should contain 40,000 students, with their masters, physicians, monks, and domestics. He designed himself the plan, and laid the foundation on the banks of the Danube below Buda. The wars which he was obliged to sustain against his neighbours absorbed the money destined for this gigantic enterprise, and he established at Buda a university of moderate

In 1548, a Pole named Przonka, founded, in the palatinate of Lublin, a merry society, who presented a piquant comedy on the Polish republic. It was called la Republique de Lublin, the name of a village of the palatinate of Lublin.

An anonymous memoir composed in the eighteenth century, and recently published, contains the following details of this society.

“ Modelled on the republic of Poland, that of Babin had the same orders and the same dignities ; we there behold palatines, castellans, in a word people adorned with all the titles in vogue in the country of its founder. But to shew that they had wisely shaken off the yoke of national prejudices, they have admitted strangers to the privilege of those titles, when some laudable case demanded it. The diets were frequent but very short, for they had generally but one sitting. No law prevented their holding them in various places, nevertheless, they assembled the greater part of the time in a village which, for that reason was surnamed Gelda, a term used to signify a place where they prattled constantly until they were out of breath.

“ In these diets, they did not amuse themselves by seeking a wonderful unanimity in the suffrages ; it was the plurality of voices which decided all. The faction and the underhand manœuvres had no point there. The senators and nuncios were equally ignorant of corruption ; hence, there was no disruption, and the issue was never unprofitable. They examined the qualities of the most eminent persons in the country, and according to the judgment they formed in their calculation, they were adorned with a patent for such or such an employ in the republic of Babin. Those who shewed an ambition for a tranquil and an easy life, all at once became bishops ; those who spoke continually of their valor, without ever having given proofs were made great or inferior generals. Others suddenly became ministers as a reward for their political dissertations, and their vast projects arranged without the slightest knowledge of the interests of princes. In fine, each was managed, sometimes according to his taste, and always according to his merit. A banquet accompanied the happy closing of the assembly, and we can well imagine that it concluded in drinking the healths of the new dignitaries and singing their praises.

“ Nothing could bear a more striking resemblance to the commissions of the Régiment de la Calotte, than the patents in question, I have seen them equally managed. With a like badinage, the society in question, often gave striking lectures on the distribution of court favors, for it sometimes happened that strange changes were made in the destiny of a who passed from the republic of Poland to that of Babin. For example, they there metamorphosed the primate, into another quester, the pilfering palatine into a thief taker or a rascal of the custom house; the timid general became a miser, and the bad magistrate a merchant.

One day that we were speaking of this establishment in the presence of Sigismond Augustus, he asked if they had ever crowned a king. Przonka said to him gravely, 'God never crowned a king, Sire, that we should have even conceived such a thought whilst your Majesty lived! Reign happily over us, as God does over all Poland.' Though according to the circumstances of the time, this reply might appear susceptible of an interpretation, Sigismond took it as a joke, and betrayed his displeasure.

During several years, this band of waggish observers were the scourge of vice, and of all who rendered themselves ridiculous.

They perceived on all sides the fruits of their pleasantry; the dread of being immolated to public laughter, produced a happy change in the manners and conduct of great and small. Finally, the society fell, whether in consequence of the mutations by which Poland was distracted during the following reigns, or from want of men of genius who could shine in such assemblies. Be it what it may, the history of our times shew that the country has on this matter sustained no loss.

Amongst the literary reunions Albums were introduced; this custom was very ancient. "It is the name," says the Dictionary of Trévoux, "which has been given to a little register or small book that the learned carried with them. When they arrived in a city, either travelling or otherwise, they were desirous to collect the scholars of the country, and present to them their Album Amicorum, requesting them to write something in it, in order to obtain their holograph. There were usually written in these albums mottoes, some sentiment or maxim, or a grateful tribute of courtesy to the person presenting the album." We here give some details of several of these albums, in which the amateurs in autographs would pay very dearly to be present.

Daniel de Behr, a Pomeranian gentleman, had, in 1586, a celebrated album. in which duke Augustus of Brunswick-Lünebourg, student at Wittenberg, wrote the following maxim:—Pulcherrimarum rerum notitia non otio sed negotio, non vigiliis sed studiis, non votis sed laboribus, non pretio sed

prece paratur. His brother Earnest inscribed on another leaf of this same album, the following distich :—

Sperare in Christum et vitæ tolerare labores,
Et bene posse mori discere, beatus eris.

Barclay having inserted some sheets of white paper into one of the copies of the treatise De Constantiâ by Lipsius, converted it into an Album Amicorum, which was honored by the signatures of fifty distinguished men, such as Casaubon (Isaac), Delrio (Martin), Dousa (Francis), Lipsius, Lemire, Erycius Puteanus, Rubens (Philippe), Wouweren (Jean de), Morel.

Madame Desloges had an album which contained a great number of pieces most complimentary to her. We read there, as quoted by Tallemant des Réaux, these verses written by Malherbe himself.

Ce livre est comme un sacré temple
Où chacun doit à mon exemple
Offrir quelque chose de prix ;
Cette offrande est due à la gloire,
D'une dame que l'on doit croire
L'ornement des plus beaux esprits.

The album which should probably be considered as the most original and voluminous of all the albums known, is that of the Baron de Burkana. This eminent man, who, after traversing all Europe, died at Vienna, in 1766, was born at Aleppo, and had been brought up at the court of the emperor of Germany. His album contained 3,532 testimonials of commendation and eulogy, of maxims, epigrams, witticisms, anecdotes &c., &c., it bore the following title in French and Latin :—

*Temple of piety, of virtue, of honor, of friendship and of good faith; consecrated to undying and immortal remembrance; all you therefore that possess the piety of Eneas, the strength of Hercules, the friendship of Pylades, the fidelity of Achates;—enter here, honour it by your presence, you are invited by—*LE BARON DE BURKANA, Aleppo-Syrien. We now give some extracts from these numberless testimonials in favor of the proprietor of the album.

Montesquieu said of him that, "like the sun he had seen all parts of the world." The prince de Ligne called him, "the illustrious and never ceasing traveller over the entire world," and requested of him "to salute for him the great Mogul and the king of Monomotapa when he passed through their countries."

taire proclaimed himself too happy to write his name e album of "the man of all countries, who spoke all ages, a true cosmopolite, who is French in Gaul, Spanish eria, German in Germany, English in Britain."

e librarian Pingré asserts that in 1753 all Paris admired nan "as being the most erudite in his age, an Arabian ary."

e chevalier d'Eon, at that time captain of dragoons, and ary to the French embassy in Russia, wrote that he was ched and fascinated by the pleasure he had experienced eting M. le baron de Burkana for the third time in his s, "and that he hoped to see him once more either at antinople or at Pekin."

canoness of Paderborn, in Wastphalia, said "that she ought long in vain for the phoenix of the ancients, and she had at length found him at Paris, 1749, in the person ron de Burkana." Another lady entitles him "the trious bee collecting the most precious honey." A third e Eastern Mentor." A Spanish marchioness declares
"caballero celebre y gustoso." And the countess hôpital is "charmed by the conversation and greatness ul exhibited by this nobleman."

e perceive among the names of personages inscribed in album, those of Lenglet-Dufresnoy, Crébillon, Ladvocat, ud, Tronchin, Bonnet, Muratori, Molina, Zaccaria, Me-sio, Marshal Contades, Van Swieten, Haller, Gessner, &c. his book, finally, belonged to Goëthe; we do not know whose hands it fell after his death.

albums have become even more fashionable at the present
There is not a lady who brings to her house men of s, who has not her album for which she collects every e madrigals, sonnets, maxims and sayings more or less
. We often find in those albums charming pieces of
y. The following is very beautiful, but we do not even the name of author:—

Sur cette page blanche ou mes vers vont éclore,
Qu'un souvenir parfois ramène votre cœur.
De votre vie aussi la page est blanche encore,
Je voudrais la remplir d'un seul mot, le bonheur.
Le livre de la vie est un livre suprême,
Que l'on ne peut ouvrir ni fermer à son choix,
Ou le feuillet fatal se tourne de lui même.
Le passage adoré ne s'y lit qu'une fois.
On voudrait s'arrêter à la page où l'on aime,
Et la page où l'on meurt est déjà sous les doigts.

There are no people so dogmatic as Archæologists, yet how frequently are they deceived. Theophrastus tells that it has been said in the works of the Egyptians, that a king of Babylon had sent, as a gift to one of their kings, an emerald six feet long, and four and a half broad; furthermore, that they had in Egypt, in a temple of Jupiter, an obelisk composed of four single emeralds, which was sixty feet in height and proportionably wide. The same author adds that, whilst writing on those matters he should add, that he saw also at Tyre, in a temple of Hercules, a column made of one single emerald, but of a spurious description; in fact he asserts that he has frequently met with this species of spurious emerald; and informs us that in the Isle of Cyprus a stone had been discovered half emerald and half jasper, the substance not being entirely transformed into emerald. Apio, surnamed Plistonious, has written, that there was in Egypt, during his time, a colossal statue of Serapis, composed of a single emerald, which was thirteen feet and a half in height.

The Sacro Catino was formerly kept in an iron cabinet in the vestry, of which the Dean alone had the key, and was not exposed to public view more than once a year: it was then placed in an elevated position; a prelate supporting it by a string; around it were ranged the chevaliers Clavigeri, to whom its defence was confided. A law of 1476 punished, even with death in some cases, any one who should touch the Sacro Catino with gold, silver, precious stones, coral, or any other material. "In fine," said this edict, "in order to prevent the curious and incredulous from tampering with the Catino by examining it, and thereby subjecting it to be injured by scraping or perhaps even broken which would be considered an irreparable loss to the republic of Genoa, we feel obliged to issue this mandate." M. de La Condamine, led away by curiosity, concealed a diamond in the sleeve of his coat whilst examining the Sacro Catino in order to scratch it, and thus prove its hardness; but the monk who was shewing it to him, perceived it, and saved that time the Sacro Catino, happily for him, as it would have proved a most unfortunate affair both for him, and M. de La Condamine who had probably forgotten the edict of 1476. It appeared that, notwithstanding the observations of M. de La Condamine who had remarked in the Sacro Catino flaws such as we observe in melted glass, it preserved for a long time its reputation as an emerald, as a of which they say the Jews would have advanced several millions on it as a loan during the exigencies of the state.

The greater number of the mistakes made by the learned in dealing with antiquities were occasioned by the slight attention bestowed on discerning modern restorations, for there are but very few who can distinguish what is truly antique from what is substituted to supply the part lost.

Montfaucon wished to prove by a bas-relief of the Mattei Palace, representing a chase of the Emperor Galba, that the horses were shod at that time in the same way as at present, without remarking that the horse's foot merely furnishes a proof that the restorer was an ignorant sculptor.

Montfaucon, seeing a roller or staff (which is of course modern) in the hands of the pretended Castor and Pollux in the Villa Borghèse, thought that they were used in the games, or horse racing.

According to the same writer a similar staff, equally modern, in the hand of Mercury in the villa Ludovisi, presents an equally difficult to explain.

Wright regarded, as truly antique, a violin in the hand of Apollo in the villa Negroni, and points out another violin held by a little statue in bronze and preserved at Florence. Wright imagined that he defended the reputation of Raphael in adding that this great painter had placed a violin in the hands of Apollo in his famous representation of Parnassus, in the Vatican; the statue in question Bernini restored 150 years after Raphael. The urn of coloured glass called after Alexander the Great was taken by Lachausse, for a stone resembling sardonyx, others have taken it for a true sardonyx.

Richardson has given as an antique, a painting in fresco by Guido.

The Mars of John in Bologna of the villa Médicis was mistaken for an antique statue; this error once imprinted, was reprinted by more than one traveller. Several Antiquaries have got into ecstasies on beholding an Egyptian head in the Villa Borghèse, the head was a work of Bernini.

On the antique medals of Malta we see a reptile representing the Phœnician divinities imported into that isle. Pliney had seen there heads covered with the skins of the Maltese dogs, with the tails he says over the faces.

The Abbé Bizot, in his Histoire Métallique, mistook the ears of asses for engraved heads with this latter element.

It is related that Casanova, aided by the celebrated Mengs, played a trick on Winkelmann. This connoisseur, maintaining the superiority of the ancients over the moderns in works of art, Mengs painted a Ganyu. Casanova shewed it to Winkelmann as a gem of antiquity which he had been fortunate enough to discover. Winkelmann once recognised it as such, and burst forth in terms of admiration and praise of this chef-d'œuvre, which he declared to be the finest production of the Greeks.

This affair caused much dispute, because the literary world of the day took possession of it, and made it an arena where the friends and enemies of Winkelmann combated for time.*

This was not the only error of the archæologist; he told a story during his time, which perhaps is even yet current, that the head of Farnese Hercules had been found in the ground, and that the torso was one league in length and the legs ten leagues long.

At the end of the first volume of Winkelmann will be found a dissertation of M. Heyne, professor of the university of Göttingen, on the ivory used by the ancients, and on the manner in which they used it in works of art.

"The Turks," writes Caylus, "had used the pillars and columns of the temple of Ephesus for the construction of their houses. They cut the pillars, sawed the capitals, and placed them side by side, reversing the shafts. This picture of ignorance has made the same impression on my mind as the greater number of modern explanations of ancient monuments would be likely to produce on the mind of an ancient and enlightened man who should return once more to the world."

It was the fashion during the last century to admire the cord by which Dirce was attached to the bull in the famous group, preserved at the Museum Bourbonique, under the name of the Farnese Bull. This accessory part of the group is nothing remarkable however—it is modern.

The ancients invented and sold false antiquities as well as the present day. Phædrus, in fable fifty, speaks of a man of his time who affixed to marble statues the name of Phædrus to those of silver, that of Myron.

* See the letter to Comte Bühl, on Les Antiquités d'Hercule.

inkelmann mentioned a Hercules, which bore the false of Lysippus.

The Romans placed their own names on the statues of famous men of Greece, in order to deceive posterity into belief that they had been erected in their honor. We know the emperors themselves perpetrated this fraud.

Metius pretends that the ancients placed inextinguishable fires in their tombs. Ferrari proves that the light seen was nothing more than phosphorus.

The ancients had the same tendency to make their monuments appear antique in order to enhance their value. The Romans pretended that Deucalion had built their temple of Jupiter.

In France, there is not a cathedral to which they do not assign an impossibly ancient date, and we know to what fabulous antiquity the ancient historians would wish to trace the foundation of cities. Thus we see by Jehan Chaumeau, the first historian of Berri, that the town of Aix had been founded by himself, and so by others,

Paciandi, in his letters to the Count de Caylus, is opposed against the false antiquities, medals, inscriptions on coins: he unmasks several, amongst others a Venetian, Charles Louis, who, says he counterfeits all sorts of antiquities, Etruscan vases, admirably; he also works mosaics which pass for antiques; two of those were purchased by Cardinal Mazarin. "Eudeavour," added the good father, "to be assured those are not from the king's cabinet, for if they are fine antiques, you give forth a rare curiosity." In his sixty-fourth letter Paciandi enters into further strange details of Guerra, who, in the 18th century, had great success in creating and selling false antique paintings. "Guerra," said he, "made every day pictures of various sizes, according to the taste of the purchasers; every one knew it. But he maintained firmly that they had been found outside Rome, in ruins of which he alone had the knowledge."

The English and the Germans were victims to their credulity, the Germans especially. This is the simple and entire truth, which proves how little credence we should give to the representations of pictures been sold as ancient, some of those they tell us have been found in Herculaneum, some in Pompeii, and others in the environs of Rome. The Jesuit's Museums in Rome are thus filled, they are sold for such, and no one doubts them in any other light."

In a very witty and a very true article published in 1836, by Méry (Constitutionnel) these counterfeits, in which still continued, were well unmasked. "T at Rome," said he, "in the private workshops of the in which the workmen form arms broken at the elbow of gods, feet of satyrs, and trunks that belong to nobles invent there a liquor which, spread over the marble, gives antique color and appearance. There are also, in the shepherds who lead their flocks to graze in the neighbourhood of ruins, and who wait on strangers; they tell them of the wonders they find every day by digging several feet of ground. The English are the most easily deceived victims to their own credulity; they give money to the herds who are appointed to exhibit those artificial ruins; they are always aware where they should dig. They feign to exhaust themselves in fruitless efforts, and after length discover the precious vein, and are paid by the strangers. The English are laden with antiquities are but six months old. The amateurs of numismatics (lovers of ancient medals) never go to Rome empty; they expend money daily without fear of deception, of the of Cæsars, Adrians, Titus, Heliogabalus, and of others; all of which have been filed or scraped with sand and afterwards corroded to make them look old."

In the Historia Belli Sacri, which he has inserted in the seum Italicum, Mabillon does not hesitate to republish the following gross error—"Tancred entering into the temple of Jerusalem found on a throne a silver statue of Mahomet, so weighty that ten men could hardly lift it, and likewise five hundred pounds of silver for the use of the statue." "Was there any silly or gross ignorance?" said the Abbé of Longueville, who shewed it one day to Père Montfaucon, who begged of him to let it be printed, that I would ruin Mabillon."

It is strange that the same fatuity which causes errors of the antiquarians in the study of pagan antiquities and of the middle-age, has been spread over all representations of historical events. Winkelmann, in his History of Art, insists on these errors, and cites numerous examples. Grecian artists have re-produced sacred and antique subjects and rarely those of a cotemporary nature.

We see a great number of statues and pictures representing personages of the Old Testament, but the names have ed by time; nevertheless they are put there, and it is difficult to recognise them. Hence it has happened since Benedictines, Montfaucon and Mabillon, that Bathsheba, Deborah, and even others who were not queens, Judith, Rachel, Sarah, have been named St. Clotilde, Ulthe, Bertha, Queen Pédaque or Blanche of Castille. A sheba, one of Corbeils, has been transformed into a Saint lde, and a Solomon into Clovis, we see both under those titles in the Historical Museum of the Palace at Versailles.

Clovis, however, is crowned with a glory, though we he has not been canonized. At the Church of St. ues, in Liège, twenty-four personages from the Old Testament adorn the arch of the arcade in the grand nave. As they in the interior, and Saint Jacques being always sufficiently cted, the names inscribed over the heads are still readable. is very fortunate, as they might otherwise be taken for the es and princesses of Liège, as otherwise they would have mistaken for Kings and Queens of France. We read thus clearly:—

David, filius Isai, rex et propheta; Josias, rex Juda, Amon, regis; Barach, Israelitarum dux: Gedeon, formus dux Israel; Job, orientalis vir timens Deum; Thovir justus ex tribu Ne (Nephtali,) Mardocheus, patruus er; Judas Machoebus, Mathathia filius, &c. &c." And ngst the women. "Debora, Hebraea, prophetissa; Judith, a Israelitici liberatrix populi; Suzanna, uxor Joachim; era, regina, filia Abiabil, &c. &c. &c."

he Kings and Queens of France have figured as Donors, and ne number of one, two, three, and sometimes more, have on the gates of our churches; but never as perfect as one d desire, either at Paris, Amiens, Saint Denis, or at Rheims. en Charlemagne, Clovis, Philip Augustus, or Saint Louis, painted or sculptured, as we still see them in the Cathes of Paris, of Chartres, and of Rheims, they are not repreed as Donors: Charlemagne and Louis are made saints, is being baptized by Saint Remi, David consecrated by uel, whilst Charlemagne is bestowing precious relics of Virgin to several of the Cathedrals. But these Kings are er represented there in their positions as Kings of France; do not see the line of succession continued. One would take the Kings of France for the Kings of Judah, ancestors Jesus Christ. We would insist on this point, because we consider it a very grave error in Christian iconography, one which is still deeply rooted. It is thus that, in this system, renewed from the Benedictines, M. Debrun of the Church of Saint Denis, has had engraven, on a derole containing six kings, against the partition of the eastern front gate, the following inscription:—

“Hugo Capet; septimus, rex.”

On his own authority, and without reason, the artist has unchristened the Kings of Judah in order to transform them into Kings of France, and changes David into Hugh, Solomon into Robert, and so on with others.

In the Cathedral of Mans, a statue of the thirteenth century has been for a long period taken for a statue of Solomon; we consequently see on a scroll which he holds in his right hand the letters S. A. L., of which they make Sanctus Agnus Dei. The scroll was cleaned, and on it was then decyphered the word Solomon.

During some years one might read in all the Journals that there had been found at Hainnecourt (Somme), a circular stone in a circular form eight squares long; and a stone in the possession of one of the proprietors of the soil, four squares long, bore the following inscription —

“Balbuska—Parliaski, mort 743 !”

“They bring strangers who visit the museum at Versailles,” says M. Mérimée, “before a group perfectly preserved, representing two children; one holds a bird, the other seeks to catch it from him, and is biting his arm for the purpose of making him let it go. On the trunks of adjoining trees are a serpent and a lizard. You behold in this group an allegory of a moral character; the good and evil gemus, or the struggle between good and ill. You are to suppose in this group that the little bird has been surprised (or entrapped,) that the serpent is an evil spirit and the lizard good.* We saw this group in the Church d’Avon, near Fontainebleau, a tomb stone of the fourteenth century, of which the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, the local historians and travellers, are firm in the belief, and still persist in maintaining that it is a royal tomb of Philippe le Bel, or at least of his heart, though his heart has been, on good authority, borne to St. Denis, and has been discovered at Poissy. The heart of his wife Jeanne de Navarre, has been found there.”

---

* See “Voyage Dans la Midi de la France.”

his opinion, refuted by M. Le Prévost, could not offer any position to the savant who made the inscription, though he had the stone in question to be the tomb of one of the principal officers in attendance on the King and Queen. The words Henri notre sire le roi et reu Madame Jehanne, having been read thus, "heart of our sire the King, heart of Madame Jeanne, his wife."*

The Venius, author of the Theatre of Human Life, drew his facts from Horace; at these words raro ante cedentem scem deseruit pede pœna clauda, he represented pain (or trouble) with a wooden leg!!!

In a Dutch Bible, at the verse, you do not see the beam in your own eye, the artist has represented an enormous beam getting into a man's eye prostrates him to the earth!

A modern painter having to paint in a church the Litany of the Virgin, coming to these words, mater purissima, painted every proper Mother taking her Divine Infant to a bath. As for the number of anachronisms in costume, they are innumerable; we will cite but two, or we would be obliged to go forward all the paintings and sculptures of the middle age. In the pictures painted at Rheims, Jesus is brought before Pilate by archers clothed in coats of mail.

Pilate is at the same time dressed in the costume of a gentleman of the fifteenth century. In another scene King Rod is under an ogival dais, and the Queen dressed as a lady of the reign of Charles the Seventh. On the top of her enormous sugar-loaf bonnet, is the royal crown.

The same anachronism is to be seen in the tapestry, the representing our Lord: the Roman army are composed of cavaliers; armed at all points; the city of Jerusalem is built as a city of the middle age, and the inhabitants as those of Rhemes or Paris in the fifteenth century.

In the picture of Judith, Holofernes is in bed clothed in the complete armour of a cavalier, and behind his tent is a great cannon ready for explosion, whilst the soldiers are discharging their firelocks on the besieged Bethulia.

Paolo Vicelli, painted the four elements, representing them by symbolical animals. With the earth he placed a mole; with the water, a fish; with the fire, the salamander; with the air, added Vasari, the chameleon, who takes so many hues; but as our good Paolè had never seen a chameleon, deceived by the name, he made an enormous camel, opening his mouth, and swallowing the air.

* "Bulletin Archæologique," 2,549.

The famous Spanish painter, Zurbaran, who scarcely quitted Seville, and who only went to Madrid to die, but went to paint eight grand pictures of Saint Jerome in the church of a country town Guadeloupe, between Toledo and Cacerés. We are told in a biographical notice, that he had been painting those pictures at the island Guadeloupe.

Amongst the errors relative to archæology, the most spread and that most to be lamented, was the error that had become barren in artists of genius or talent in the last century. Nay more, that during several reigns the French were obliged to have recourse to the genius and talent of foreign artists, to whom they owe all the chefs-d'œuvre revived in the last epoch and transmitted to us. This error has been revived in the present period and is still in vogue, and we would wish to draw on this question less publicity than it has received; we will allude to it here, but we could not quote archæology without mentioning one that aims so unjust and gravely at the national honor of France.

The ERRATA was unknown before the discovery of the original. In fact, nothing was easier than to correct in manuscripts the faults that had crept into them. When the copier (or scribe) perceived an error he effaced it with a sponge, when the ink was dry; but when this means could not be used, he erased the defective word or words, placing a mark over the effaced letters. This mode of correction presents no other difficulty. Besides, once the copy of a work was made, it was reviewed, or should be, by a reader (or reviewer) before proofs from the printer. In the middle ages the most learned persons, like the literati of old, did not disdain to review their own works (or manuscripts). The Benedictines reviewed a manuscript of the ten first conferences of Cassanese. It had been reviewed, in part, by the celebrated Langfrancus, who latter had marked the passage where he stopped by the words Huc usque ego Lanfrancus correxi.

There was no fault for which writings were reviewed, which was not easily corrected, and thus the manuscripts in time attain a high degree of accuracy. We see below the following passage of Aulus Gellius that the booksellers were proud of the accuracy of their works:—"Being one day at a library, in the quarter de Sigillaires with Julius for sale a copy of the annals of Fabius Pictor, valuable for its antiquity, and the purity of its style. The bookseller maintained that a single fault could not be found in it. A distinguished grammarian coming in with a purchaser to examine books, said he had discovered an error in it; the bookseller's part was ready to bet anything he wished that one single correct letter was not in his copy. The bookseller was right."

The first books printed had no errata; they contented themselves with correcting the faults with their pen in each

But they were soon obliged to relinquish that means, the publication was printed so carelessly, and the recent corrections were so apparent, that the copies were completely spoiled. It was in order to remedy this inconvenience that they combined the faults and corrections, and placed them as an appendix at the end of the volume under the title of errata. The most ancient errata that I have found in the books of the sixteenth century," said Chevillier, "were those in Juvenal, with the edition of M<sup>r</sup> Méru, printed in folio by Gabriel Pierre, in Venice, in the year 1478; they were in two pages, and he excused the printing in these terms: "Lector, ne te offendant errata operariorum indiligentia fecit, neque enim omnibus hores corrigentes esse possumus. Recognito volumine ea corrigere nituit."

Michael Fernus, having published at Rome, in 1495, the manuscript of Anthony Campanus, Bishop of Teramo, and having perceived the innumerable faults, which, notwithstanding all his care, had crept into this edition, thus entitled the errata of four pages, Vis ex stulto demens, idemque ex mente insanus fieri? Libros Romæ primus imprime. Corruptorum recognito.

Cardinal Bellarmine, seeing that they printed his controversies most defectively, copied a manuscript in the most perfect style and sent it to a printer in Venice, in order to obtain a correct edition, but his precautions were unavailing, and he was obliged to publish a book in which he criticised all the errors that had crept into this edition. The errata alone occupied eighty-eight pages. The author complains in the preface that there are more than forty passages in the printing where yes is substituted for no, and for yes.

The Dominican, F. Garcia, got printed in 1578, in quarto, a list of the errors which had crept into a copy of a treatise of St. Thomas, which filled eleven pages. The religion and its Science by Leigh, printed in 1656, has of two pages in folio. A work levelled at the Romantics, and printed in 1562, comprising 172 octavo, had an errata of fifteen pages. The persons who the errata excused themselves by relating themselves employed by the devil to obstruct the good which was likely to produce. "This cursed Satan," said "whilst we printing this work, exercised all his contrived to sully it with innumerable faults (for many were perfectly unintelligible, and others were made to matters totally different from what was intended) obstructed these readings intended for pious souls, filling them with such ennui, as to prevent their finishing the book with the strongest feeling of disgust. Before the work returned from the printers, the same Satan took means of casting it into the shade, and so sullied the mire into which it was flung, that the writing was entirely effaced on a great number of the leaves, and destroyed them. What is more, the book was so in the leaves could not be opened without separating from another. Thus, in order to remedy these faults Satan, the work had to be reviewed after printing faults pointed out notwithstanding their number."

Aldus, in the petition which he addressed to the X., said, that he regretted so deeply the innumerable he discovered in his editions, that, if he were able, he repurchase each at the price of a golden crown.

Henry Steven, having printed in some places febris, thus excuses himself in an errata: The calendar has made a long fever (fabrem), though a short fever, more dangerous.

The errata of the Commentaries of Stephen Dole in Latin language points out but eight faults, though it has been published in two folio volumes.

If we could believe the Scaligeriana, the treatise of Subtilitate, printed by Vascosan, 1557, in 4to. was and the errata on the treatise of Budæus, De Assu, the same typographer, marked out but three errors.

"The Spaniards," said Chevillier, "had long since for the correction of books, by which means they do make the printers more vigilant and commit fewer faults."

permitted the sale of a book, they sent it to a censor who corrected the manuscript, and marked all the faults on the margin; he put, in the first leaf, the errata he had made, and he wrote at the top, that excepting the faults he marked out the book was faithfully printed. He wrote, Féde erratas: or, Este libro bien impresso correcto conforme á su original de mano. Madrid, 31 mayo 1577, Juan Vasquez de Marmol. It is also on the Antiquities of Spain by Ambrose Morales, printed in Spanish, in folio, at Alcalá, in the year 1577." We find an attestation of this style in some French editions, among others in the dialogue of Ulric Hutten, Paris, 1577, in 4to.; in some others are found the names of the correctors.

During the first half of the seventeenth century, the works printed at Paris were so incorrect that the orders given to the printers in 1649, contained very lively complaints on this subject. "So few good books, are printed at Paris," said the king, "and those that are printed appear to be evidently so grossly got up, both as regards the bad paper they use, and the few corrections made in them, that we must pronounce it a disgrace, and consider it a serious loss to the State. And moreover, such of our subjects as are desirous of embracing the study of literature, feel no slight inconvenience in being obliged to seek out the old impressions at very considerable expense." One of the most singular errors in printing which has ever been committed is that of which Flavigny, professor of Hebrew in the college of France, was victim. In a letter published in 1688, against the Arabic and Syriac text in the book of Ruth, printed by Abraham Echellensis, in the Polyglot Bible of Paris, he had cited the following passages from St. Matthew: "Quid vides festucam in oculo fratris tui, et trabem in oculo tuo, et trabem in oculo tuo non vides? Ejice primum trabem de oculo tuo, et tunc videbis ejicere festucam de oculo fratris tui." He thus reproached Echellensis for having severely censured the errors in the other books of this Bible, whilst he passed over a very great number in the book of Ruth. Unfortunately for Flavigny, after the last correction of the proofs, whether through malice or simple unskillfulness of the printer or of his assistants, the word oculo was everywhere replaced by culo, which caused Flavigny to say: Thou canst see the mote (or chaff) in thy brother's back, though thou canst not see the beam which is in thy own back (or behind thee).

To judge of the scandal produced by this p Flavigny's so utterly falsified would be impossible. He accused him of impiety and sacrilege; he shewed the of the copy, where the error was not to be found, but to exculpate himself, he was obliged to declare his publicly by an oath. But nothing could soften his ment against the printer who had drawn him into this unfortunate affair. "I remember," relates Chevillier, "said M. de Flavigny, some time previous to his death, that he quarrelled; his anger was not in the slightest degree abated; he still entertained an unkind feeling towards the printer, nearly thirty years had elapsed since the publication of the letter."

Erasmus was censured by the Faculty of Theology at Paris for an unfortunate error in printing (amore singulari) which had crept into his paraphrase of the tenth chapter of St. Matthew.

If what has been related is true, there was another error in the printing of one of the most charming of Malherbe's pieces, his celebrated piece to Du Perrier, where the daughter, Rosette, he had placed at first:

"Et Rosette a vécu ce que vivent les roses."

But the printer, decyphering the manuscript for Roselle instead of Rosette. Malherbe, in reading it aloud, was struck by this change, and modified his poem in the following manner which softened it very much:

"Et rose elle a vécu ce que vivent les roses, &c."

Nothing was more faulty than certain editions of the Bible, a book that has been re-printed so very frequently in various languages.* Pope Sixtus V. had published in 1592 an edition of the Vulgate. He had himself carefully examined the correction of each proof, and had placed at the end of the work a Bull by which he excommunicated any one who should venture on himself to alter the text. This Bull amused the world exceedingly, for the Bible was discovered to be full of errors. So much so, that the pope was obliged to suppress it. The copies that escaped destruction were purchased by the

---

* It has been calculated that during an interval of eighty years, from 1715, to 1795, there had been printed in Germany, 1,670,863,890 New Testaments.

ate. According to the Manuel du Libraire, a large paper was sold for 1,210 francs at the sale of Camus de Limare.* English, for whom at all times the Bible had been a great of trade, allowed most strange errors in printing it.

1684, a Bible printed at London contained: the fool d in his heart, there is a God, Psalm xiv. the word no been omitted. This edition was suppressed by order king.

Another Bible had: The Lord gave her corruption, in f conception (Ruth, iv. 13).

editions of Field, printed for the University of Cambridge 17th century, are full of faults; it has been said that he d a present of £1,500 sterling from the Independents for g in the Acts of the Apostles (vi. 3,) ye instead of we, thus g to emanate from the people and not from the apostles ght to choose pastors.

the same Bible, we find (Cor. i. 9): Know ye not that rightheous shall inherit the kingdom of God?

the printing house at Halle established by Ch. Hilde- baron de Constein, the thirty-fourth edition of the Bible ) contained this strange commandment: Thou shalt com- mullery. The edition was confiscated, and the copies sell dear at the present day.

1717 they printed in England, at the Clarendon printing a Bible known under the name of the Vinegar Bible, in quence of the title page of the twentieth chapter of St. in which the parable of the vineyard is called the parable egar.

is related that the wife of a printer in Germany, concealing f one night in her husband's workshop whilst he was ing a Bible, altered the sentence of a conjugal submission ounced against Eve in the sixteenth verse, third chapter of sis. She erased the two first letters of the word herr ter) and substituted for them the letters na, which com- y changed the commandment, he will be thy master (herr) appeared thus: he will be thy fool (narr). It is said that pleasantry cost the poor woman her life, and that some es of this Bible are now sold at an exorbitant price.

---

It was entitled: Biblia latina vulgatæ editionis, a Sixto V. recognita probata. Romæ ex typographia apostolica Vaticana, 1590, 3 part, vol. in fol.

"Beside the ordinary faults which slipped into the said Menage,* "there were several others left there in order to have occasion to put in the errata those which were not permitted in the body of the work. In the first instance, where they had the inquisition, in Roman they were forbid to employ the word fatum or fata. An author wishing to make use of the latter, betook himself to this subterfuge. He had facta printed in his book, and in the errata he put, facta, read fata. M. Scarron thought this thing, or nearly. He had composed some verses, of which he placed a dedication with these words: to my sister's bitch. Some time afterwards, having finished his sister, and having his poems collected and ready to print, he maliciously put in the errata of his book: instead of bitch, read my bitch of a sister."†

Ballesdens, a friend of Chancellor Séguier, Tallament des Réaux, said: "If I ever printed let there be a thousand flatteries for the Chancellor. I will place an errata at the end: In such a page where is not true—in such another, that is untrue, and so of the remainder."

We know the errata Benserades has put at the end of his Ovid, they are rondeaus like the rest of his works.

"Pour moi, parmi des fautes innombrables
Je n'en connais que deux considérables
Et donc je fais ma déclaration,
C'est l'entreprise et l'exécution;
A mon avis fautes irréparables
Dans ce volume.

For me, among its innumerable faults,
I know, but of two that are considerable
And of this I make my declaration,—
They are, the undertaking and the execution
In my opinion irreparable faults
In this volume."

---

* "If you wish to have no errors in the works you give to the press, never give well written copy; for then they will give you apprentices, who will commit a thousand faults, where you read, the masters would take charge of it themselves."

† This jest of Scarron is not found in all the editions of his works, others in those of Paris, 1719, in 8vo.

that Chevillier said of some printers of his time, could be well applied to certain typographers of our own. "Some of our century" (the seventeenth) said he, "have discovered a very easy way, by which they assume to get out of matter without much ceremony. They suppress the altogether, or if they print one, we find in it but very faults. By this device they conceal the corruption of their work, which if they appeared in public would cover them with shame and confusion, and they also save their purse, for obliged to print this errata, it would be so long that the sale would be increased considerably, besides they would have no one to purchase their miserable editions.

Mascosan thought himself obliged to ask pardon of the reader for not having put an errata to his Greek edition of Thomas Maresfield, Orbiculus, &c., published in 8vo. in the year 1532. He says that paper had failed him. "A book with few corrections," says Chevillier, "is a work full of darkness. It is like night when we cannot walk without fear. Correction is the light with which we walk securely. The greatest enemies to printing are faults. Its danger is greater, as it re-kindles from its own light. It is often thought more considerable when not read. A printer should regard himself as a Hercules who always combats monsters to combat."

The Middle Ages were fruitful in poems, romances and allegorical works; the most celebrated of the latter is The Romance of the Rose, a poem comprising twenty thousand lines, commenced by Guillaume de Lorris, who died about 1260, continued or rather completed forty years later by Jean de Meung. The following is a summary of this poem.

The author supposes that he has been sleeping one day in the month of Spring; he dreams that he is walking in a meadow the midst of which he sees a beautiful garden encompassed by high walls; the door was opened for him by Sloth, and he perceived Pleasure, the Master of the Garden, dancing with Delight and Sport who formed his court. He was in the act of plucking a half-blown Rose from a Rose tree placed in the midst of the garden, when Love, who lay in ambush, suddenly sundry darts at him, and forced him to yield as prisoner. Love then instructed him in the arts it was necessary he should employ in order to gain the favor of ladies, and the morning after rejecting the counsels of Danger and Reason, finished by plucking the Rose, the object of his desires.

The meaning of this allegory must be very a we find this poem has been interpreted in different ways. There are some, as Marot, who plain it thus, "The Rose is justly coveted by love in consequence of the wisdom which it imparts." Others the state of Grace, or the Glorious Virgin Mary, of eternal beatitude. The Alchymists believed it influenced the greatest designs.

The success of the allegory was immense, notwithstanding reiterated attacks of preachers, and in particular of J to the end of the sixteenth century it had numerous followers. "Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meung," says Voltaire, "whom some compared to Dante the Italian poet, I would willingly put them in competition with all the poets of Italy." In this joint composition we find great imagination, innumerable satires, and a style lively and agreeable. The best edition of The Romance of the Rose Marot had remodelled and disfigured in 1526, was published by Méon in 1814, four volumes in octavo.

We next give the abridgement of another allegory, The Dream of Hell, by Raoul de Houdan, which is thus:—

In dreams are to be found fables.—I dreamed that I became a pilgrim, and desirous to behold the yet unexplored I determined on a voyage to Hell. I arrived first at the city of Covetousness where he beheld Avarice and Plunder. Avarice demanded an account of his subjects; he replied that the wealthy had driven away the poor, a quality, of which they only knew the name. Plunder interrogated him regarding his subjects, and learned from him that the kingdom he had established at Poitou was in a flourishing condition, and, as he had proposed, was about to make war against the Poitevins.

Further on he encountered the habitation of Shame and was closely questioned concerning certain citizens of Chartres who had the secret of being always faithful to the king. The poet passed on and he found Yvresse where he found a young man who was of English birth. This young man is so brave that he could overthrow the strongest. De la Rive arrived at the mansion of Fornication, and finally at the gate which is guarded by Murder, Despair and Sudden Death. He is surprised on entering to find the tables full: the a custom not usual in France, said he, where the doors closed during our repasts, and none admitted save invited this day the King of Hell held his Court and reviewed objects. Amongst the number were several Clergymen, bishops and Abbés; he made all be seated at his table, to he also invited the traveller. As the pilgrim remained at eating, Belzebub asked him the cause, and interrohim on the motives of his journey. Towards the end repart the Monarch had his large black book brought in which he had written all sins past and future; he it in the traveller's hands, who opened it, and lighted the chapter on Ménétriers, he found there the lives of I committed it to memory, said he, and could tell you strange anecdotes; but at this moment the Pilgrim

, and the story concluded with the dream.*

ere appeared at Paris in 1660, in octavo, a very lively from the Jansenists, entitled, The History of the Country
Asénie, or a treatise on the singularities to be found in manners of the inhabitants. The author, Zachary, is con-under the name of Louis Fontaine, Master of Saint the most celebrated of all these allegorical countries is the ry of Tenderness, composed by Mademoiselle de Scudéry, following description of which is given in the first volume lie. It is the master Célère who explains it to the ess des Léontius thus:— the first city, situated at the bottom of the map, is Attachment. As this affection is produceable by three ent causes, either by Great Esteem, Gratitude, or by ation, they have established there, three towns of ness, situated on three rivers, bearing three names, and achable by three different routes. As you would say e on the Ionian Sea, Cumæ on the Tyrian Sea, they say Affection on Inclination, Affection on Esteem, and Affec- on Gratitude. However, as Clélia has pre-supposed Tenderness springing from Inclination wanted nothing like it perfect, she has placed no village on the banks of

---

Fabliaux ou Contes du Douzième et du Treizième Siècle." Par d'Aussy, 1781, in 18, tome II, p. 175 et suiv.

this river, which flows on so rapidly that it makes it arrive at the haven of True Attachment. But Affection on Esteem is not no easy, consequently placed ingeniously several little villages on the serious and simple matters are combined so as to the growth of this feeling. Thus you perceive that to High Mind, because that is generally whence Esteem commences. You then behold the little villages of Pretty Poetry, Sprightly No Letters, which operate most frequently on the beginning of Affection. Then, in order to make progress on this route, you encounter Sincerity, Probity, Generosity, Respect, Assiduity and Goodness unite in the approach to Affection. We must not forget that a certain route is necessary for Affection or Gratitude to take to arrive at True Attachment. Behold then, I perceive its first approach must be through Complaisance, a little village called Submission, which bounds a pleasing one, named Small Attentions. Thence Assiduity to another village called Ardour, then Devotedness; and to digress, I must premise that the less frequented than other ways, and the village of Modesty. Afterwards, it was necessary to pass Sensibility and Gratitude. And to arrive at last at the goal, Constancy must be the mainspring by which Gratitude can approach True Affection.

But as there is no road by which we may not go, Clélie has so arranged, that if those desiring to attain Attachment take a step a little more to the right, or more to the left, they will decidedly wander. If on parting with High Mind you diverge to go to the right, you fall thence to Irregularity, and so on to Neatness, Levity, and Forgetfulness; therefore, instead of finding themselves at True Attachment, they will be discovered in the Lake of Indifference, which from its tranquil waters is emblematic of the name it bears. On the other hand, if they take a trifling step to the left, they go on to the thence to Perfidy, to Pride, to Slander, and on to Enmity, and instead of finding themselves at True Attachment they discover, when too late, that they have embarked on a Sea of Enmity where all vessels are shipwrecked. The Sea of Enmity casts itself into a sea, called The Dangerous Sea.

are what we call the Unknown Lands, because, in fact, we do not know where they are."

This piquant description had scarcely made its appearance when all the beaux esprits expressed their admiration of the poetess, and the gallant bishop of Venice, Godeau, sent her verses of which the following is a translation:—

At last I have seen the admirable Clélie,
And this map, so beautiful,
So fine, so gallant, and so full of mind,
That love, the tyrant of all hearts, is by the heart taught,
And his Mother has there found
An effort of mind so novel,
That by her Son, his bow and his torch,
By the Graces, Play and Laughter, she has sworn,
That since his torch enlivened nature,
She has beheld nothing so fine. . . . .
For me, who am bound for the mild Country of Affection, Sappho, with her divine pencil,
In her map has taught me
The intricate windings of the road
By which I should reach the Unknown Land,
Which we behold in the clouds :
We there see a noble city
Of unparalleled beauty,
Or rather some vast empire
Over which Sappho has been reported queen ;
There she is tended by Affection
Which she will one day return,
We will then behold this princess Reigning over Mind, Goodness, and Wisdom.

Shortly after the composition of the Country of Tenderness, the Abbe D'Aubignac produced A History of the Time, or a Narrative of the Kingdom of Coquetry, 1659, in duodecimo. This little allegorical work embroiled the Abbe D'Aubignac with Mademoiselle de Scudéry, who assumed it to be an imitation of the Map of Affection. The Abbe D'Aubignac, whose work was really anterior to that of Mademoiselle, considered himself obliged to reply by an apology. "What say," said he, "between these two works to suppose them to be of each other? In the Map of Tenderness, we see four cities, three rivers, two seas, a lake, and thirty I on the different routes by which you can approach near one to the other, that the travellers have not to be weary. In The Kingdom of Coquetry rivers, there is no sea mentioned, save one there is but one great city, and the road has places. It is a country where you cannot arrive must take a long journey before you reach the little map we find nothing in the slightest degree with the office of cajolery, the tourney of the gilt combat of fine petticoats, the Court of Rewards, the of Coquettes and the chapel of Holy Repentance a little corner of the world, in the country of without any other description than that of pl Kingdom of Coquetry is of vast extent, composed could render a state considerable, ruled by all the politics. These people have their king, their r laws, and their different orders."

Of all the numberless allegorical works which political object, we will limit ourselves to the Sir Thomas More's Utopia, and we only quote to mind the belief which Budæus had in the existence of a country, when he proposed seriously to send there.

"Our mind," said Montaigne, "is like an erratic dangerous and indiscreet, in which it is difficult and circumspection. It is a violent weapon even hands, unless when ardor and prudence are combined."

If we could for a moment doubt the wisdom of a glance over the next portion of this paper would convince the most sceptical of the truth of this which we have endeavoured to give a few specimens of extravagant imaginations emanating from the human mind.

We will begin from the beginning, that is to exposition of some ideas formed on the creation of the world.

In the first point, what happened before the creation of the world? The Rabbins, whom we have had more than once occasion to mention, pretended that God, in order to beguile the time before the creation of the universe, occupied himself with the creation of several worlds, each of which he destroyed immediately after its creation. It was only after sundry attempts that he succeeded in creating one as perfect as ours.

in the seventeenth century, a mystical author wrote on the emanation of God before the Creation; this treatise was printed for the first time in La Revue Rétrospective, (June, 1834). The following are some sentences of this composition, which for the most part, incomprehensible:—

If we ask what God made before the creation of the world could speak impertinently, and even childishly, not knowing what we ask. It is certain that the Eternal God who created the Universe by his word, could have enjoyed that solitude without forming creatures, for he lived and reigned from Eternity, happy and content in the Paradise of his own creation and in his own Divine essence.

God did not rest idly before the creation of the world. He contemplated His only Son, not made, nor created, but emanated from all Eternity by His Divine power and will; by His Eternal Word, he contemplated the archetype and the model of worlds, the angels, the soul of all creation. In order, therefore, to conclude this treatise we must infer that God was previous to the creation of our world had formed nothing."

One of the most original ideas extant on the subject is that stated by Benjamin Constant, in a letter recently published for the first time. "This idea," said he, "originated with a Piedmontese, the Chevalier de Revel, who officiated at The Hague as envoy from Sardinia. He maintained that God, our Creator and Author of all things, died before completing his work; that he had the noblest designs, and the most unlimited power for their execution, that he had already commenced to employ one of those means, as erecting scaffolding for the edifice, when he died in the midst of his labors, and found himself all at once removed from the object which for him no more existed; and as for us, we feel ourselves destined to perform a part of which we can form no correct idea; we are like watches with no hand to point the dial, whereof the wheels, as if indowed with intelligence, will turn to all purpose, without consciousness of the motives, saying to itself: Since I revolve, I have consequently an aim." This idea appears to us the most absurd and the deepest extravagance, we have yet heard, and is more singular than the Mahometan, Christian, or Philosophical theories of the centuries of any era.

Certain minds advance strange problems on the Creation which they boldly defend. Chevreau, in his Histoire du Monde, (1886, 2 vols in quarto), relates that, according to some, the World was Created in Spring, and others date it the sixth of September, when they aver that on Friday period mentioned, about four hours after dinner was accomplished. Another, whose name we regret forgotten, discovered the date to be the twelfth of December.

A learned Italian of the eighteenth century, Baiardi, in a discourse with the Abbé Barthélemy, that he occupied himself in abridging a universal history, where, as a prelude to the solution of one of the most difficult problems of astronomy or history, he arranged the period when God had placed the sun on the formation of the world. "I chanced to discern this point," says Barthélemy, "and I refer it to me on the globe."

We come now to the Creation.

Let us see according to the Talmudists, how many hours were employed on the day of Adam's creation.

At the first hour, God kneaded the dust out of which to form the embryo.

At the second, Adam was able to stand.

At the fourth hour, God called him, and told him of the animals as they were to be designated for all future use.

At the seventh hour, the marriage between Adam and Eve was consummated, God having himself conducted the bride to her future spouse with a delicate and coquettish attendance.

At the tenth hour, Adam fell.

At the eleventh hour, he was judged and condemned to leave Paradise.

At the twelfth hour, commenced for him the labour of the day to perform midst fatigue and hardship, as a penalty for his disobedience.

We are not aware that all languages can furnish us with the same words; we will content ourselves for the present with mentioning three of them, the first in Latin, the second in Greek, and the third in the Greek tongue. All three present a sufficiently remarkable coincidence.

For instance, the Latin word AMORE, (ablative of the substantive AMOR which signifies love,* friendship) if you

---

* The Ancients were in the habit of describing the five degrees of love, which love commonly passed from its birth till the accomplishment of its happiness, which had better perhaps be called its tomb. The five degrees are: 1° Visus, 2° Colloquium, 3° Tactus, 4° Connubium, 5° Amor.

ccessively one letter from the left, will give four different words expressing all the characters of a true attachment :

A M O R E
M O R E
O R E
R E

In effect, love, friendship, attachment is thus proved :

1°. AMORE, by unity of sentiment or thought.

2°. MORE, by conformity of manner, the pleasure of being together.

3°. ORE, by protestations of attachment, agreeable conversation.

4°. RE, by the effects, that is to say by the services they actually render :—

The French word SAVOIR, analysed in the same manner as the foregoing, implies the characteristics of ambition in its sires :—

S A V O I R
A V O I R
V O I R
O I R
O R

Is it not acknowledged that the ambitious all desire SAVOIR, all AVOIR, all VOIR, all OIR, (an old French word signifying to hear) and to possess riches which is expressed by OR.

The third word, borrowed from the Greek, is NAPOLEON; de Roquefort has furnished us with it in his Dictionnaire Etymologique de la Langue Française. Paris, 1829, 2 vol. in 8vo. tom. 11, page 121.

A drawer of horoscopes, said he had made the following calculation on the word NAPOLEON. This name is composed of two Greek words which signify Lion of the Desert.* This same word, ingeniously combined, presents a phrase offering a strange analogy to the character of this extraordinary man :—

* We have found, in a journal of the 25th of June, 1838, an article which coincides with these words, the Lion of the desert : this article is thus expressed ; “ Bonaparte said that the desert had at all times for him particular attraction, that he had never traversed it without certain emotion. We can never behold its limits ; it has neither beginning nor end ; it is the type of boundlessness, an ocean on dry land. This spectacle was pleasing to his imagination, and it delighted him to have it said, Napoleon the Lion of the desert.”

1	...	...	...	N A P O L E O N
6	...	...	...	A P O L E O N
7	...	...	...	... P O L E O N
3	...	...	...	... O L E O N
4	...	...	...	... L E O N
5	...	...	...	... ... E O N
2	...	...	...	... ... O

In successively erasing the first letter of this word, and following in order the subsequent remaining words, the six Greek words, the literal translation of which, be the order of numbers expressed, is :—

“Napoleon, ὄν ο λεὸν λεὸν εὐν ἀπολεὸν πολεὸν σημαίνει, Napoleon was the lion of his people, he destroying cities.”

SIGLES.

We understand by sigles initial letters which, arranged in order, in connection with others, present a meaning which we can divine the words of which they are merely the initials. We will now give different examples of sigles which meaning very many are unacquainted.

THE CROSS OF ST. BENOIT, COMMONLY CALLED THE ST. BENOIT CROSS.

This cross was in shape like one of our crown pieces, in the circle where we have the usual inscription, containing the following:—IHS: VRS: NSMV: SMQ. In the centre, where we have the Royal Head, containing the following letters —

C	C	S
N D	S	M D
P	M	B
	L

composed altogether of initials, each expressing a word, is frequently a subject of embarrassment to the lovers of the curious, who try to divine the meaning attached to words so strangely disposed. The following is the reason why this species of medal is called the MAGICIAN.

persons who were led away by the representations of -minded and superstitious people, who in former ages uted to sorcery everything that was above their com--ension. The explanation we are now about to give of letters, will clearly prove how great the error was of at-tending to an evil spirit that to which it was so diametrically sed.

et us begin by the legend, that is to say by the letters in-d in the circular part of the cross—each group of letters ld be interpreted in the following manner.

IHS.—JESUS HOMINUM SALVATOR.

VR̄S.—VADE RETRÒ SATANA ;

NSMV.—NUNQUAM SUADEAS MIHI VANA ;

SMQL.—SUNT MALA QUÆ LIBAS ;

IVB.—IPSE VENENA BIBAS.*

o much for the legend ; let us now proceed to the cross, on ch the letters placed perpendicularly down the trunk pre-the following meaning.

CSSML.—CRUX SACRA SIS MIHI LUX.

These which are crosswise signify

̄NDSMD.—NUNQUAM DÆMON SIS MIHI DUX.

ally, the letters on the ground of the piece are thus expres-

CSPB.—CHRISTUS SIT PERPETUÒ BENEDICTUS !

Such is the interpretation of the letters composing the cross Saint Benoit, which, as has been made apparent, had no-ing either of sorcery or of witchcraft, or even of poetry in it,

* These two species of leonine verses, or rather the four last lines, e to be found in an old legend or superstitious record of the Devil's ridge at Sens, in the commencement of the XIII. Century. The evil having given wealth to an Architect named Guinefort, for the urchase of his soul, he went forth as one of the lights of the age.
However, this Guinefort, sometime after, was struck with remorse, nd begged pardon of God and his Saints. M. le Curé, of Sens, ouched by his repentance, put on his stole, and with holy water hased the Devil away and exorcised him by pronouncing these words, which he made the penitent repeat :—

Vade retrò Satana, nunquam suade mihi vana, Sunt mala quæ libas, ipse venena bibas.

though we have found in it the form of some very leonine verses.*

The three first letters of which we have written, rendered by JESUS HOMINUM SALVATOR; there is also explanation, but that makes the following monogram.

Thus we have explained the inscription borne on the imperial standard of Constantine, and which signifies IN HOC VINCES, "By this sign we conquer." But it is no mere Latin version that we have the true inscription labarum (or imperial standard), but in the miracle occurred under Constantine the year 311; this prince saw in the air a cross bearing these Greek words: EN TOYTO THAUMAZON, that is to say, thou shalt conquer by this sign.

OF THE WORD SALIGIA,

OR

SIGLES ON THE SEVEN CAPITAL SINS.

This word, invented in the XVI. century, is composed of the initials of the seven capital sins expressed in Latin, Antoine, Archbishop of Florence, has made these verses :

Ut tibi sit vita, semper SALIGIA vita.

Crespet, a religious at Paris, in his Jardin de la Récréation Spirituelle, Paris, 1602, in 8vo. says, p. 100, "seven devils are deputed to preside over each mortal."

In the following tableau we perceive that each letter of the word SALIGIA forms the initial of each capital sin; we see the presiding demons.

---

* This cross had been sketched and engraved, but without explanation, in the Epistola itineraria of Bruckman, Wolfenbutel, 1676, and 1756, 3 parts in 1 vol. in 4to, with many figures, of which this is very singular. Two other crosses, richer and more magnificently engraved there. See CENTURIA III. Epist. itin. 47. p. 548, tab. xvi., and tab. xv.

UPERBIA.....	L'orgueil, présidé par LIVIATHAM.
VARITIA.....	L'avarice, par MAMMON.
UXURIA.....	La luxure, par ASMODEE.
IRA.....	La colere, par ABEDEDON.
GULA.....	La Gourmandise par BEHEMOTH.
INVIDIA.....	L'envie, par SATHAN.
ACCIDIA.....	La paresse, par LUCIFER.

In an old book without date, entitled Articuli fidei, and edited by Michel Lenoir, we find the same seven mortal compared to the seven animals with whom they are opposed to bear an affinity, and afterwards the seven virtues which they are opposed. We give the representation copied according to the text, arranged consecutively in order to suit the word SALIGIA.

Quibus comparantur.		Quibus contrariantur.
UPERBIA.....leoni.	—	UPERBIA.....humilitati
VARITIA.....camelo.	—	VARITIA.....largitati.
UXURIA.....birco.	—	UXURIA.....castitati.
IRA.....lupo.	—	IRA.....patientie. (sic.)
GULA.....urso vel porco	—	GULA.....sobrietati.
INVIDIA.....cani.	—	INVIDIA.....pietati.
ACCIDIA.....asino.	—	ACCIDIA.....diligentie (sic).

We find also, in the old Livres d'Heures, printed about the beginning of the XVI. century, vignettes, seven in number, representing the combat between the virtues and vices under the form of women. Each virtue being armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a very fine horse, in order to be able to overthrow their opponents. The capital sins were also represented as women, each being mounted on the animal of which she is opposed to be emblematic. Thus in the Heures printed in 1518, in 8vo., we see the following legends inscribed in each vignette, over the heads of two women combating.

- 1° " HUMILITE TREBUCHÉ ORGUEIL, montée sur un lion.
- 2° " CHASTETE TREBUCHÉ PAILLARDISE (sic), montée sur un bouc.
- 3° " CHARITE TREBUCHÉ ENVYIE, montée sur un chien.
- 4° " PATIENSE (sic), TREBUCHÉ YRE (colère), montée sur un ours.
- 5° " DILIGENSE TREBUCHÉ PARESSE, montée sur un âne.
- 6° " LARGESSE TREBUCHÉ AVARICE, montée sur un singe.
- 7° " SOBRIETE TREBUCHÉ GLOUTONIE, montée sur un porc.

We here observe a difference both in the arrangements and the names of the animals. Here anger is on a bear instead of a wolf, and avarice on an ape being on a camel, as in the preceding tableau.

THE FIVE P'S.

All young persons anxious for marriage would have ample dowry if they had those five P's for their portion.

Sit Pia, sit Prudens, Pulchra, Pudica, Potens.

That is to say, if they were pious, prudent, beautiful and rich. Nothing more could be desired.

THE THREE O'S OF THEODORE DE BEZE.

These three O's signify Opus, Opes, Ops, labor, diligence. Théodore de Bèze had the good fortune to obtain them successively in the three wives he had during his life. He explains it thus himself:

"Tres mihi disparili sunt junctæ ætate puellæ ;

Hæc juveni, illa viro, tertia deindè seni.

Propter Opus validis prima est mihi ducta sub æge ;

Altera propter Opes, tertia propter Opem.

"I have had three wives at the different periods of my life, in the strength and prime of my manhood, in my old age. The first assisted me in my labors, brought me a fortune, and the third took diligent care of me in my later years."

The following is an ingenious acrostic made out of the initials of Mlle. Rachel. We allude to this acrostic as being of the same species as those which engage our attention in the preceding tableau, and is expressed in precious stones. It was thus arranged, that the celebrated actress was presented with a royal antique bracelet of all gold, and of the purest and most elegant design, with six fine stones. These stones were so disposed that the re-united initials formed not alone the name of the actress, but they also designed the names of the stones in which she most excelled; here is the little tableau:

RUBIS.....	FOXANE.
YMETHISTE.....	YMENAIDE.
CORNALINE ..	CAMILLE.
HEMATITE .....	HERMIONE.
EMERANDE.....	EMILIE.
TAPIS-LAZULI .....	TAODICE.

manner in which this royal bandeau was presented to the actress was so singular that it is also worthy of mention. Mlle. Rachel had sent to the warehouse of Chevetté, a carpenter of the Rhine, his house being noted for provisions and descriptions: the beautiful fish came, and on being opened, this magnificent bandeau was discovered, forming the shape of the fish. Gallantry so unlooked for was calculated to surprise and flatter the amiable actress much more than the coronet she had previously received from an unknown person; possibly it was the same person who sent both.

I have mentioned some very curious pieces of the same nature as the following. This piece has for its basis the name of JESUS MARIA, and is very old, its author, Master Esprit de Montluysant, being one of the boldest and most ingenious constructors of acrostics in an age where these nugæ were all the rage: this acrostic is taken from one of his, entitled L'Ordre sacré de la sainte prêtrise, mis en vers, Metz, Ch. Felix, 1683, in 4° of 28 pages. This little acrostic is thus arranged, with three straight lines forming the names:

Je m'étois endurci — mais le Dieu de merci —
 effaçait le péché dont j'étois entaché —
 Ici bien qu'ores je suis privé de mes ennuis —
 Vivant pour louer Dieu en toute place et lieu —
 Ici voulez ô chrestien jouir de divins biens —

Maintenez le renom de Jesus et son nom —
 Avec vous il servet vous exaucer —
 Repoussant Lucifer et tous ceux de l'enfer —
 Invoquons le ici — car d'un cœur adonc —
 Qui le servir le ciel il ouvrira —

M. Gobineau de Montluysant has written several works, amongst others, La royale Thémis ou l'établissement de la cour du Parlement de Metz, 1684, in 4°, a book in which the author, true to his vocation and the inspirations of his genius, has composed innumerable acrostics on the names of the lords belonging to that lax court.

But where M. de Montluysant has particularly distinguished himself, is in Le Sacré Mont Carmel, which he published in Metz in 1682, in 4° of 77 pages, and which he dedicated to

Anne Fabert, sister to Marshal Fabert. In this the unparalleled poetry, shedding over it an unwonted brilliancy "Mont Carmel," said the author, "is an OPAL of the finest quality, in which can be seen the WHITENESS of virginity, the BLUE of fidelity, the VERDANT GREEN of hope, the RED of charity, the YELLOW of spiritual content, and the violet of divine love."

It was said after that, that the pen of M. de Montluc had extracted all his brilliant coloring from the tinting of the rain-bow !

GASTRONOMIC TASTES OF CELEBRATED PERSONS.

We have often regretted to have seen a portion of general history so totally neglected. This branch is the predilection of certain great men for such and such food, which, frequently most common, formed a singular contrast to the high character and noble acts of many of those celebrated personages. It is to supply this void that we have collected and placed in chronological order, the gastronomic tastes of some of our great men, who, though not all eminent, have nevertheless some moderate claim to celebrity. Our list is not very long ; though we have commenced it with the Roman Empire, we have only in a manner glanced at the subject, because it is necessary to proportion the space we could give it in our paper.

AUGUSTUS, who died in the year 14 of J. C., gave the preference to brown bread, small fishes, cheese made of cow's milk, and fresh figs. He never drank more than three glasses at a repast.* We can perceive that he was simple in his taste and very sober.

APICIUS (Calpurnius), a celebrated Roman gastronome, whose * Pierre-André Canonier, in Latin (Canonhericus), a learned physician and juriconsult of Genoa, who died at Anvers, in the XVII century, contended, in his Treatise on the curiosities of his time, De admirandis vini virtutibus, livre III., Antwerp 1627, in 8°, that Augustus drank six cups at his repast ; but he was in error, (see, Sueton. Aug. Vita, paragraph 77) This Canonieri said, liv. II. of his Treatise, that the pleasures of the table, which he calls the food of the soul, are very cold without wine. Finally he avers that "the Romans generally drank ten cups at a supper ; that Scipio and Charlemagne never took more than three. The Cardinal of Trent," added he, "was a little more brave than he has become a proverb, and who has written on good er (De arte coquinariâ), had a passion for lobsters, above for those of Minturnes, which were reckoned the finest. Having heard that they had the largest and most delicate on African coast, he immediately chartered a ship and set out to assure himself of the truth of the matter. Arrived towards the end of his voyage, he met a fishing boat, and asked them for some lobsters, above all things the finest of the species; finding they had nothing better than those of Minturnes, he instantly commanded the pilot to tack about and return to Minturnes, where he continued to regale himself on the lobsters at that side of the country.

This Apicius was very rich; after having dissipated more for a table than he ought, a hundred millions of sesterces (about 1,018,958) he arranged his accounts, and found that his debts being paid, he would not have more remaining than ten million of sesterces (£84,913) he poisoned himself, fearing he should die of hunger.

CLAUDIUS, emperor, who died in the year 54 of J. C., had a great predilection for mushrooms. Alas! we know that, thanks to the conjugal tenderness of his dear Agrippina, and to the earnest care of his physician, Xenophon, this regalement placed him before two hours amongst the gods. It is related of this brave man that, wishing every body to be unrestrained at his table, he had an edict issued to permit all guests admission to his entertainments ventris crepitum edere, because he had been informed that a senator had been inconvenienced by being obliged to practise reserve before him at a preceding banquet. This edict was worthy of its author.

VITELLIUS, emperor, died in the 69 of J. C. We have nothing to relate of this crowned gourmand; he loved everything and devoured all.

MARTIAL, a Latin poet, died about the year 105 of J. C., had a particular fancy for hare; he has himself avowed it in his epigram (XIII. 22).

those heroes; he swallowed the twentieth glass, just as the first. Philip II. never drank more than two at his repast. Charles the Fifth, only one. Lipstius wished to reduce the Flemish to four glasses in his laws for entertainments: but that was too few. They thought it necessary to have three for the fair, in honor of the young goddesses, of whom they recounted tales of wonder. I consented to this, but challenged them on nine for the poets."

"Inter aves tardus, si quis, me iudice, certet, Inter quadrupedes gloria prima lepus."

ALEXANDER SEVERUS, emperor, who died in 225, was equally fond of hare. Lampridius, his biographer, informs us that he eat of one at all his meals.

CHARLEMAGNE, first emperor of the West, died in 814, though very temperate, was very fond of game. "On ordinary days, said Eginhard, "he had but four dishes at his table, not including a piece of venison which his huntsmen had brought him on the spit, knowing it to be his favorite dish." The historian adds that this prince very rarely drank more than three times during his meal. Cæna quotidiana quaternis ferculis præbebatur præter assam quam venatores verubus inferre solebant, quâ ille libentius quàm ullo alio cibo tebatur: vini et omnis potus adeo parvus in bibendo erat, ut sub cænam rarè plus ter bibiret. (Eginh, vita Caroli Magni.)

FREDERICK, called the Pacific, 39th emperor of Germany, who died the 19th of August, 1493, was bewitched about melons; his immoderate love for them brought him to his grave by a fit of indigestion.

MAXIMILIAN II., son to the foregoing, and also emperor of Germany, died the 11th of February, 1519, of fever; he had the same taste as his father for melons, and terminated his days by the same accident, that is, by indigestion caused by this fruit.

ADRIAN VI., elected pope the 9th of January, 1522, and died the 14th of September, 1523, was hated by the Romans because he liked haddock, but it was occasioned, more likely, by the severity he thought it necessary to use in trying to reform them.

LUTHER, head of the Reformers, died in 1546, was a good toper, who preferred beer to Rhenish wine.

MELANCTON, first disciple of Luther, and who died in 1560, was very fond of barley soup, gudgeon and other little fishes; also vegetables mixed up with little morsels of hashed meat.

TASSO, the Italian poet, died in 1595, had a strong predilection for baked sweetmeats, for march-pane and candied fruits. He also liked sugar, which he put in his salad.

HENRY IV., king of France, died 1610, had a passion for melons and oysters, and eat them immoderately. It appears at the wine of Arbois, which he used freely, saved him from indigestion to which he exposed himself by his excess in those condiments.

MARÉCHAL HOCQUINCOURT died 1658, had a particular taste for sheeps' tails, in which, say the memoirs of the time, he recognised the peculiar property of increasing the hilarity of his guests; consequently, he kept during his life a cook who had discovered the means of preparing queues de mouton en caïse, which the marshal brought with him to the army in order to put his officers in good humor.

CHARLES XII, king of Sweden, died 1718, was certainly not very difficult to entertain; bread and butter being his highest ambition in the gastronomic way.

POPE, died 1744, he had no decided taste for one thing more than another; but he always required a dainty fricassee well compounded.

VOLTAIRE, who died 1778, was not remarked for any particular taste in eatables; but coffee was his favorite beverage; he even took it to excess. He was equal in this to M. de Buffon and the Marquis de Contades, who did even more, for they denied the entrée to the dining room to any one who refused drinking more than two cups at a time.

LESSING, a celebrated German writer, died 1781, was passionately fond of lentils; he would have acted as unwise a part as Esau to gratify his predilection.

ROGERSON, an English gastronome, gave, they say, the preference to ortolans; which he proved by the last act of his life. They say that this worthy emulated Apicius in expenditure; his table and culinary expenses during nine months, cost the enormous sum of 150,000 pounds sterling; this comprised all his fortune. Reduced to the misery and pitiable state of a mendicant, he expended a guinea, the last he had, and which had been given him for charity, to procure an ortolan, his favorite dish; and after having enjoyed it with all the delight of a professed gourmand, he blew out his brains. One can say that for a gastronome, worthy son of the bank of the Thames, to thus defy the caprices of the ingrate fortune, was to die on the field of glory.

FREDERICK THE GREAT, King of Prussia, who died 1786, had a predilection for polenta, this being a species of barley cake reduced to powder, and scorched to make it crisp. This prince rivalled his friend Voltaire in his love for coffee.

PAUL I., Emperor of Russia, assassinated on the night of the 11th or 12th of March, 1801, was a great lover of pie made of duck's livers. He pardoned a Polish exile, who had discovered the means of sending him one of those pies every week from Toulouse, the voyage not at all interfering with its freshness.

KLOPSTOCK, author of the Messiad, died 1803, is worthy to rank amongst the German gastronomers; he sneered at and found fault with the fancy for pâtés truffées, salmon and salmon trout; he watered the excellent Rhenish wine. In his latter years, a bottle of Bordeaux pleased him very much. Amongst the vegetables he gave the preference to peas; but for dessert grapes were his favorite fruit.

Returning to Singular Words we have the following:—

There exists in an old collection of inscriptions a distich which bears some analogy to the Venetian placard; it is thus conceived:

Defunctis patribus, successit prava juvenus,
Cujus consilio quæ valuere ruunt.

This distich is preceded by another, which has been represented as engraven on the doors of the Cathedral of Bresau, is as follows:—

Quas sacras sedes pietas construxit avorum,
Has nunc hæredes invadunt more luporum.

It appears that the authors of these bitter jests were anxious to attack the youth of their time; that was in the sixteenth century; and as there is nothing new under the sun, we recognize at the present day some waspish people who, with the smile of irony on their lips, take it into their heads to speak as slightly of our youth, as has been done in former times.

We are very glad to take this occasion of denouncing to our readers a pitiable article inserted some time since in the Bibliothèque de Genève, under the following title: DÉS ADOLÉSCENS de notre époque, comme gros d'avenir. We limit ourselves to a short extract, for in quoting nonsense the shorter it is the better. "In the happy age in which we live," writes this satirical jester, "there are men of fifteen, we have no longer youths, they pass at once from infancy to mature age, from the top to the gazette, from the rudiments of science to its acme. Before they get their beard, the mind is perfectly formed; they hesitate no longer; they have fixed ideas n things, men, principles, systems; the heart is cold, blasé; rose feelings are exhibited to all, but especially to their father, whom they consider old. Behold the consequences of this new order of things; sound principles, just and invariable, from which they never swerve; here they are as adopted:

"Experience is a useless thing.

"Intercourse with men and observation teach nothing.

"In this age of enlightenment youth alone possesses ability.

"The age in which the passions are in all their effervescence, is naturally that in which reason predominates.

"The culminating point of judgment is necessarily to be met with between twenty and twenty-five, and rarely beyond that. After this age, society is no longer composed of useful men; this fact is fully proved by the following category: at twenty he becomes a man; at five-and-twenty his maturity of judgment is complete; at thirty, false hair; at forty, a wig; at fifty, stupid; at sixty, a mummy; at seventy, a fossil, childish, extinct."

In 1835, a poet expressed the same ideas, and gave them under the same denomination in a piece of poetry entitled Le SEPTUAGENAIRE, ou le chant du Cygne! We will not say where the tirade or these designations are to be found.

"D'après nos grands faiseurs, on est homme à quinze ans;

A vingt, par son mérite et son expérience,

On appartient à cette jeune France

Què seule fait autorité:

A vingt-cinq ans on est dans sa maturité,

A trente, faux-toupet; à quarante, perruque,

Et relégué dans la classe caduque;

A cinquante, momie, ou fossile, ou néant."

When the Orestes of Voltaire appeared for the first time, February, 12th, 1750, the concourse was great at the representation, and they placed as a check or countermark on the pit tickets the following letters:

O. T. P.

Q.

M. U. D.

which signifies this line of Horace:—

Omne Tulit Punctum Qui Miscuit Utile Dulce.

A sorry jester interpreted these sigles in the following manner:

Oreste, Tragédie Pitoyable Que Monsieur Voltaire Donne.

Whilst discussing the subject of Voltaire's tragedies, we must not omit the mention of another by the same author; Zaire, of which four lines were struck out, and which have been discovered in a manuscript deposited in the bureaux of the police at Paris. These four lines form part of the third scene of the second act, towards the middle, the part where old Lusignan calls on God, after having recognized his daughter :

Ne m'abandonnez pas, Dieu qui voyez mes larmes !
 " Et toi, cher instrument du salut des mortels,
 " Gage auguste du Dieu vivant sur nos autels,
 " Bois rougi de son sang, relique incorruptible,
 " Croix sur qui s'accomplit ce mystère terrible,
 Dieu mort sur cette croix et qui revis pour nous,
 Parle, achève, ô mon Dieu, ce sont là de tes coups.

The four lines preceded by inverted commas, are those to which we refer.

THE FIVE LATIN WORDS OF LOUIS XI.

It is said that this prince, so amiable, so frank, so humane, gloried in his own ignorance; and it was for this reason that he wished to banish from his court, and from the education of his son (Charles VIII.) the Latin language, preserving, however, five words that he reserved as a special favor, having found them so useful that he made them through life his rule of conduct. "Not," said he, "that Latin is useless to a king, or at least a little of it; it will suffice, however, for my son to know the five following words: QUI NESCIT DISSIMULARE, NESCIT REGNARE; here lies the entire art of governing." Thus, he laid down, as a principle in his Rosiere des guerres, this maxim:—"Nothing is better than that your adversary should be ignorant of your intentions." That is to say—dis-simulate all your resolves, in order that your adversaries may not be aware of them until after their execution.

Another maxim taken from the same work:—

"De tant que fust vault mieulx que escorce, autant vault mieulx soustilleté que force," which signifies—

Know, that as far as the wood excels the bark, so does subtlety exceed strength.

ART. II.—MODERN LAW REFORMS.

The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act, (Ireland), 1856—19th and 20th Victoria, Cap. 102.

The Act before us, together with the English "Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," of which it is little more than a transcript, accommodated to the peculiarities of Irish practice, are both—notwithstanding that they contain the germs of some improvement in our legal system—specimens of that headlong and giddy legislation, which, under the name of "Law Reform," has, of late years, succeeded the more matured and wise improvements of the Benthamite School, effected during the last, and in the commencement of the present, reign. With the general nature of those improvements, most of our readers must be familiar. They consist, principally, of an almost total abolition of real and mixed actions,* and of the adoption of a new limitation of actions and suits relating to real property, appropriate to the subsisting remedies—of the abolition, likewise, of the cumbrous machinery of fines and recoveries,† and the substitution, in their stead, of forms less expensive, but more simple and rational, as well as more effective—of a modification of the law of Dower,‡ which, without prejudicing the just rights of any person, removed an obstinate impediment to the free transfer of land—of an amendment of the law of inheritance,§ by which parents and relatives of the half-blood, were relieved from the unjust severity of feudal rules, the causes of which had long ceased to operate—of an amendment also of the law of wills,|| by which an uniform system of canons was established, for the formation and construction of testamentary documents—to which other measures, both in the criminal and civil departmentsof the law, might be added; all fraught with benefit to the community in general; and although some of them surpass others, in the scientific symmetry of their structure (as do, in particular, the second and the last we have mentioned), yet all are characterised by vast intellect and erudition, and bear upon them the impress of that sagacious forecast, which could scarce fail to guide the labours of those

---

* 3 and 4 Wm. IV., C. 27.

† 3 and 4 Wm. IV., C. 74. Eng. 4 and 5 Wm. IV. C. 92. Ir.

‡ 3 and 4 Wm. IV., C. 105.

§ 3 and 4 Wm. IV., C. 106.

|| 7, Wm. IV., and 1 Vic., C. 26.

great minds,* to whom their authorship is attributed. One most practical proof of their excellence is this, that, in this age of change, they have already lived nearly quarter of a century, without any of them undergoing any serious alteration—a circumstance, which, when we contrast with the patching, piecing, splicing, mending, repealing, and re-enacting again, by which the “Law Reforms” of later years are, but too frequently distinguished,† makes us naturally enquire, how it happens, that, while the one class of reforms showed such maturity at their birth, and issued forth in full panoply, like Minerva from the head of Jove, the others are produced with a hideous resemblance to King Richard, in the play

“Deformed, unfinished, sent before his time,
Into this breathing world, scarce half-made up.”

The reasons seem to be, that the one class were instituted, principally for the sake of reform, and by men, not only qualified for the undertaking by intellects of enormous power, and as abstruse knowledge of the subject matter, on which they undertook to operate, but who also brought to bear upon it such an amount of diligence and care, as opened to their view (so far almost as it was possible for human foresight to discern them,) the various interests obnoxious to each intended change, and the results likely to follow from it in after time.

* For nearly all the legal reforms which took place during the period to which we refer, the public are indebted to the labours of three great commissions of that day, viz. those issued for enquiry into the state of the Common Law, the Law of Real Property, and the Criminal Law, of which the two first, caused by Mr. Brougham's famous motion in the House of Commons, of Feb. 7th, 1829, preceded the third by some years, and on which sat the following distinguished individuals.

Common Law.—Messrs. Bosanquet, Parke, Alderson, and Sergeant Stephens, until the three first were elevated to the bench, when Messrs. Pollock, Starkie, Evans, and Wightman, were substituted.

Real Property Law.—Sir J. Campbell, Messrs. Tierney, Sanders, Duval, Hodgson, Duckworth, Brodie, and Tyrrell.

Criminal Law.—Messrs. Starkie, Austin, Kerr, Amos, Jardine, and Wightman.

Amongst whom are to be found the names of the framers of the principal acts referred to, and professional opinion assigns all of them to the ablest hands.

† Amongst the late measures, in this department, which are not open to the above observation, but are happily assimilated to the earlier class of reforms, we must prominently mention Lord Campbell's Act of the 14 and 15 Vic. C. 100, “For Further Improving the Administration of Criminal Justice.”

Most of the more modern reforms, on the contrary, are mere experiments, the offspring of speculation, precipitancy and doubt; introduced, as it would appear, not so much for the purpose of effecting any salutary improvement in the law, as of elevating their authors into the rank of "Law Reformers" and enabling them to write their names on the same page with those of Brougham, Campbell, Duval, Sanders, and Brodie. Not that we mean to classify the authors of those reforms with the incompetent or worthless. Quite the reverse. Most of them are men, of whose abilities we entertain a high opinion, and who, we doubt not, would, with the aid of some industry and patience, become excellent Law Reformers, in the fullness of time. But, we say, that without industry and patience, no man can become such, and that industry and patience are just the qualities, which they, as legislators, at least, do not exhibit. For that, whether the fault rest more with themselves, or with that "go-a-head" spirit of reckless impetuosity, which, wafted to us from beyond the Atlantic, has of late years infatuated large numbers in these countries (and legislators among the rest,) making them think, on many points, as if there were no distinction between mind and matter,—as if speed, with or without accuracy, were the paramount object, in the working of both—as if the most profound investigations of abstract science, and the wisest adaptations of human law, were not creatures of time and trouble, but to be produced, off hand, to order, as a turner makes a top—whether, we repeat, the error be more their own, or that of the day we live in, certain it is, that their legislation bears a kindred likeness to each and all of those convenient theories, being more the random shots of poachers for the fame they covet, than the painstaking hunt of legitimate sportsmen, through the tracks of fact, and the windings of contingency—the more tedious process of the two, we readily admit, but the more likely one also to be successful.

Hence, we seldom at present see a new measure of Law Reform, that does not, at first sight, strike us, as being so deficient, for its professed purposes, that its alteration at no distant time, appears a matter of necessity. Hence, some of those measures contain blunders, so patent on the face of them, that, without amendment, they actually cannot be enforced at all. Hence, the altering or amending statutes, prepared, as the chance is, with no more care than the originals, occasionally stand themselves in need of further alterations or amendments, to be afterwards altered or amended, in their turn, until a complication is established, often of a most perplexing kind, but which sometimes would defy the wit of Oedipus to unravel—a consummation that may be illustrated by the present state of the law of Irish judgments, which one of the most astute lawyers in the House of Commons lately professed his inability to comprehend. And, hence, also, the present most unsatisfactory condition of the laws regulating the procedure of the Superior Courts of Common Law in this country, and the shortcomings of the Act of Parliament, mentioned at the head of this paper, which, as we said, is little more than a transcript of another Act, but which, in addition to the faults of the original measure, caused, we may presume, by the precipitancy of which we speak, has also its own peculiar faults, occasioned by the same precipitancy, in applying it, without further modification, to a state of things different from that for which the original was intended.

Before proceeding, however, to examine this Act more closely (which, we repeat, contains, with all its errors, “the germs of some improvement”) we wish to trace, in a few words, its antecedents—or, if we may so speak, its genealogy—for the last six years and six months, in order, by way of further and more pointed illustration, to show what species of attention this particular department of the law (viz. Common Law Procedure) has, for Ireland at least, received from the Legislature, during that period, and by exhibiting some four or five of the most ridiculous mistakes made therein, during the same time, by “giddy legislation”—and which nought but “giddy legislation” could make—to prevent surprise at those “germs” not being more mature, and at those “errors” being, at once, so many, and so palpable. Our wonder—having regard to the present fashion of Law Reform Legislation—being rather that the Act before us is not much more faulty.

On the 31st of May, 1850, the 13 and 14 Vic., C. 18., familiarly known to the Irish law profession, as the “Process and Practice Act,” received the royal assent. It produced important changes in the procedure of our superior courts of Common Law, and consisted of fifty-two sections, two of which principally, (viz. sections 19 and 40,) we shall, at present notice. The former of these was evidently intended to put a stop to an accumulation of costs against defendants, in unde-fended actions for small amounts, by enacting, that in the two classes of such actions—viz., where judgment should be “permitted by the defendant to go by default,” or where the defendant should “file a plea of confession” within the proper time, “no taxation of costs on the part of the plaintiff should take place therein, but the officer of the court in which judgment should be signed, and he was thereby required, in case the Writ of Summons should have been served in Dublin, to add to such judgment the sum of £5, as, and for the Plaintiff’s costs, but if the Writ of Summons should have been served elsewhere in Ireland, then the sum of £6, &c.”

Scarcely had the Act passed, however, when it was discovered, that no limitation as to the sum sued for, had been introduced into this section, and that therefore, as it stood, it offered an unreasonable immunity to debtors for large sums, while it tended to annihilate a most useful—perhaps, the most publicly useful—branch of professional practice. Some alarm and remonstrance followed this discovery, and thereupon, an Amendment Act, (13 and 14 Vic. c. 19.) was immediately hurried through the legislature, and received the royal assent, on the 10th of June, (ten days after the original Act) for the purpose of correcting the omission in question. But how did it correct it? Mark ye readers. By declaring, in its second section, that “the said provision shall be construed and taken, and it is hereby declared to apply only to “cases of judgment by default, in personal actions, brought for the recovery of liquidated sums under £20,” making no mention of actions in which pleas of confession had been duly given, and therefore leaving the defendants, in all such actions, (even though “brought for the recovery of liquidated sums under £20,”) liable to the enormous costs chargeable under the former system. So that the fraudulent or careless debtor, who paid no attention to the claims of justice, was the individual favored by this Amendment Act, and protected from costs beyond £5 or £6, while he who manfully acknowledged his obligation on the records of the court, found himself, as a reward for his candour, mulcted in a sum averaging between £7 and £10!

But the Amendment Act had to remedy a more curious blunder than the foregoing, and it did so, just as badly. For the original Act, having, by section 49, declared, that, “save wherein otherwise provided (i.e. save as to the actions of Replevin and Ejectment, which, by the 10th section, were to be governed by it from January 1st, 1851) this Act shall commence and take effect, on the last day of Trinity Term next after the passing hereof;" and the 31st of May (the day on which it passed) being in Trinity Term, a serious question rose, as to whether it could take effect at all, save as to the actions of Replevin and Ejectment, until the last day of Trinity Term, 1851, which, according to the most correct legal construction, we venture to say, it could not. Here, then, was another ground for the interposition of the Amendment Act, the requirements of which it would have fully satisfied, by simply saying, in so many words, or in words tantamount thereto, that (save as aforesaid) "the said Act should commence and take effect, on the last day of Trinity Term, 1850." Instead of this, however, it merely declared, by its first section, that "the words 'from and after the last day of Trinity Term' in the said Act contained, shall be construed and taken to mean, and the said words are hereby declared to mean, wherever used in said Act, the last day of Trinity Term, 1850." Now, the words "from and after the last day of Trinity Term" did not occur at all in the 49th section just mentioned; and, as they occurred only once in the entire original Act—viz., in its first section, where it provided that, "from and after the last day of Trinity Term next after the passing" thereof, all actions, except Replevin and Ejectment, should be commenced by Writ of Summons—the only effect of this sapient amendment (supposing the construction of the ambiguous words, which made any amendment necessary, to be the true one) was to make the Act apply to the commencement of actions by Writ of Summons, one year sooner than it could take effect for any other purpose, Replevin and Ejectment excepted. The courts, however, very wisely, gave the doubtful enactment the benefit of the doubt; and, by adopting the construction of it which seemed most in accordance with the intention of the Legislature, obviated the necessity of additional amendment, and allowed it to operate accordingly, which it did, in its integrity, until January 1st, 1854, when twenty-eight of its fifty-two sections were repealed by "the Common Law Procedure Amendment Act (Ireland), 1853," of which we shall say more anon. Next came "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," which, as we have said, is the foundation of the Irish Act of the current year, and whose provisions, in common with the latter, we shall therefore canvass more at length, just now. But, for the present, we shall notice one instance of "giddy legislation," which it exhibits, quite of a piece with those just mentioned, viz., that being intituled "An Act for the further Amendment of the Process, Practice, and mode of Pleading in, and enlarging the Jurisdiction of, the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, and of the Superior Courts of Common Law in the Counties Palatine of Lancaster and Durham," and declaring, in its glossary section (sec. 99), that "in the construction of this Act, the word 'Court' shall be understood to mean any one of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster;" and the word "Judge" "shall be understood to mean a Judge or Baron of any of the said Courts," &c.; its 103rd section provided, that the enactments contained in all the sections from 19 to 32, both inclusive, (in which sections, both the words "Court" and "Judge," frequently, occurred) should "extend and apply to every Court of Civil Judicature in England and Ireland,"—from which conflicting provisions it necessarily followed, either that the glossary section was to be held nugatory to a great extent, or that many of the extended sections were incapable of being used in Ireland; of which results, the former was that embraced by the sense of the profession; the words of section 103 being considered sufficiently extensive to control those in the glossary.

But that was not all. It seems most probably to have been the intention of the Legislature, to include section 18 with the sections extended to Ireland by section 103, but, whether the learned framer of that last named section was influenced by the "precipitancy" which we deprecate, or whether his ink-stand ran short of its ebonizing fluid, or whether some other grave cause exerted influence at the time, the fact is, that he omitted so to do, and, accordingly, in the statute book of the next session of Parliament, we find that identical 18th section raised, itself, to the dignity of an independent act of Parliament, as the 18th and 19th Vic. c. 7, intituled "an Act to extend to Ireland the provisions of the eighteenth section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," which extending Act, as our professional readers are aware, is that which regulated the addresses of counsel to juries in civil cases in this country until the 1st of October last, when the present Act came into operation. Now, we admit it to be a merit of the present Act that it altogether repeals the 18th and 19th Vic. c. 7., together with section 103 of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," (thereby abrogating the extension to Ireland of the fourteen sections therein enumerated) and that it re-enacts those fourteen sections, and the said repealed Act, almost "totidem verbis," as portions of itself, whereby it reduces into order, a little of the confusion created by preceding blunders. It is, therefore, so far, an improvement on the course of legislation which we have traced, whose amendments sometimes made confusion more confused, but still, that it is a mere continuation of that course, deriving its existence from the same fountain as, and not differing in quality from, the upper stream, it bears intrinsic evidence, too, distinct and cogent—showing, not only in its omissions, but in its new sections, marks of hurry and oversight, which we shall mention, and being in its old ones, nothing else than the Act of 1854, of whose keller skelter preparation we have already given proof—to allow us to doubt its character for a moment, or to think that any such improvements which it may contain, can be other than improvements in degree, merely. It is not necessary, that acts of Parliament should be drawn by the same hand, in order to establish an affinity between them. No. They are often governed, like clothes or household furniture, by the fashion of the day, appearing conformably to it, crude, or well digested, reckless, or deliberate, and when, in addition to that circumstance, a series of them is prepared, in pari maturitâ, by individuals belonging to a definite class, or calling, and possessing similar tastes, habits, or propensities—such as exempli gratiâ, a number of young senatorial lawyers, conscious of their own abilities, and thirsting for distinction—they are apt to exhibit a community of faults and virtues, and like children of the same parents, to be cognizable by the features of a common stock. Although we may admit this reasoning, however, in corroboration of our opinions respecting Acts of Parliament, we need scarcely say, that those opinions should be, at first, formed on the individual merits of those Acts themselves; and that we may judge the Act before us thus fairly, by its own deserts, we now propose to consider it under two heads—first, what it has not, and, secondly, what it has done—treating both, not with the minuteness of professional commentators, but with the freedom of reviewers, who address the public generally, and are wont to canvass every topic, with a view to their advantage.

I. We therefore ask, what has the Act not done? Before answering which question, we must remind our readers, that when it came into operation, and for nearly three years previous, the Procedure of our Superior Courts of Common Law was regulated, almost totally, by the unrepealed portion of the "Process and Practice Act of 1850," together with "The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act (Ireland), 1853," but principally by the latter. By that latter Act, much of the old system of pleading and procedure in those courts had been reversed, and a new system established, which we are not now going to criticise, but which, we can state, as a matter of fact, had been criticised pretty sharply, both by the Bench and the Bar, on different occasions, being found to work clumsily and defectively, in several particulars, in which it called loudly for revision and alteration. Consequently, we expected, when the present Act was first spoken of, that it would contain amendments, at least, of those provisions of the Act of 1853, which had been most sedulously pointed out by judges, as the source of great practical inconvenience, without giving rise to any corresponding benefit; which provisions are, unquestionably, those relating to the substitution of service of writs of Summons and Plaint, the raising and settlement of issues, and the law of Replevin—yet, what was our astonishment, on the passing of the Act, to find, that it makes no mention whatsoever of the two first of those three matters, and that, though it applies a remedy to the third of them, that remedy scarcely cures more than half of the defect! We shall now state shortly what were the defects of the Act of 1853, on each of those three subjects, in order, that our readers may judge for themselves, as to the degree of care with which the present Act, which so far overlooks them, was prepared. The power of substituting service of the writs just mentioned, is given, by section 34, of the Act of 1853, to "the Court in which the action is attached," or in vacation, to any judge of the Common Law Courts, and, although manifest justice requires, and the Legislature, as we presume, intended, that such power should be co-extensive with the number of actions to be commenced by such writs, in which the defendants could not be served therewith, in the usual way, by reason of undue impediments, notwithstanding the exertion of proper diligence to effect such service, but, could still be served in some other way, within the power of the Court, or Judge, to direct, yet, by the awkward introduction, after the words "Summons and Plaint," in that section, of the words, "the cause of action in respect of which the same shall have issued having arisen within the jurisdiction of the Court," a large number of actions, in which the right of action cannot be doubted, and in which, under the former system, substitution of service would have been had, as a matter of course, became excluded from the benefit of such substitution, and consequently rendered incapable of being proceeded with at all in Ireland, unless the defendants could be caught, personally, upon the Irish soil.

Two striking instances of this gross injustice were exhibited by the cases of Warren v. Grier,* in the Court of Common Pleas, and Collins v. Lord Frankfort De Montmorency,† in the Court of Exchequer, soon after the Act of 1853 came into force. Both of these were actions brought, in this country, upon English judgments, and came before the respective courts, on motion for substitutions of service of the Writs of Summons and Plaint. In the latter, it moreover appeared, that the defendant, who resided in chambers in London, had no property in England, but had some in this country, and that the Plaintiff's object, in bringing the action, was to make the judgment available against that property. Yet, the court, in each case, felt itself coerced to refuse the application; and the Lord Chief Baron, in pronouncing judgment, in the latter, said, "this case exemplifies the mischiefs which may be produced by changes in the law, without sufficiently attending to consequences. Under the late Act, as well as under the state of the law previous to it, we could have made this order so as to attain justice between the parties. But the present Act expressly restricts the power of the Court to cases in which the cause of action has arisen within its jurisdiction." Unfortunately, we have but too many instances in "modern law reforms," of the "mischiefs" which his Lordship speaks of; but we shall be still more unfortunate, if, after the "consequences" are discovered, those mischiefs shall be suffered to remain without a remedy. Those cases have, of course, been since followed by many others; and in Miller v. O'Brien and Pigott ‡ (heard before Judge Perrin, in Chamber), it was held to be a fatal objection, on such a motion, that "the affidavit did not state positively, but only inferentially, that the cause of action arose in Ireland;"

---

* 6, Ir. Jur. 233.

† 3, I. C. L. R. 473. 6, Ir. Jur. 234.

‡ 8, Ir. Jur. 109.

a decision which, although it stretched the doctrine farther than did any previous case, we think is fully warranted by the language of the section. Yet, of this manifest defect in the existing law, the Amendment Act before us takes no notice!

In the raising and settlement of issues the Act of 1853 exhibits its most original characteristics. For, having abolished the system of allowing the issue (or question to be tried) to be evolved, in each case, by the alternate action of the pleadings—one, which the wisdom of ages had approved of, and in which, when there was no error in the pleadings themselves, an issue material to the merits of the case was always certain to be produced—it substituted for it, the novel device of compelling the parties themselves either to select the issue out of the pleadings, or to get a judge, or full court on appeal, to do so for them, in case of their non-agreement. A necessary consequence of this practice is, that in cases of more than ordinary difficulty, immaterial issues must be now more frequent than they were formerly; for, whether the parties themselves agree upon the issue, (which happens in the majority of cases) or whether a single judge settles it, (which happens in the majority of the remainder) or whether a full court does so on appeal (which seldom happens) it is evident, that, in no case can it be fashioned with the same accuracy, as when, by the unerring laws of logical science, it resulted from the pleadings, as surely as the conclusion results from the premises, in a syllogism. In the one case, to have the issue right, it was only requisite that the pleadings should be so; in the other, the pleadings may be right enough, and the issues still be quite irrelevant. But, if such be the frailty of the present system, in cases of a single issue, what shall we think of it, when we take into consideration section sixty-eight of the Act, which enacts, that “all facts stated in any Summons and Complaint, and not denied in the defence, shall be deemed to be admitted for the purposes of the suit,” and of sections 70 and 71 of the same Act, which abolish that old and most useful form of pleading, called the “General Issue,” by requiring all “defences by way of denial,” to “traverse some one or more than one material matter of fact” alleged in the Summons and Complaint; the joint effect of which three sections is, to impose on defendants the necessity of traversing seriatim in their defences, all averments in the Summons and Complaint, which they do not mean to admit, whereby a defence, in a complicated case, often assumes much of the dimensions and shape of an answer in an old Chancery suit, and when, in addition to all these separate traverses, many matters of justification have had to be introduced into it, the difficulty of extracting from it, and the other pleadings, the issues material for the trial of the case, is sometimes such as no person can conceive, who has not actually experienced it?

The pleader can of course, in most cases, classify those traverses and justifications, so as to make many of them triable by a small number of issues, but it occasionally happens, that he cannot do so, consistently with due distinctness, in which event, his safest course usually is, to frame a series of issues, as nearly as possible in the language of the traverses, or justifications, which, if numerous, the issues framed on them must be so, proportionably. Hence, we not unfrequently hear twelve, twenty, twenty-five, or even thirty issues announced by the plaintiff's junior counsel, at the opening of a Nisi Prius case, as the number to be submitted to the jury, which number, probably, he no sooner mentions, than he is considerably interrupted by the presiding judge, with "you may spare yourself the trouble of reading them, Mr.—," and indeed, from the state of chaos, into which jurors are often plunged, by this multiplicity of issues, and the extreme difficulty which the cleverest judges experience, by reason of it, in enlightening them as to the real merits, and explaining to them how they ought to find each particular issue, on many important trials, it is not wonderful, that the system of issues is, to the Bench, about the most distasteful feature of the Act of 1853, and that judges more frequently animadvert on it, than on any other. We, ourselves, have heard an exceedingly able judge, on one of the last summer circuits, go so far in his charge to a Nisi Prius jury, as to say of that system, that "by enabling counsel to split up the main question for trial into a number of minor ones, it tended frequently to frustrate justice," and, we must say, that we thoroughly approved of the observation, but thought that if his Lordship had used the words "enabling and often compelling" instead of the word "enabling" simply, his censure would have been, at once, more condemnatory, and more just. In our opinion this system, (which generally does not even redeem its faults by any very marked economy, while it is sometimes more expensive than that which it supplanted,) demands instant reformation, as to the nature of which, if we may venture a suggestion, perhaps the forms of pleading and limited

General Issue, now in use in England, might impart a useful hint, but, however that be, let it suffice to say, that it remains untouched, notwithstanding the passing of the "Amendment Act" before us!

The defects of the Act of 1853 in relation to the law of Replevin, are the third ground, on which we proposed to consider the omissions of the Act before us. These defects may be summed up, by saying, that, although the policy of such a law ought to be, on the one hand, to afford the tenant, whose goods have been distrained, every facility for replevying, in the first instance, and on the other, to enable the landlord to have the question of right tried speedily, and with ease, the act of 1853 did the reverse of both these things. For first, (instead of allowing the tenant—as under the former system—to get back his goods, as soon as he should duly bind himself, to try the right by action) by obliging him to commence an action,* and issue a Writ of Replevin, as conditions precedent to all relief, it threw an obstacle in his way, which did not before exist; and, secondly, by placing that action on the same footing with all other "Personal Actions,"† and not adverting to the fact, that it differs from all other actions, in the positions of the parties being transposed—the Defendant being, substantially, the Plaintiff, desirous of expedition, and the plaintiff, the defendant, anxious for delay—it empowered the tenant to elude justice, in the following manner,—1st, by not serving his Summons and Plaint, until the last day of "six calendar months from the day of the date thereof"‡—2ndly, by not filing it, until the last day of two months more, after that service.§—3rd, by not proceeding to trial, for three terms, from that in which, or the vacation of which, the defence, or other subsequent pleading, is filed; || within which time, if he failed to do so, the landlord, it is true, could afterwards have taken down the cause for trial,¶ but, if, instead of adopting this more expensive course, he chose to seek for judgment as in case of non-suit, against the tenant, his course was, after

---

* The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act, (Ireland) 1853. Secs. 228 and 229.

† Do. Sec. 6.

‡ Do. Sec. 28.

§ Do. Sec. 38.

|| Do. Sec. 106.

¶ Do. Sec. 107.

the lapse of the three terms, to "enter a rule, that the plaintiff, (the tenant) do proceed to trial, at the Assizes, or sittings next after the expiration of twenty days from the service of such rule,"* which "assizes or sittings" might not, sometimes, according to the season of the year, take place, in the one case, for six, and in the other, for eight months afterwards, (and the tenant having it in his power, to lay the venue in any county which he thinks proper, † must be expected to choose that whereby he could gain the longest time), by which aggregate delays the landlord might, in some cases, be withheld from "taking down the cause for trial, for about nineteen months, and from obtaining judgment as in case of non-suit, for about two years! This flagrant injustice has not, like the other two defects just mentioned, been passed over, altogether, sub silentio, by the new Act, but still, the only notice it takes of it, is, by its hundredth section, which is in these words:—

"In case the Plaintiff in Replevin shall neglect to file the Summons and Plaint, or copy thereof, within ten days after service, unless the time shall have been extended, or to proceed to trial within one term from that in which, or the vacation of which, the defence or other subsequent proceeding is filed, the defendant (the landlord), may proceed to enter such rules as are in sections thirty-eight and one hundred and six, of the Common Law Procedure Amendment Act, (Ireland), 1853, in cases of such default respectively provided."

That is to say, it substitutes "ten days" for "two months," and "one term" for "two terms," but, as it does not at all limit the tenant's right to postpone the service of the Summons and Plaint, until the last day of "six calendar months," from the day of the date thereof, the only effect of these changes will, generally, be, to reduce the aggregate delays above set forth, from nineteen months, to about thirteen, and from two years, to about eighteen months!

II. We now come to the second head, under which we proposed to consider the Act in question, viz., what it has done, under which—again reminding our readers, that we are not writing a professional treatise, but one intended for general perusal—we mean to examine freely the principles of the fundamental changes, produced, in the great body of our Common

* The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act, (Ireland,) 1853, Sec. 106.

† Do. Sec. 62.

Law Procedure, by its enactments, bestowing less attention to its mere practical details, an enlarged notice of which would be incompatible with our space, and inconsistent with the purposes of this Review. As belonging to the category of those details, we shall, therefore, dispose of the first twenty sections of the Act, by saying, that the first, second, and third of them relate to its short title prefixed to the head of this paper, its incorporation with the Act of 1853, and the repeals of section 103 of the Act of 1854, and the 18 and 19 Vic., C. 7, already mentioned*—that the power given, by the fourth section, to the Court, or a Judge, to try questions of fact, on a consent in writing, to that effect, being signed by the parties to the cause, or their attorneys, so that the verdict thus had “shall be of the same effect as the verdict of a jury,” may be occasionally found a convenient provision, but is rightly guarded against passing into very frequent use, by the “allowance” of the Court, or a Judge, being required, in addition to the consent of the parties, unless so far as such “allowance” may be dispensed with by a “General Rule or Order” to be made by the Judges of the Superior Courts of Common Law, and also by the saving clause that such verdict “shall not be questioned upon the ground of being against the weight of evidence;”—that the fifth section, by enabling two judges to sit, at the same time, for the trial of causes pending in the same court, will tend materially, to the convenience and benefit of suitors and witnesses—that the sixth section, by empowering the Court, or a Judge, on the application of either party, at any time after the issuing of the writ, to decide matters of account, in a summary manner, or to refer them to arbitration, in any of the three modes therein described, will, if cautiously used, be the means of putting a stop to a very general inconvenience, and waste of time, often experienced in the discussion, before Nisi Prius juries, of things ill suited to the circumstances of that tribunal—and that the remainder of those sections, in their provisions as to questions of law, when involved in such matters of account,† the further power of Judges to refer such matters to arbitration, when left to their own decision,‡ the proceedings before, and power of arbitrators,§ the enforcing and setting aside awards,|| the giving to a rule or order to deliver posses-

---

*Pages 701 and 702.

† Secs. 7 and 8.

‡ Sec. 9.

§ Sec. 10.

|| Secs. 12 & 13.

sion of lands or tenements, pursuant to an award, the effect of a judgment in ejectment,* and certain other auxiliary regulations, seem to be all well framed for their intended purposes.

To one observation, however, the tendency towards arbitration evinced by these sections, is open—namely, that, although the arbitrations thereby proposed are less objectionable than those of the ordinary kind, in consequence of their awards being more final, and “enforceable by the same process as the finding of a jury, upon the matter referred,”† they are still calculated, when directed at the trial, seriously to accumulate costs upon the parties, and should be, therefore, never resorted to, at that time, after the usual expenses of a trial have been incurred, save when the inconvenience of proceeding with the trial is so great, as to threaten an actual frustration of justice. Neither shall we dwell on the next eighteen sections of the Act—except on three of them, which we shall mention—because, although the remaining fifteen make some wholesome changes, principally, in the law of evidence, they are not new to us, being nothing else than those fourteen sections of the Act of 1854, so clumsily extended to Ireland, in the manner before described,§ together with the Act of the 18 and 19 Vic., cap. 7, consisting of one section, all which, as we have also said, have been repealed, and re-enacted again, as portions of the new measure.‡ Some of those fourteen sections are, however, now placed on a different footing, from that which they before occupied, in this country, for, while the Act of 1854 only extended them “to every Court of civil judicature in England and Ireland,”|| the 98th section of the present Act, very properly, directs, that some of them—which, in their present shape, are sections 23 (substituting affirmations for oaths, in cases of conscientious objections to the latter, being entertained by witnesses), 24 (subjecting wilful falsehood, in such affirmations, to the same punishment as that for perjury), 25 (enabling parties, under certain circumstances, partially to discredit their own witnesses), 26 (enabling them, to prove contradictory statements of adversæ witnesses), 27 (allowing witnesses to be cross-examined, as to previous written statements made by them), 28 (allowing them to be questioned, as to, and admitting proof of, their having been, previously

---

* Section 19.

† Sections 6 and 9.

§ Page 701.

‡ Pages 701 and 702.

|| The Common Law Procedure Act 1854, Section 108.

convicted of felony, or misdemeanor), 29 (dispensing with the necessity of examining attesting witnesses, in certain cases), 30 (admitting in evidence comparison of disputed writing, with writing proved to be genuine), 34 (providing for the stamping of documentary evidence, at the trial of any cause) 35 (providing for the receipt of stamp duty, and penalties, in such cases, by the officer of the court), and 36 (exempting from stamp duty, all documents made or required, under the provisions of the present Act)—“shall apply and extend to all courts of judicature, as well criminal as all others, and to all persons having by law, or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence.”

Of the abstract justice of this provision, it is unnecessary to give any proof; but, as an instance of the inconvenience resulting from the want of it, with reference to one of the sections just named—viz., section 30—we may mention the fact of our having—while it was in force amongst us, as section 27 of the Act of 1854—witnessed the trial of a prisoner under the 1 and 2 Wm. IV. c. 44, sec. 3, for writing and sending a threatening letter, whereat, although the Crown Counsel were in possession of a document admittedly in the handwriting of the prisoner, they were unable to hand it in to the jury, for the purpose of comparison with the letter produced in evidence in support of the indictment, by reason of this section being limited to courts of “civil judicature.” Of the rest of those fifteen sections, we may here observe, that section 22 (which gives the Court, or Judge, a discretionary power to adjourn trials), together with sections 14 (which enables Courts of Law or Equity to stay proceedings in actions, or suits, commenced in violation of an agreement for arbitration), and 90 (which provides against parties suing on lost negotiable instruments, being prejudiced by such loss, on their giving adequate security against the claims of other persons, thereunto), are, by section 98, extended “to every court of civil judicature in Ireland,” and that sections 21 (which regulates the addresses of counsel to juries), 37 (which prohibits new trials from being granted by reason of a judge’s ruling “that the stamp upon any document is sufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp”), and 38 (which enables error to be “brought upon a judgment upon a special case stated under this Act in any award”), are, like the general provisions of the Act, confined to our Superior Courts of Common Law.

The three sections which we promised to mention,* and to which we seek to direct particular attention, are sections 31, 32, and 33, which are not to be found in the "Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," and which, being now introduced for the first time, and applying exclusively to Ireland, we are glad to hail, as the initiative of a marked improvement in the law of evidence, which, we presume, will be soon adopted into the statutes of the sister country. That improvement consists in making probates, and letters of administration, of wills, and testamentary instruments, sufficient evidence of their contents, both at law and in equity, for the purposes of real, as well as of personal property;† thereby establishing a mode of proof of those instruments, applicable to both purposes, instead of subjecting parties to the absurd necessity, which before existed, of producing the original will, in all actions and suits relating to realty, and the probate, or letters of administration, in those relating to personalty, and both, in those relating to both species of property, at the hazard of being visited with defeat, and costs, with respect to the particular species, to which the wanting document was applicable, notwithstanding that the document produced might have shown, transparently, that, according to the terms of the will, the result of the action, or suit, ought to have been otherwise. Cases arise, however, in which important questions turn on the original will, and, therefore, the 31st section wisely provides, that the substituted evidence can be only used, when the party intending to use it shall have served seven days' notice of his intention upon his adversary, who may, by a counter notice, insist on the production of the original; but, as the counter notice, if suffered to be used wantonly, might defeat the objects of the enactment altogether, a method is provided, by the 32nd section, by which the party intending to produce the substituted evidence, may take the opinion of the court, or a judge, as to his right so to do, and obtain an order accordingly. The 33rd section relates, solely, to the costs of these proceedings, and the three of them are as follows :—

---

* Page 710.

† By the 14 and 15 Vic., C. 57, sec. 108, office copies of wills, and other testamentary documents, are made prima facie evidence of the contents of the originals, in proceedings by Civil Bill, which enactment probably suggested the present one.

XXXI. In any Action at Law or Suit in Equity where, according to the existing Law, it would be necessary to produce and prove an original Will or other Testamentary Instrument in order to establish a Devise or other Testamentary Disposition, Probate or Letters of Administration of such Will or other Testamentary Instrument, or a Copy thereof purporting to be certified as a true Copy by some Officer of the Testamentary Court in which the same shall have been lodged, shall be sufficient Evidence of such Will or other Testamentary Instrument and its Contents; provided that the Party intending to produce such Probate, Letters of Administration, or Copy shall have given Seven Days Notice of such his Intention to the opposite Party, and unless the Party receiving such Notice shall, within Three Days thereafter, by a counter Notice, require the Production and Proof of the original Will or other Testamentary Instrument.

XXXII. Provided always, That in case any such counter Notice shall be served, it shall be lawful for the Party intending to produce such Probate, Letters of Administration, or Copy, to apply to the Court or a Judge for an Order that such Probate, Letters of Administration, or Copy shall be deemed and taken as sufficient Evidence of such Will or other Testamentary Instrument, and its Contents, and thereupon the Court or Judge may make such Order in relation thereto as may be fit, and the said Court or Judge may thereupon determine by whom the Costs of such Application shall be paid, and upon what Terms, if any, such Will or other Testamentary Document shall be produced.

XXXIII. In every Case in which, after the Notices mentioned in the last Section, the original Will or other Testamentary Instrument shall be produced and proved, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge before whom such Evidence shall be given to direct by which of the Parties the Costs thereof shall be paid.

Few enactments have been made, of late years, tending more than will these three sections, to promote the interests of justice, and to prevent merits from being overruled by quibble and technicality. The 31st, however, is loosely framed, for, although common sense would seem to indicate—and it probably was the intention of the framers of that section—that copies of wills, &c., “certified by some officer of the Testamentary Court,” should be, for the purposes of evidence, equivalent to probates in all cases, yet, by the operation of the section being limited to actions or suits, “where, according to the existing law, it would be necessary to produce and prove an original will, or other testamentary instrument” (i.e., to actions or suits relating to real property), it leaves the proof of wills, &c., in all other actions or suits, precisely as it was before (viz., requiring the production of the probates) and is, besides, ambiguous, as to whether, in actions or suits relating to reality and personalty, proof, by such certified copies, will be sufficient to affect both.

Of the sections intervening between 38 and 55, conversant as they all are with mere matters of detail, we shall only notice the four last; and we, solely, notice these because they supply two great desiderata which before existed in the practice regarding motions, in our Superior Courts of Common Law—two of them (sections 51 and 53) respectively, empowering the Court, or judge, to direct the oral examination of witnesses, and the production of documents, for the purposes of motions, and providing, on the application of “any party to any action, suit, or other civil proceeding,” for the compulsory examination of persons who refuse to make an affidavit—and the other two (sections 52 and 54) declaring, by what machinery, and in what way, those new powers are to be exercised. Sections 51 and 53 are in these words:—

LI. Upon the hearing of any motion, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge, at their or his discretion, and upon such terms as they or he shall think reasonable, from time to time, to order such documents as they or he may think fit to be produced, and such witnesses as they or he may think necessary to appear, and be examined visâ voce, either before such Court or Judge, or before the Master, and upon hearing such evidence, or reading the report of such Master, to make such rule or order as may be just.

LIII. Any party to any action, suit, or other civil proceeding in any of the Superior Courts, requiring the affidavit of a person who refuses to make an affidavit, may apply by notice for an order to such person to appear and be examined upon oath before a Judge or Master, as to the matters concerning which he has refused to make an affidavit; and the Court or Judge may make such order for the attendance of such person before the Judge or Master appointed to take such examination, for the purpose of being examined as aforesaid, and for the production of any writings or documents to be mentioned in such order, and may therein impose such terms as to such examination, and the costs of the application and proceedings thereon, as shall appear just.

With section 55, however, commences a remarkable portion of the Act before us, constituting, as it does, the most decided advance yet made, towards an amalgamation of the Courts of Law and Equity, in this country. We wish, therefore, to examine this portion, with peculiar care, premising—what our readers already know—that the distinction between those two classes of tribunals, (one peculiar to the laws of England, and to those of other countries which have been modelled on them), has been long a prolific subject of debate amongst the learned, but, at two eras in particular, has attracted their most earnest notice—namely, the commencement of the seventeenth century, when the growing functions of the Chancellor awakened the jealousy of the sages of the Common Law;* and the present day, when, however rife the spirit of reform be, in all departments of the state, it is, in Law, but too much governed, by the spirit of innovation. Then as now, moreover, the distinction has been attacked by two classes of assailants. First, by those who misrepresented it, adopting one half of the notion of some foreign jurists, by whom it was misunderstood, that the two jurisdictions act in opposition to each other, the one judging without equity, and the other not being bound by law;†—and, secondly, by those who, admitting equity in its technical sense, to be as distinct from natural equity, as the law itself is—acknowledging that, whatever it may have been at its inception, it is now, and has been for centuries, as well defined, as is that law, or rather “is a part of the laws formed from usages and determinations, which sometimes differ from what is called Common Law, in its subjects; but chiefly vary from it in its modes of proof, of trial, and of relief”‡—and therefore recognising the division of the two jurisdictions to be little else than a distribution of business among different tribunals, by which each administers its own portion of remedial justice—still argue

---

* The following extract from Selden's “Table Talk,” (title “Equity”) is an amusing instance of the acerbity, with which Common Law men of that day, used to express themselves, upon this subject. “Equity (says he) is a roguish thing. For law we have a measure, know what to trust to. Equity is according to the conscience of him that is Chancellor, and as that is larger or narrower, so is Equity. ’Tis all one as if they should make the standard of the measure a Chancellor's foot. What an uncertain measure would this be? One Chancellor has a long foot, another a short foot, a third an indifferent foot. ’Tis the same thing with the Chancellor's conscience.”

† It is wonderful what strange notions of Equity have been seriously entertained, and expressed, by eminent individuals. Even De Lolme's description of it is far from correct. That of Lord Kaimes, no lawyer can subscribe to. And the following passage from Cowell, which Dr. Johnson cites, as an authority, under the word “Chancellor,” in his dictionary (the large edition) is about the worst of all. “Cancellarius, at the first, signified the registers, or actuaries in court; grapharius scilicet, qui conscribendis et excipiendis judicum actis, dant operam. But this name is greatly advanced, and not only in other kingdoms but in this, is given to him that is the chief judge in causes of property: for the Chancellor hath power to moderate and temper the written law, and subjecteth himself only to the law of nature and conscience.”

‡ Life of Sir T. More, by Sir J. Mackintosh.

against it, ad inconvenienti, saying, that it is a hardship on suitors to be driven into two courts, for that justice which ought to be given them in one—that there is no reason why one court should not pronounce on each entire case—that in the majority of nations, the distinction does not exist—and that any advantages which may attend it are more than counter-balanced, by the expense and delay which it necessarily occasions. On the other hand, its friends maintain, that this distinction is not more forced than many others which exist in the subdivisions of our judicature, uncomplained of; and that it would be as reasonable to unite the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Crown, with that of the Exchequer, in Revenue, cases, as to consolidate our systems of Law and Equity—that, though the one be of more ancient, and the other of later birth, the two have grown up naturally amongst our people, as the creation of their necessities, for many generations; and that institutions thus produced are, like native plants, the fittest for the soil that bears them—that viewed as a mode of distributing the judicial business, their separation produces the benefits usually derivable from the division of labour, in causing every part of that business to be better understood, and better done—and that, though it is not clear how far cheap tribunals serve, or dear ones injure, a community, any unreasonable expense or delay, caused by that separation, might be remedied by other means than its proposed removal.*

For our part, we shall not say which side is the winner in this controversy, thinking, as we do, that both sides speak much truth. But, without venturing any opinion on the issue knit between them, as to the question of complete consolidation, we think, there is one point on which they ought to agree, namely, that as the jurisdiction of our Courts of Equity is divisible into two branches—one comprising all those matters, which are usually classed under the separate heads of its Concurrent and Exclusive Jurisdiction, such as matters of Account, Partnership, and Administration of Assets, the Foreclosure and Redemption of Mortgages, Trusts, &c., in each of which it affords complete relief, without reference to proceedings in any other court; and another, which deals with Discovery, Injunctions, &c., things often used in aid, or in restraint, of proceedings in Courts of Law—it would be an improvement, that those last-named courts should, for the purposes of proceedings pending in them, and requiring such intervention on the part of Equity, but not otherwise, possess powers of administering relief, similar to those exercised by Courts of Equity, in cases of Discovery and Injunction, whereby the necessity of parties resorting thither, for those purposes, would be dispensed with; provided only, that, in administering such relief, the Courts of Law should, as far as possible, be guided by the principles which Courts of Equity acknowledge, and should apply them as effectively as those Courts do. Now, this is just what the Act, attempts to accomplish, by the sections we have arrived at—viz. section 55, which, considerably increases the power of the Courts of Law, to order the production of documents, “for the purpose of Discovery or otherwise,” beyond that given them, even by the 6th section of the “Act to Amend the Law of Evidence,” (14 & 15 Vic., c. 99), and the 64th Section of “The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act, (Ireland), 1853,”—56, which enables “by order of the Court or a Judge,” parties to actions, to deliver to each other, either with the Summons and Plaint, or Defence, or “at any other time,” “interrogatories in writing upon any matter, as to which discovery may be sought”—81, which enables plaintiffs, “in all cases of Breach of Contract, or other injury,” to claim, in the Summons and Plaint, “a Writ of Injunction* against the repetition or continuance of such Breach of Contract or other Injury,” &c.—84, which provides for the granting of such Writ on an ex parte application, by the plaintiff, to the Court or a Judge, "at any time after the commencement of the Action, and whether before or after judgment,"—85, which empowers defendants, in ordinary actions, and plaintiffs in Replevin, when entitled to relief on equitable grounds, "to plead the facts which entitle them to such relief,"—86, which provides for Equitable defences, grounded on matter arising "after the lapse of the period, during which it could be pleaded"—and 87, which enables any of the parties, with the leave of the Court or a Judge, "to reply in answer to any pleading of the opposite, facts which avoid such pleading upon equitable grounds."

---

* Amongst the lawyers who upheld the separation of the two judicatures, about the commencement of the seventeenth century, was the great Lord Bacon, who, in his "Jurisdiction of the Marches," says, "All nations have Equity, but some have Law and Equity mixed in the same Court, which is worse; and some have it distinguished into several Courts, which is better." And in his Aphorisms, "Apud nonnullos receptum est, ut jurisdictio quæ decernit secundum æquum et bonum, atque illa altera quæ procedit secundum jus strictum, iisdem curiis dependentur; apud alios autem et diversis. Omnino placet curiarum separatio. Neque enim servabitur distinctio casuum, si fiat commixtio jurisdictionum: sed arbitrium legem tandem trahet." De Aug. Scient. Lib. 8, Cap. 3, Aph. 45.

---

* That the powers conferred on the Courts of Common Law, as to Injunctions, by this section, are not commensurate with those exercised by Courts of Equity, see Kerr's treatise on the “Common Law Procedure Act, 1854,” 51.

But, whether those enactments are sufficient to secure the observance of the condition above mentioned, by making the Courts of Law apply their new powers, on the same principles, when applicable, and as effectively, as Courts of Equity do, remains to be discovered, by experience of their working, and the solution of the problem of "how far judges, many of whom never decided a point of Equity, in their lives, and have been, necessarily, estranged from its peculiar doctrines, for many years, can, by the mere passing of an Act of Parliament, become suddenly so imbued with the details of that intricate science, as to rival, in their knowledge of it, the Sugdens and the O'Loughlens!" Much as we revere our Common Law Bench—and feel a national pride, as Irishmen, at the ability that adorns it—we fear much, that this task is unreasonably severe for its distinguished occupants, and that, assuming those enactments to be, in the abstract, useful (which we believe) a considerable time must elapse, before their benefits can be felt extensively. It is remarkable, that, although "The Common Law Procedure Act 1854," containing analogous provisions for England, has been now in force two years, very few decisions on them are to be found in the English reports, and a contemporary publication has said of one of them (the section relating to Equitable Defences †) that "probably no enactment ever gave a prospect of such an extensive change in the law, and

---

* As to the nature of the equitable defence given by this section, see the judgment of Parke, B. in Mines Royal Societies v. Magway, (10 Ex. Rep. 489,) where he says, "In my opinion, the equitable defence allowed to be pleaded by the Statute, means such a defence as would in a court of Equity, be a complete answer to the plaintiff's claim, and would, as such, afford sufficient ground for a perpetual injunction."

† Section 83 of the "Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," analogous to Section 85 in the new Act.

has resulted in altering it so little*—an observation, that might almost apply to others also. The miscellaneous nature of Irish practice, however, gives our Law Judges this advantage over their English brethren, that they all have had some, and many of them great, experience in Equity, while at the Bar. We here submit sections 55, 56, 81, and 85, to the perusal of our readers, to which the remaining three we have named are merely supplemental, as are others, also, in a more minute degree, to which we have, therefore, not alluded.

L.V. Upon the Application of either Party to any Action, Suit or other Civil Proceeding in any of the Superior Courts, upon an Affidavit by such Party of his Belief that any Document, to the Production of which he is entitled for the Purpose of Discovery or otherwise, is in the Possession or Power of the opposite Party, it shall be lawful for the Court or Judge to order that the Party, against whom such Application is made, or if such Party is a Body Corporate that some Officer to be named of such Body Corporate, shall answer on Affidavit, stating what Documents he or they has or have in his or their Possession or Power relating to the Matters in dispute, or what he knows as to the Custody they or any of them are in, and whether he or they objects or object (and if so, on what Grounds,) to the Production of such as are in his or their Possession or Power; and upon such Affidavit being made the Court or Judge may make such further Order thereon as shall be just.

L.VI. In all Causes in any of the Superior Courts, by Order of the Court or a Judge, the Plaintiff may, with the Writ of Summons and Complaint, and the Defendant may, with the Appearance and Defence, or either of them, by Leave of the Court or a Judge, may, at any other Time, deliver to the opposite Party or his Attorney (provided such Party, if not a Body Corporate, would be liable to be called and examined as a Witness upon such Matter) Interrogatories in Writing upon any Matter as to which Discovery may be sought, and require such Party, or in the Case of a Body Corporate any of the Officers of such Body Corporate, within Ten Days, to answer the Questions in writing by Affidavit, to be sworn and filed in the ordinary Way; and any Party or Officer omitting, without just Cause, sufficiently to answer all Questions as to which a Discovery may be sought within the above Time, or such extended Time as the Court or a Judge shall allow, shall be deemed to have committed a Contempt of the Court, and shall be liable to be proceeded against accordingly.

LXXXI. In all Cases of Breach of Contract or other Injury, where the Party injured is entitled to maintain and has brought an Action, he may, in like Case and Manner as herein-before provided with respect to Mandamus,† claim a Writ of Injunction against the Repetition * 27th Law Times, 222.

† As to the section 70, applicable to Mandamus, see Pages 721 and 723, which section, although it precedes the above section, in the Act, we have or Continuance of such Breach of Contract or other Injury, or the Committal of any Breach of Contract or Injury of a like kind, arising out of the same Contract, or relating the same Property or Right; and he may also in the same Action include a Claim for Damages or other Redress.

LXXXV. It shall be lawful for the Defendant in any Action, and for the Plaintiff in any Action for Replevin of Goods, in any of the Superior Courts, in which, if Judgment were obtained, he would be entitled to Relief against such Judgment on equitable Grounds, to plead the Facts which entitle him to such Relief, and the said Courts are hereby empowered to receive such Pleading, provided that such Pleading shall begin with the Words "For Defence on equitable Grounds," or Words to the like Effect.

But, besides the Equitable powers given by these sections, in aid, or in restraint, of proceedings in their own courts, the Act has, by its 91st section, conferred upon the "Superior Courts of Common Law, or any Judge thereof," the power of exercising, upon summary application, by rule or order, "Such and the like jurisdiction as may, under section 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, be exercised by any Court of Equity"—with respect to which provision, we shall only say, that, unless the intention be, ultimately, to consolidate the two jurisdictions in toto, we see no very definite reason for it, that would not apply to giving to the same Courts, the cognizance of Redemption and Foreclosure, Suits, or any other exclusively equitable jurisdiction.

The reproach to which Courts of Common Law were open of being able to afford no relief, except by damages, for breaches of duty and contract, and for other injuries, and of having no direct means of enforcing the observance of the one, been obliged to postpone the consideration of it to that page, for the reasons therein given.

---

* Section 514 of "the Merchant Shipping Act" (17, & 18 Vic. c. 104,) enacts that—"In cases where any liability has been or is alleged to have been incurred by any owner in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to ships, boats, or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, then, subject to the right hereinafter given to the Board of Trade of recovering damages in the United Kingdom, in respect of loss of life or personal injury, it shall be lawful in England or Ireland for the High Court of Chancery, and in Scotland for the Court of Session, and in any British possession, for any competent Court, to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner, for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability subject as aforesaid, and for the distribution of such amount rateably amongst the several claimants, with power for any such Court to stop all actions and suits pending in any other Court in relation to the same subject matter."

or of preventing the other, is mitigated, to a great extent, not only by the sections * relating to injunctions before mentioned, but also by sections 70, and 80, which we here insert, the former of them being followed, in the Act, by some subsidiary sections.†

LXX. The Plaintiff in any Action in any of the Superior Courts, except Replevin and Ejectment, may claim in the Writ of Summons and Plaint, either together with any other Demand which may now be enforced in such Action or separately, a Writ of Mandamus commanding the Defendant to fulfil any Duty in the Fulfilment of which the Plaintiff is personally interested.

LXXX. The Court or a Judge shall have Power, if they or he see fit so to do, upon the Application of the Plaintiff in any Action for the Detention of any Chattel, to order that Execution shall issue for the Return of the Chattel detained, without giving the Defendant the Option of retaining such Chattel upon paying the Value assessed, and that if the said Chattel cannot be found, and unless the Court or a Judge should otherwise order, the Sheriff shall distrain the Defendant by all his Lands and Chattels in the said Sheriff's Bailiwick till the Defendant render such Chattel, or, at the Option of the Plaintiff, that he cause to be made of the Defendant's Goods the assessed Value of such Chattel; provided that the Plaintiff shall, either by the same or a separate Writ of Execution, be entitled to have made of the Defendant's Goods the Damages, Costs, and Interest in such Action.

The new remedies for breach of contract, however, are confined to those by injunction (when applicable) as given by sections 81 and 84, for, although it might, at first, appear, that section 70 confers a power of enforcing the specific performance of contracts, such does not seem to be the true construction of it, for (as a very clear writer observes, with reference to the analogous section, in the English Act.‡)

It is submitted, that no such power is given, and, that the words "duty in which &c.," do not include duties resulting from express private contracts between two parties, and for breach of which an action of tort lies, (see Boorman v. Browns, 3. Q. B. 511), but is confined to another class of cases, where a private wrong is occasioned by the non-fulfilment of some official duty, or one imposed by Act of Parliament, for the benefit of individuals; as, for instance, where a private company, which has the option of taking land, gives a notice, under an Act of Parliament, to treat. This would be held a declaration of their option to take, and a contract of purchase, of which the Court would compel specific performance. (See per Patterson, J. in R. v. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, 15. Q. B. 774.)

* Pages 717, 718, 719, and 720.

† Sections 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, and 76.

‡ Section 68. See "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," by Holland and Chandless, 245.

We are further informed, by the same authority—

That a clause expressly empowering Courts of Law to grant specific performance of contracts, was struck out of this Act, in the House of Lords, on the ground, that it would not be advisable to give the Court such a power. The right, therefore, sought to be enforced, and the 'duty in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is personally interested,' remain the same; the same demand and refusal are necessary, before commencing the action under those sections, as were, heretofore, required, before moving for the rule for a writ of Mandamus; and the discretion of the Court, in granting, or withholding, the Mandamus, has been carefully preserved, by Section 71,† which empowers the Court, if it shall see fit, to issue the peremptory writ. The novelties introduced are, that the proceedings for a Mandamus, to enforce the performance of a duty, in which an individual is personally concerned, may be commenced, in any one of the Superior Courts;‡ and, that the machinery of an ordinary action is to be applied to such proceedings. There is, further, a new provision, in Section 74§ empowering the Court, besides, or instead of, proceeding by attachment, to cause the work to be done by the plaintiff, or some other person, at the expense of the defendant.

Even before the passing of "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," however, there had been long a tendency to apply the operation of writs of Mandamus—which, originally, were strictly confined to cases, where relief was required in respect of the infringement of some public right, or duty—to the enforcement of the rights of private individuals; the progress of which tendency is well described, in the following passage, from the second Report of the Common Law Commissioners, which may be interesting to our readers. The Commissioners say:—

It is true that besides the proceeding by action at law, there exists, in cases where a public inconvenience or private wrong is occasioned by the omission of a public or official duty, or one imposed by Act of Parliament for the benefit of individuals, and no sufficient remedy is afforded by action for damages, a process, by the writ of Mandamus, to compel the performance of the particular duty. This proceeding is not common to all the Courts, but peculiar to the Court of Queen's Bench; and it appears to have been, originally,

* See "The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854," by Holland and Chandless, 245.

† Section 73, in the Irish Act.

‡ The power of enforcing the performance of duties, by Mandamus, was before confined to the Court of Queen's Bench, and is still confined to it, in cases not coming within these sections, its previous powers being left untouched. See sec. 77, of the Irish Act.

§ Section 76 in the Irish Act.

confined, in its operation, to a very limited class of cases, affecting the administration of public affairs; such as the election of corporate officers, the restoration of officers improperly removed, the compelling inferior Courts to proceed with matters within their jurisdiction, or public officers to perform duties imposed upon them by common law or by statute, as to make a rate or the like; and there can be little doubt that the extreme hardship arising out of the defect in the law which we have pointed out, was one considerable motive for the extension of the remedy in recent times to cases in which the rights of private individuals, only, were concerned.

The Mandamus given by the Act is, therefore, nothing else than a modification of the Prerogative Mandamus, peculiar to the Court of Queen's Bench, for which reason, although it precedes, and is referred to, by section 81,* relating to injunction, we have reserved its consideration for this place, in conformity with the classification of the sections, which we have chosen, it not properly coming under any head of Equitable Jurisdiction. And section 80 we have likewise reserved, for a similar reason—it being merely an improvement on the old proceedings in Detinue.

We next invite attention to sections 63, 64, 65 and 66, which speak for themselves.

LXIII. It shall be lawful for a Judge, upon the ex-parte Application of a Judgment Creditor, and upon Affidavit by himself or his Attorney stating that Judgment has been recovered, and that it is still unsatisfied, and to what Amount, and that any other Person is indebted to the Judgment Debtor, and is within the Jurisdiction, to order that all Debts owing or accruing from such Third Person (herein-after called the Garnishee) to the Judgment debtor, shall be attached to answer the Judgment Debt; and by the same or any subsequent Order it may be ordered that the Garnishee shall appear before the Judge or Master, as such Judge shall appoint, to show Cause why he should not pay the Judgment Creditor the Debt due from him to the Judgment Debtor, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the Judgment Debt.

LXIV. Service of an Order that Debts due or accruing to the Judgment Debtor shall be attached, or Notice thereof to the Garnishee, in such Manner as the Judge shall direct, shall bind such Debts in his Hands.

LXV. If the Garnishee does not forthwith pay into Court the Amount due from him to the Judgment Debtor, or an Amount equal to the Judgment Debt, and does not dispute the Debt due or claimed to be due from him to the Judgment Debtor, or if he does not appear upon Summons, then the Court or a Judge may order Execution to issue, and it may be sued forth accordingly, without any previous Writ or Process, to levy the Amount due from such Garnishee towards Satisfaction of the Judgment Debt.

---

* Pages 719, and 720.

LXVI. If the Garnishee disputes his Liability, the Court or a Judge, instead of making an Order that Execution shall issue, may order that the Judgment Creditor shall be at liberty to proceed against the Garnishee by Writ, Calling upon him to show Cause why there should not be Execution against him for the alleged Debt, or for the Amount due to the Judgment Debtor, if less than the Judgment Debt, and for Costs of Suit; and the Proceedings upon such Suit shall be the same, as nearly as may be, as upon a Writ of Revivor issued under "The Common Law Procedure Act" Amendment Act, Ireland, 1853."

That the principle enunciated by these sections, of the judgment creditor being entitled to seek satisfaction of his own debt, out of those due to his debtor, is, in the abstract, just, no man can doubt; but, that, suddenly applied, in its present shape, to existing interests, in this country, it will be found productive of much utility, we certainly entertain very great misgivings. In fact, we forebode from it, the two following very serious evils—first, that it will encourage fraudulent collusion, between debtors and creditors, for the purpose of exacting the payment of doubtful or imaginary debts, from third parties, by false or distorted statements—and, secondly, that it will act as a check upon commercial intercourse, by preventing, not the giving (hitherto the grand impediment) but, what is just as formidable, the taking of credit. Men will, henceforth, be exposed not only to the process of their own creditors, but to that of the creditors of those creditors, likewise; the peril of which position, it is reasonable to suppose, will cause many a speculation to be nipped in the bud, which, if allowed to reach maturity, might yield wealth to its promoters, and comfort to a whole neighbourhood of our laboring population. With respect to debts charged on land, the owners whereof are also personally liable, it is difficult to say, how these sections will operate; but, it is to be feared, that, unless the Common Law Judges use, in administering them, a discretion, tantamount almost to an equitable jurisdiction (such as perhaps the legislature meant to give them, by using no imperative words, in their regard, therein), mortgagors and judgment debtors will, sometimes, find themselves assailed, for the recovery of the amount of tradesman's bills, and such other debts, due by their creditors, notwithstanding that they had paid them, punctually, the interest on their loans, and that they had taken those loans, without suspecting, that they could ever be subjected to such molestation.—section 63 making no distinction, as to the debts chargeable in the hands of the Garnishee, or for which he is to be made liable, by sections 65 and 66, and consequently, including everything that amounts to a legal debt! So far as decisions have, as yet, gone, we are glad to observe, that the learned judges are disposed to construe these sections strictly, in favour of the Garnishee, requiring the applicant to make out a clearer case against him, than can, possibly, in many cases, be made out in Ireland, where there exists no statutable machinery, for previously discovering the debts due to the judgment debtor—section 60 of the English Act of 1854, which provides such machinery, by the oral examination of that debtor, being, by a curious omission, not inserted in the Act before us.

---

* This mistake occurs in the original section.

Mentioning two more sections of this Act of Parliament—viz., section 93, which enables the Court or a Judge, to compel the abandonment of actions, by reason of the death of parties, in certain cases, and section 97, which is a re-enactment of the well known 40th section of the Civil Bill Act, 14 and 15 Vic. Chap. 57, repealed by “The Common Law Procedure Amendment Act (Ireland) 1858,” we now conclude our examination of its provisions, repeating, what we said, in the commencement of this article, that it contains “the germs of some improvement, in our legal system,” but that, still, what with its omissions, which we have pointed out, and, what with the inaccuracy and insufficiency of some of its enactments, it is one of those hastily conceived, and ill-digested pieces of legislation, of which “Modern Law Reforms” exhibit but too many samples. Its very title, which ought to be (as Lord Coke says of a preamble)\* “a good mean to find the meaning of a statute,” is insufficient for that purpose, for that title being, “An Act farther to amend the procedure in, and enlarge the jurisdiction of, the Superior Courts of Common Law, in Ireland,” and thereby indicating, that the Act refers only to those Courts, the 14th section,† notwithstanding, includes, and confers a new jurisdiction upon, our Courts of Equity, and fifteen different sections are, by the 98th section,‡ extended, some to every Court of civil, and the rest, to every Court of civil and criminal, judicature, in this country. Now, we protest against this species of legislation. When institutions are affected by any section of an Act of Parliament, it ought to be shown, that they are so, either by that section itself, or by the title, or preamble, of the Act containing it. Yet, here are fifteen sections of an Act having no preamble, which apply to all our inferior, and twelve of them to all our criminal, tribunals, from not one of which sections, nor from the title of the Act, can it be gathered, that it so applies, nor is that fact disclosed, at all, save by the single section above mentioned, introduced among the 103 sections, of which the Act consists! This is quite of a piece with the partial extension to Ireland of the Act of 1854, on which we have commented.\* We must say, that such half-concealed extensions are, too frequent amongst our laws, and are the causes of much of their obscurity and complication. Such faults as they, however, are not, generally attributable to the framers of our Acts of Parliament, so much as to the system by which they are carried through the Legislature, when, after each of several members, has introduced, in committee, his own amendment of the bill—one altering a phrase, another adding a section, and another striking out a sentence, or a word—there exists no public officer, on whom it is incumbent to see, that all those variations quadrate with each other, and that the entire measure is not alone consistent with itself, and with existing laws, but clear in its expression, and convenient in its shape. Until such an officer is appointed, it is needless to expect, that, amidst the mountains of legislation, which every session heaps together—like Pelion upon Ossa, and both upon Olympus—any reasonable degree of order or uniformity can prevail; and it is, therefore, that we highly commend Mr. Napier's project of establishing a "Minister of Public Justice," whose duties would embrace the foregoing, with other tasks. Such an officer is possessed by other nations, who do not want him so much as we do. Let us hope, that their example will be followed amongst us, and that so manifest a deficiency will be soon supplied! "Legum custodiam nullam habemus. —Græci nec diligentius, apud quos  $\pi\rho\sigma\phi\lambda\alpha\kappa\tau\epsilon\varsigma$  creantur: nec hi solum litteras (nam id quidem etiam apud majores nostros erat) sed etiam facta hominum observabant, ad legesque revocabant."†

---

* Co. Litt. 70, a.      † Page 711.      ‡ Pages 710 & 711.

---

* Page 701.

† Cic. De Leg. Lib. 3.

ART. III.—WOMAN'S WORK.

1. Sisters of Charity, Catholic and Protestant, at Home and Abroad. By Mrs. Jameson. Second Edition. London: Longman and Co. 1855.
2. The Communion of Labour: a Second Lecture on the Social Employments of Women. By Mrs. Jameson. London: Longman and Co. 1856.
3. National Education; its Present State and Prospects. By Frederic Hill. 2 Vols. London: Charles Knight. 1836.

There is an old legend telling that Saint Mona had a harp which, touched by the fingers of the Saint, gave out the sweetest and most melodious music, but, struck by stranger hands, the strings jarred and jangled into wildest dissonance. Whilst reading and noting the two latest works of Mrs. Jameson, and which we have placed first as the subjects of this paper, the old legend has frequently come back upon our memory, and we have thought how truly that harp, touched by the Saint, is typical of the peculiar and ever-charming manner in which, in all their phases and forms, Mrs. Jameson has made the heart, life, passion, feeling, duty, rights and wrongs of women her own admitted subject of description and of commentary. Other women have essayed to be the champions or the advocates of their sex, but the fine strung harp has jarred beneath their fingers, and recovers its tone only at the touch of its mistress.

And yet in all her works, devoted to this subject—Woman—in all from the Characteristics of Woman, to The Loves of the Poets, from the Common Place Book* to these volumes now before us, Mrs. Jameson is never “a woman’s rights” advocate; she is as far removed from Lady Mary Montague, as from Mary Wollstonecraft, from Miss Martineau as from Mrs. Bloomer—she is, in fact and in brief, that which she should ever best be—Mistress Anna Jameson. It is not her eloquence, it is not her good sense, it is not the ever fresh illustrations of her subject, it is not the truth and beauty around and over her thoughts and fancies, it is not any or all of these that make her books, precious as they are good, and brilliant as they are precious—it is in the full deep-hearted womanly feeling evinced in each, the great moral of all teaches us how truly she, as Alda, in the Introduction to the Characteristics, declares to Medon :—

---

* For a review of this volume, see IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW. Vol. V. No. 17, p. 173.

“ I have endeavoured to illustrate the various modifications of which the female character is susceptible, with their causes and results. My life has been spent in observing and thinking ; I have had, as you well know, more opportunities for the first, more leisure for the last, than have fallen to the lot of most people. What I have seen, felt, thought, suffered, has led me to form certain opinions. It appears to me that the condition of women in society, as at present constituted, is false in itself, and injurious to them,—that the education of women, as at present conducted, is founded in mistaken principles, and tends to increase fearfully the sum of misery and error in both sexes.”

Twenty-six years have passed since these truths were written ; great triumphs in science, in art, in all things, have been the achievements of our Nation since that period, but the quarter of a century has done, comparatively, little to ameliorate the evils indicated in that portion of the last quoted passage, which we have placed in italics—and still may the cynic snarl, with too frequent proof, the sweet, suffering Isabella's rely to Angelo—

“ Women ! help Heaven ! men their creation mar
In profiting by them.”

Mrs. Jameson has no beautiful utopian views of woman's perfect and sublimated existence in regions beyond our work-day sphere. No bright particular star-world, whose violet robed doctresses and deep-cyed deanesses shall rule the girl sophisters, like the fair fancies of The Princess. She contemplates none of these things, she confines, and wisely confines, herself to the solution of these following questions,—“ Whether a more enlarged sphere of social work may not be allowed to woman in perfect accordance with the truest feminine instincts ? Whether there be not a possibility of her sharing practically in the responsibilities of social, as well as domestic life ? Whether she might not be better prepared to meet and exercise such higher responsibilities ? And whether such communion of labor might not lead to the more humane ordering of many of our public institutions, to a purer standard of morals, to a better mutual comprehension and a finer harmony between men and women, when thus called upon to work together, and (in combining what is best in the two natures) becoming what God intended them to be, the supplement to each other?"*

Mrs. Jameson will not allow that man is to be the worker and woman the dreamer—they must be, and in our mind she shows how they can be, thoroughly and throughly "the supplement to each other",—in the education of those girls who will one day be the women of our country; in softening the agony of sickness, or in tending the closing hours of life; in the gaol amongst men and women, making a sunshine in the blackness, not of the prison cell, but of the prisoner's mind and heart, teaching as man cannot teach, so gracefully or so gently, that the world is not all hard, unforgiving, and careless of those against whom law and society are often more unjust in punishing than they, the prisoners, are guilty in offending. In the Reformatory woman can aid; there, amidst the young of both sexes, is a place peculiarly the sphere of woman, a place which has been already so nobly filled by Mary Carpenter. In the Asylum for the fallen penitent woman, is a mission where woman may minister as Christ himself has taught we should minister, in tenderness, in forgiveness, and in humble recollection of our own imperfect following of our exemplar. In all these phases of life, working out the glory of God and the happiness of our neighbour, lies the Communion of Labor; in these duties we learn the great truth, Laborare est Orare, whilst we blot out "the chronicles of wasted time," and man and woman work in unity of purpose at last, "and," in Mrs. Jameson's eloquent words, "combining what is best in the two natures, become what God intended them to be, the supplement to each other."

These are not the sentiments of a woman's rights advocate. Woman is not to be man's guide or mistress, she is to be a part of his being and existence; they are to work together, to be "the supplement" to each other. She writes:—

Morally a woman has a right to the free and entire development of every faculty which God has given her to be improved and used to His honour. Socially she has a right to the protection of equal laws; the right to labour with her hands the thing that is good; to select the kind of labour which is in harmony with her condition and her powers; to exist, if need be, by her labour, or to profit others by it if she choose. These are her rights, not more nor less than the rights of the man. Let us therefore put aside all futile and unreal distinctions. I go back to the principle laid down in my former Lecture, and I appeal against human laws and customs, to the eternal and immutable law of God. When He created all living creatures male and female, was it not His will that out of this very disparity in unity, this likeness in unlikeness, there should spring an indissoluble bond of mutual attraction and mutual dependence, increasing in degree and durability with every advance of sentient life? And when He raised us, His human creatures, above mere animal existence, did He not make the union, by choice and will, of the men and the woman the basis of all domestic life? all domestic life the basis of all social life? all social life the basis of all national life? How, then, shall our social and national life be pure and holy, and well ordered before God and man, if the domestic affections and duties be not carried out, and expanded, and perfected in the larger social sphere, and in the same spirit of mutual reverence, trust, and kindness which we demand in the primitive relation? It appears to me that when the Creator endowed the two halves of the human race with ever-aspiring hopes, with ever-widening sympathies, with ever-progressive capacities,—when He made them equal in the responsibilities which bind the conscience and in the temptations which mislead the will,—He linked them inseparably in an ever-extending sphere of duties, and an ever-expanding communion of affections; thus, in one simple, holy, and beautiful ordinance, binding up at once the continuation of the species and its moral, social, and physical progress, through all time.

---

See "The Communion of Labour," p. 3.

Let these premises be granted, and hence it follows as a first natural and necessary result, and one which the wisest philosophers have admitted, that the relative position of the man and the woman in any community is invariably to be taken as a test of the degree of civilisation and well-being in that community. Hence, as a second result equally natural and necessary, we find that all that extends and multiplies the innocent relations, the kindly sympathies, the mutual services of men and women, must lead to the happiness and improvement of both. Hence, thirdly, if either men or women arrogate to themselves exclusively any of the social work or social privileges which can be performed or exercised perfectly only in communion, they will inevitably fail in their objects, and end probably in corrupting each other. Hence, in conclusion, this last inevitable result; that wherever the nature of either man or woman is considered as self-dependent or self-sufficing, their rights and wrongs as distinct, their interests as opposed or even capable of separation, there we find cruel and unjust laws, discord and confusion entering into all the forms of domestic and social life, and the element of decay in all our institutions. In the midst of our apparent material prosperity, let some curious or courageous hand lift up but a corner of that embroidered pall which the superficial refinement of our privileged and prosperous classes has thrown over society, and how we recoil from the revelation of what lies seething and festering beneath! How we are startled by glimpses of hidden pain, and covert vice, and horrible wrongs done and suffered! Then come strange trials before our tribunals, polluting the public mind. Then are great blue books piled up before Parliament, filled with reports of inspectors and committees. Then eloquent newspaper articles are let off like rockets into an abyss, just to show the darkness—and expire. Then have we fitful, clamorous bursts of popular indignation and remorse; hasty partial remedies for antiquated mischiefs; clumsy tinkering of barbarous and inadequate laws;—then the vain attempt to solder together undeniable truths and admitted falsehoods into some brittle, plausible compromise;—then at last the slowly awakening sense of a great want aching deep down at the heart of society, throbbing upwards and outwards with a quicker and a quicker pulse; and then—what then? What if this great want, this something which we crave and seek, be in a manner a part of ourselves?—lying so near to us, so close at our feet, that we have overlooked and lost it in reaching after the distant, the difficult, the impracticable?*

These lectures, it must be remembered, were delivered to a circle of private friends and at their request, and in each volume Mrs. Jameson keeps clearly before her audience, or readers, that the last quoted passages express her views and opinions without conditions or reservations. She holds that what women have done in other countries, women may accomplish in England. She will not admit that Catholicity is better adopted for the development of woman's work than Protestantism. She contends that the Catholic Church wisely turns every bent of the human mind to the service of God, and she is right. Thus it is that active charity has its home amongst the Sisters of Charity and the Sisters of Mercy; thus it is that in another branch it is found amongst the Béguines; thus it is that he who fears to take upon him the great office of Priest may become the instructor of youth amongst the Christian Brothers; thus it is that Angela of Brescia, mourning over the loss of her dead sister, for the love of that sister's memory becomes the instructress of young girls; imitated by Françoise de Saintonge, her work goes on, and from the garret of Dijon, with its five poor girl scholars, springs up the noble Order of Ursulines, who are to women as the Jesuits to men, the best instructors in all that makes men or women what God intended they should be, his servants in their own peculiar spheres.†

---

* See "The Communion of Labour," p. 17.

† The following passage from "The Ursuline Manual," the ordinary prayer book of those educated by the Ursuline Nuns in these Kingdoms, reads like one of Mrs. Jameson's own thoughtful pages:—

Truly the Catholic Church does turn each bent of mind to the service of God ; and in Angela and in Ignatius, in Dominick and in Francis Xavier, in Vincent de Paul and in Philip Neri, in every order by which she gains servants for God and soldiers for his Church, the abiding, ruling spirit of Catholicity is, to secure volunteers for each particular branch of the Church militant, ever combining what is best in the natures of men and women, making them thus, what God intended they should be, "the supplement to each other."

Thus it is the Catholic Church has ever acted, but thus it is not that the Protestant Church has acted, and why ? Thus Mrs. Jameson replies : —

---

"Consider that the hidden life of Jesus Christ is a model which you should continually study, because it was during those years that Jesus has given you an example, that you should follow his footsteps. (1 Peter, ii. 21.) During thirty years of subjection and labour, Jesus deigned, in a peculiar manner, to become the model of all Christians. Contemplate that model attentively, and consider with astonishment, that he who had descended from heaven to instruct, convert, and save the whole universe, employed the greater part of his life in seclusion ; showing no otherwise the perfection of the Divinity which resided in him, than by obeying his parents, serving and assisting them, and fulfilling in all things the will of his heavenly Father. The accomplishment of that adorable will was the only object of his most vehement desires ; it was so necessary to his happiness, that he himself declared it to be his food, the support of his existence, the end of his mission on earth. This pure, upright and divine intention of accomplishing the will of God, so dignified and enhanced the merit of our Redeemer's actions, that one word, one sigh, one tear, one thought of Jesus Christ, was more meritorious in the sight of God, than the labours and austerities of all the saints. Learn then, from the hidden life of Jesus, that lesson of perfect conformity to the will of God, by which alone you can resemble him, and attain true sanctity. Resolve, in every stage of your life, to place all your perfection in being about the business of your heavenly Father ; that is, in faithfully discharging the duties which Providence has allotted you, whatever they may be. If you be firmly convinced that this faithful, cheerful, persevering discharge of duty, is true sanctity, and a real imitation of Jesus Christ, you will carefully avoid that disedifying system of devotion pursued by many of your sex, who say long prayers ; spend, or rather lose much time in chapels ; who frequent the sacraments, yet whose hands are empty before God, because they do their own will, and not his ; because their devotion is little better than sloth, which leads them, under cover of piety, to neglect those domestic duties which God had allotted them, and which should be their conscientious pursuit and their glory.—(See the Holy Woman, Prov. xxxi. 10.)"—See "The Ursuline Manual, or a Collection of Prayers, Spiritual Exercises, &c., interspersed with the various Instructions necessary for Forming Youth to the Practice of solid Piety, arranged for the Young Ladies educated at the Ursuline Convent, Cork." Dublin: 1847, p. 258. This book is sold by all Catholic booksellers in Ireland.

In England it is not the form of Christianity we profess which is against such an organisation of feminine aid in good works as I would advocate ;—God forbid ! Yet some of our greatest difficulties may be ascribed to the deep-rooted puritanical prejudices bequeathed to us by our ancestors. It is worth considering that the first effect of the Calvinistic reaction against the dominant Church, and against the errors, and exaggerations, and gross materialism which had been connected with the worship of the Virgin Mother, was not favourable to women. In the earlier times of the Christian Church, whenever certain women distinguished themselves by particular sanctity or charity, or exercised any especial moral or intellectual influence, the Church absorbed them, claimed them, held them up to reverence during life and canonised them after death ; and still their beautiful images shine upon us from our cathedral windows, or stand out in sculptured forms in all the dignity of their hallowed office and venerable religious attributes. But after these fair superstitions had been abrogated by the severity of the early reformers, and were succeeded by the strongest prejudice against women exercising any kind of open and authorised religious or spiritual influence, still there were women who did exercise such influence—the natural power of strong intellect, or strong enthusiasm. The superiority could not be denied ; but as it could no longer be referred to a larger measure of heavenly gifts, it must be derived from demoniac power. Men had repudiated angels and saints, but they still devoutly believed in devils and witches. The benign miracles of female charity were the inventions and impositions of a lying priesthood ; but woe unto him who doubted in the power of an old woman to ride on a broomstick, or of a young woman to entertain Satan as her emissary in mischief ! All the women who perished by judicial condemnation for heresy in the days of the inquisition did not equal the number of women condemned judicially as witches—hanged, tortured, burned, drowned like mad dogs—in the first century of the Reformed Church ; and these horrors were enacted in the most civilised countries in Europe, by grave magistrates and ecclesiastics, who were proud of having thrown off the Roman yoke, and of reading their Bibles, where apparently they found as many texts in favour of burning witches as ever did the Inquisitors in favour of burning heretics. It was characteristic of the two diverging superstitions, that in the former age Dante conceived his Beatrice as the type of loving, wise, and spiritual womanhood, leading her lover into Paradise ; while Milton's type of female attraction was Eve, the temptress to sin and death. The time is come, let us hope, when men have found out what we may truly be to them, not worshipping us as saints, or apostrophising us as angels, or persecuting us as witches, or crushing us as slaves ; revering us for that power we are allowed to possess, not jealous of it, nor throwing it into some indirect or unhealthy form ; profiting by our tenderness, not oppressing us because of it ; taking us to themselves as helpers in all social good, not leaving our undirected energies to wear away our own lives, and sometimes trouble theirs.

It is better than a dozen sermons on toleration, to count up the women who, during this half-century, have left the strongest and most durable impress on society—on the minds and the hearts of their generation. First, there is Mrs. Fry, the Quakeress, to whom we owe the cleansing of our prisons, and in part the reform of our criminal code; Caroline Chisholm, the Roman Catholic, with her strong common sense, her decision and independence of character, who may be said to have reformed the system of emigration; Mary Carpenter, the Dissenter, who has become an authority in all that concerns the treatment of juvenile delinquents; and Florence Nightingale, the Churchwoman, who in our time has opened a new path for female charity and female energy. And let us remember that there is not one of these four admirable women who has not been assailed in turn by the bitterest animosity, by the most vulgar, so-called religious abuse from those who differed from them in their religious tenets, or from those who contemned them and would have put them down merely as women; not one of them who has not outlived prejudice and jealousy; not one of them who could have carried out their large and beneficent views without the aid of generous and enlightened men,—men who had the nobleness of mind to accept them as fellow-workers in the cause of humanity, to admit them on equal terms into the communion of labour and the communion of charity.

The chief portions of Mrs. Jameson's Lectures are devoted to a detail of the various institutions of the continent in which women are employed, and amongst these Hospitals and Prisons are, of course, the most prominent. She shows what has been done abroad, she shows what has not been done at home, and from various portions of the two books we condense the following eloquent descriptions:—

It is in the seventh century that we find these communities of charitable women first mentioned under a particular appellation. We read in history that when Landry, Bishop of Paris, about the year 650, founded an hospital, since known as the Hotel Dieu, as a general refuge for disease and misery, he placed it under the direction of the Hospitalières, or nursing-sisters of that time,—women whose services are understood to have been voluntary, and undertaken from motives of piety. Innocent IV., who would not allow of any outlying religious societies, collected and united these hospital-sisters under the rule of the Augustine Order, making them amenable to the government and discipline of the Church. The novitiate or training of a Sœur Hospitalière was of twelve years' duration, after which she was allowed to make her profession. At that time, and even earlier, we find many hospitals expressly founded for the reception of the sick pilgrims and wounded soldiers returning from the East, and bringing with them strange and hitherto unknown forms of disease and suffering. Some of the largest hospitals in France and the Netherlands originated in this purpose, and were all served by the Hospitalières; and to this day the Hotel Dieu, with its one thousand beds, the hospital of St. Louis, with its seven hundred beds, and that of La Pitié, with its six hundred beds, are served by the same sisterhood, under whose care they were originally placed centuries ago.

For about five hundred years the institution of the Dames or Sœurs Hospitalières remained the only one of its kind. During this period it had greatly increased its numbers, and extended all through western Christendom; still it did not suffice for the wants of the age; and the thirteenth century, fruitful in all those results which a combination of wide-spread suffering and religious ferment naturally produces, saw the rise of another community of compassionate women destined to exercise a far wider influence. These were the Sœurs Grises or Grey Sisters, so called at first, from the original colour of their dress. Their origin was this:—the Franciscans (and other regular orders) admitted into their community a third or secular class, who did not seclude themselves in cloisters, who took no vows of celibacy, but were simply bound to submit to certain rules and regulations, and united together in works of charity, devoting themselves to visiting the sick in the hospitals or at their own homes, and doing good wherever and whenever called upon. Women of all classes were enrolled in this sisterhood. Queens, princesses, ladies of rank, wives of burghers, as well as poor widows and maidens. The higher class and the married women occasionally served; the widows and unmarried devoted themselves almost entirely to the duties of nursing the sick in the hospitals. Gradually it became a vocation apart, and a novitiate or training of from one to three years was required to fit them for their profession.

The origin of the Béguines, so well known in Flanders, is uncertain; but they seem to have existed as hospital sisters in the seventh century, and to have been settled in communities at Liege and elsewhere in 1173. They wear a particular dress, (the black gown, and white hood,) but take no vows, and may leave the community at any time,—a thing which rarely happens.

No one who has travelled in Flanders, visited Ghent, Bruges, Brussels, or indeed any of the Netherlandish towns, will forget the singular appearance of these, sometimes young and handsome, but always staid, respectable-looking women, walking about protected by the universal reverence of the people, and busied in their compassionate vocation. In their few moments of leisure the Béguines are allowed to make lace and cultivate flowers, and they act under a strict self-constituted government, maintained by strict traditional forms. All the hospitals in Flanders are served by these Béguines. They have besides, attached to their houses, hospitals of their own, with a medical staff of physicians and surgeons, under whose direction, in all cases of difficulty, the sisters administer relief; and of the humility, skill, and tenderness with which they do administer it, I have never heard but one opinion; nor did I ever meet with any one who had travelled in those countries who did not wish that some system of the kind could be transferred to England.

In the fifteenth century (about 1443), when Flanders was under the dominion of the Dukes of Burgundy, a few of the Béguines were summoned from Bruges to Beaune to take charge of the great hospital founded there by Rollin, the Chancellor of Philip the Good.

They were soon joined by others from the neighbouring districts' and this community of nurses obtained the name of Sœurs de Ste. Marthe, Sisters of St. Martha. It is worth notice that Martha, who is represented in Scripture as troubled about household cares while her sister Mary "sat at the feet of Jesus, and heard his words," was early chosen as the patroness of those who, instead of devoting themselves to a cloistered life of prayer and contemplation, were bound by a religious obligation to active secular duties. The hospital of Beaune, one of the most extensive and best managed in France, is still served by these sisters. Many hospitals in the South of France, and three at Paris, are served by the same community.

In Germany, the Sisters of Charity are styled "Sisters of St. Elizabeth," in honour of that benevolent enthusiast, Elizabeth of Hungary, whose pathetic story and beautiful legend have been rendered familiar to us by Mr. Kingsley's drama. When Joseph II. suppressed the nunneries throughout Austria and Flanders, the Elizabethan Sisters, as well as the Béguines, were excepted by an especial decree, "because of the usefulness of their vocation." At Vienna, a few years ago, I had the opportunity, through the kindness of a distinguished physician, of visiting one of the houses of these Elizabethan Sisters.—There was an hospital attached to it of fifty beds, which had received about 450 patients during the year. Nothing could exceed the propriety, order, and cleanliness, of the whole establishment. On the ground floor was an extensive "Pharmacie," a sort of Apothecaries' Hall; part of this was divided off by a long table or counter, and surrounded by shelves filled with drugs, much like an apothecary's shop; behind the counter two Sisters, with their sleeves tucked up, were busy weighing and compounding medicines, with such a delicacy, neatness, and exactitude as women use in these matters. On the outside of this counter, seated on benches or standing, were a number of sick and infirm, pale, dirty, ragged patients; and among them moved two other Sisters, speaking to each individually in a low gentle voice, and with a quiet authority of manner, that in itself had something tranquillising. A physician and surgeon, appointed by the Government, visited this hospital, and were resorted to in cases of difficulty or where operations were necessary. Here was another instance in which men and women worked together harmoniously and efficiently. Howard, in describing the principal hospital at Lyons, which he praises for its excellent and kindly management, as being "so clean and so quiet," tells us that, at that time (1776), he found it attended by nine physicians and surgeons, and managed by twelve Sisters of Charity. "There were Sisters who made up, as well as administered, all the medicine prescribed; for which purpose there was a laboratory and apothecary's shop, the neatest and most elegantly fitted up that can be conceived."

Louise de Marillac—better known as Madame Legras, when left a widow in the prime of life, could find, like Angela da Brescia, no better refuge from sorrow than in active duties, undertaken "for the love of God." She desired to join the Hospitalières, and was met at the outset by difficulties, and even horrors, which would have extinguished a less ardent vocation, a less determined will. She set herself to remedy the evils, instead of shrinking from them. She was assisted and encouraged in her good work by a man endued with great ability and piety, enthusiasm equal, and moral influence even superior, to her own. This was the famous Vincent de Paul, who had been occupied for years with a scheme to reform thoroughly the prisons and the hospitals of France. In Madame Legras he found a most efficient coadjutor. With her charitable impulses and religious enthusiasm, she united qualities not always, not often, found in union with them: a calm and patient temperament, and that administrative faculty, indispensable in those who are called to such privileged work. She was particularly distinguished by a power of selecting and preparing the instruments, and combining the means, through which she was to carry out her admirable purpose. With Vincent de Paul and Madame Legras was associated another person, Madame Goussaut, who besieged the Archbishop of Paris till what was refused to reason was granted to importunity, and they were permitted to introduce various improvements into the administration of the hospitals. Vincent de Paul and Louise Legras succeeded at last in constituting, not on a new, but on a renovated basis, the order of Hospitalières, since known as the Sisterhood of Charity. A lower class of sisters were trained to act under the direction of the more intelligent and educated women. Within twenty years this new community had two hundred houses and hospitals; in a few years more it had spread over all Europe. Madame Legras died in 1660. Already before her death the women prepared and trained under her instructions, and under the direction of Vincent de Paul (and here we have another instance of the successful communion of labour), had proved their efficiency on some extraordinary occasions. In the campaigns of 1652 and 1658 they were sent to the field of battle, in groups of two and four together, to assist the wounded. They were invited into the besieged towns to take charge of the military hospitals. They were particularly conspicuous at the siege of Dunkirk, and in the military hospitals established by Anne of Austria at Fontainebleau. When the plague broke out in Poland in 1672, they were sent to direct the hospitals at Warsaw, and to take charge of the orphans, and were thus introduced into Eastern Europe; and, stranger than all! they were even sent to the prison-infirmaries where the branded forçats and condemned felons lay cursing and writhing in their fetters. This was a mission for Sisters of Charity which may startle the refined, or confined, notions of Englishwomen in the nineteenth century. It is not, I believe, generally known in this country that the same experiment has been lately tried, and with success, in the prisons of Piedmont, where the Sisters were first employed to nurse the wretched criminals perishing with disease and despair; afterwards, and during convalescence, to read to them, to teach them to read and to knit, and in some cases to sing. The hardest of these wretches had probably some remembrance of a mother's voice and look thus recalled, or he could at least feel gratitude for sympathy from a purer, higher nature. As an element of reformation, I might almost say of regeneration, this use of the feminine influence has been found efficient where all other means had failed.

In my former lecture I mentioned several of the most famous of these hospitals: during my last visit to Paris I visited an hospital which I had not before seen,—the hospital Laborrissière, which appeared to me a model of all that a civil hospital ought to be, clean, airy, light, and lofty, above all, cheerful. I should observe that generally in the hospitals served by Sisters of Charity, there is ever an air of cheerfulness caused by their own sweetness of temper and voluntary devotion to their work. At the time that I visited this hospital it contained 612 patients, 300 men and 312 women, in two ranges of building divided by a very pretty garden. The whole interior management is entrusted to twenty-five trained Sisters of the same Order as those who serve the Hôtel-Dieu. There are besides about forty servants, men and women,—men to do the rough work, and male nurses to assist in the men's wards under the superintendence of the Sisters. There are three physicians and two surgeons in constant attendance, a steward or comptroller of accounts, and other officers. To complete this picture, I must add that the hospital Laborrissière was founded by a lady, a rich heiress, a married woman too, whose husband, after her death carried out her intentions to the utmost with zeal and fidelity. She had the assistance of the best architects in France to plan her building: medical and scientific men had aided her with their counsels. What the feminine instinct of compassion had conceived was by the manly intellect planned and ordered, and again by female aid administered. In all its arrangements this hospital appeared to me a perfect example of the combined working of men and women.

In contrast with this splendid foundation, I will mention another not less admirable in its way.

When I was at Vienna, I saw a small hospital belonging to the Sisters of Charity there. The beginning had been very modest, two of the Sisters having settled in a small old house. Several of the adjoining buildings were added one after the other, connected by wooden corridors: the only new part which had any appearance of being adapted to its purpose was the infirmary, in which were fifty-two patients, twenty-six men and twenty-six women, besides nine beds for cholera. There were fifty Sisters, of whom one-half were employed in the house, and the other half were going their rounds amongst the poor, or nursing the sick in private houses. There was a nursery for infants, whose mothers were at work; a day school for one hundred and fifty girls, in which only knitting and sewing were taught; all clean, orderly, and, above all, cheerful. There was a dispensary, where two of the Sisters were employed in making up prescriptions, homœopathic and allopathic. There was a large airy kitchen, where three of the Sisters with two assistants were cooking. There were two priests and two physicians. So that, in fact, under this roof we had the elements on a small scale of an English work-house; but very different was the spirit which animated it.

Before I leave Piedmont, I must mention two more hospitals, because of the contrast they afford, which will aptly illustrate the principle I am endeavouring to advocate.

The hospital of St. John at Vercelli, which I had the opportunity of inspecting minutely, left a strong impression on my mind. At the time I visited it, it contained nearly 400 patients. There was besides, in an adjacent building, a school and hospital for poor children. The whole interior economy of these two hospitals was under the management of eighteen women, with a staff of assistants both male and female. The superior, a very handsome, intelligent woman, had been trained at Paris, and had presided over this provincial hospital for eleven years. There was the same cheerfulness which I have had occasion to remark in all institutions where the religious and feminine elements were allowed to influence the material administration; and everything was exquisitely clean, airy, and comfortable. In this instance the dispensary (Pharmacie) was managed by apothecaries, and not by the women.

Now, in contrast with this hospital I will describe a famous hospital at Turin. It is a recent building, with all the latest improvements, and considered, in respect to fitness for its purpose, as a chef-d'œuvre of architecture. The contrivances and material appliances for the sick and convalescent were exhibited to me as the wonder and boast of the city: certainly they were most ingenious. The management was in the hands of a committee of gentlemen; under them a numerous staff of priests and physicians. Two or three female servants of the lowest class were sweeping and cleaning. In the convalescent wards I saw a great deal of card-playing. All was formal, cold, clean, and silent; no cheerful, kindly faces, no soft low voices, no light active figures were hovering round. I left the place with a melancholy feeling, shared as I found by those who were with me. One of them, an accomplished physician, felt and candidly acknowledged the want of female influence here.

One of the directors of the great military hospital at Turin told me that he regarded it as one of the best deeds of his life, that he had recommended, and carried through, the employment of the Sisters of Charity in this institution. Before the introduction of these ladies, the sick soldiers had been nursed by orderlies sent from the neighbouring barracks—men chosen because they were unfit for other work. The most rigid discipline was necessary to keep them in order; and the dirt, neglect, and general immorality were frightful. Any change was, however, resisted by the military and medical authorities, till the invasion of the cholera; then the orderlies became, most of them, useless, distracted, and almost paralysed with terror. Some devoted Sisters of Charity were introduced in a moment of perplexity and panic; then all went well—propriety, cleanliness, and comfort prevailed. “No day passes,” said my informant, “that I do not bless God for the change which I was the humble instrument of accomplishing in this place!”

Very similar was the information I received relative to the naval hospital at Genoa; but I had not the opportunity of visiting it.

Another excellent hospital at Turin, that of St. John, contained, when I visited it, 400 patients, a nearly equal number of men and women. There were, besides, a separate ward for sick children, and two wards containing about sixty “incurables”—the bedridden and helpless poor, of the same class which find refuge in our workhouses. The whole of this large establishment was under the management of twenty-two religious women, with a staff of about forty-five assistants, men and women, and a large number of medical men and students. All was clean, and neat, and cheerful. I was particularly struck by the neatness with which the food was served; men brought it up in large trays, but the ladies themselves distributed it. Some friends of the poor sick were near the beds. I remember being touched by the sight of a little dog which, with its fore-paws resting on the bed and a pathetic wistful expression in its drooping face, kept its eyes steadfastly fixed on the sick man; a girl was kneeling beside him, to whom one of the Sisters was speaking words of comfort.*

In this hospital and others I have found an excellent arrangement for the night-watch: it was a large sentry-box of an octagon shape, looking each way, the upper part all of glass, but furnished with curtains: and on a kind of dresser or table were arranged writing materials, all kinds of medicine and restoratives which might be required in haste, and a supply of linen, napkins, &c. Here two Sisters watched all night long; here the accounts were kept and the private business of the wards carried on in the daytime: a certain degree of privacy was thus secured for the ladies on duty when necessary. The Superior, whom we should call the matron, was an elderly woman, wearing the same simple convenient religious dress as the others, and only recognised by the large bunch of keys at her girdle.

The Marchese A——, one of the governors of the Hospice de la Maternité, described to me in terms of horror the state in which he had found the establishment when under the management of a board of governors who employed hired matrons and nurses. At last, in despair, he sent for some trained Sisters, ten of whom, with a Superior, now directed the whole in that spirit of order, cheerfulness, and unremitting attention, which belongs to them. The Marchese particularly dwelt on their economy. "We cannot," said he, "give them unlimited means (des fonds à discretion), for these good ladies think that all should go to the poor; but if we allow them a fixed sum, we find they can do more with that sum than we could have believed possible, and they never go beyond it: they are admirable accountants and economists."

---

* Go into yon spacious hospital, provided with all that wealth, and skill, and knowledge can combine to heal or to ameliorate bodily suffering: see the floors how clean, the linen how spotless, the beds how comfortable! the most celebrated of our surgeons and physicians are in attendance; students from every part of England crowd thither;—it is one of the best of our medical schools. Let us approach a bed;—it is a poor pale girl, dying of a slow decline; she has been stretched there for eleven months; the chaplain duly visits her once or twice a week in her turn, for he has about five hundred other human souls to attend to. The physician, as he goes his rounds, pats her on the head; asks her, in a tone of unusual pity, the usual questions; then, perhaps, turns to two or three students who follow him, and almost aloud expresses his wonder to find her still alive. The nurse duly administers the prescription, and on pain of dismissal sees that every want is attended to. Is nothing else needed? Is anything else supplied? A melancholy religious tract, perhaps; but for the spontaneous action of mind upon mind,—for tender, human, sympathising love,—for help to the sinking spirit,—where are they? It is no answer to appeal to individual cases; to cite one or two hospitals, in which thoughtful and kindly women of the higher classes have been permitted to visit;—in which the superior intellect and administrative faculties of the matron for the time being have exercised an improving influence. These are the exceptions; and until larger, higher principles of action are generally recognised, they will continue to be accidental exceptions to the prevalence of a narrow-minded mechanical system.—See Sisters of Charity. Preface, p. vi.

I could relate much more of what I have seen in hospitals at home and abroad: but this Lecture is intended to be suggestive only, and for this purpose I have said enough. Yet, before I pass on to another part of my subject, I must be allowed to make one or two observations on the testimony before me relative to the moral and medical efficiency of the lady-nurses sent to the East.

In the midst of many differences of opinion, in one thing all are agreed: all to whom I have spoken, without one exception, bear witness to the salutary influence exercised by the lady-nurses over the men, and the submission and gratitude of the patients. In the most violent attacks of fever and delirium, when the orderlies could not hold them down in their beds, the mere presence of one of these ladies, instead of being exciting, had the effect of instantly calming the spirits and subduing the most refractory. It is allowed also that these ladies had the power to repress swearing and bad and coarse language; to prevent the smuggling of brandy and raki into the wards; to open the hearts of the sullen and desperate to contrition and responsive kindness. The facts are recorded, and remain uncontradicted; but the natural inference to be drawn from them does not seem to have struck our medical men.

With regard to the feeling between the nurses and the patients, here is a page of testimony which can hardly be read without emotion.

"We have attended many hundreds of the sick in the British army, suffering under every form of disease—the weary, wasting, low typhus fever or dysentery; or the agonies of the frost bite; and they were surrounded by every accumulation of misery. For the fevered lips there was no cooling drink, for the sinking frame no strengthening food, for the wounded limb no soft pillow, for many no watchful hands to help; but never did we hear a murmur pass their lips. Those whose privilege it was to nurse them noticed only obedience to orders, respectful gratitude, patience, and the most self-denying consideration for those who ministered. Even when in an apparently dying state they would look up in our faces and smile."

She adds in another place, with deep natural feeling, "It was so sad to see them die one after another; we learned to love them so!"

"We were trained" she says, "under the hospital nurses at home receiving our instruction from them; and what we saw there of disobedience to medical orders and cruelty to patients would fill pages, and make you shudder." "More of evil language was heard in one hour in a London hospital than met my ears during months in a military one."

The drawbacks in regard to our volunteer ladies, were not want of sense nor want of zeal, but the want of robust health, experience, and sufficient training.

The experiment of a staff of the volunteer lady-nurses from St. John's House,* with paid and trained nurses under their orders, has lately been made in King's College Hospital. I think I may say that it has so far succeeded. I have the testimony of one of the gentlemen filling a high official situation at the hospital, (and who was at first opposed to the introduction of these ladies, or at least most doubtful of their success,) that they have up to this time succeeded; that strong prejudices have been overcome, that there has been a purifying and harmonising influence at work since their arrival. The testimony borne by the ladies themselves to the courtesy of the medical men and the students, and the entire harmony with which they now work together, struck me even more.

The same conquest was obtained by the volunteer ladies in the East. One of them says, "So misrepresented were the army-surgeons that the Sisters and Ladies feared them more than any other horrors." "We were told to expect rebuff, discouragement, even insult. We never during this whole year experienced any other than assistance, encouragement, gentlemanly treatment, and, from many, the most cordial kindness." Of course there were some exceptions, but this was to be expected; and in reference to the principle for which I am now pleading, "the communion of labour," I consider this testimony very satisfactory.

So far for the effects of woman's work in the Hospital, let us now see what she has done in the Gaol and in the Asylum:—

A prison governed chiefly by women—and the women as well as the men who directed it responsible only to the Government, and not merely subordinate like the female officers in our prisons—was a singular spectacle; and I hope it will be distinctly understood that in describing what I have seen, it is not with any idea that these arrangements could be, or ought to be, exactly imitated among us. I only suggest the facts as illustrative of the principle I advocate, and as worthy of the consideration of humane and philosophic thinkers.

This prison at Neudorf is an experiment which as yet has only had a three years' trial, but it has so completely succeeded up to this time that they are preparing to organise eleven other prisons on the same plan. From a conversation I had with one of the Government officers, I could understand that the economy of the administration is a strong recommendation, as well as the moral success. Its origin is worth mentioning. It began by the efforts made by two humane ladies to find a refuge for those wretched creatures of their own sex who, after undergoing their term of punishment, were cast out of the prisons. These ladies, not finding at hand any persons prepared to carry out their views, sent to France for two women of a religious order which was founded for the reformation of lost and depraved women; and two of the Sisters were sent from Angers accordingly. After a while this small institution attracted the notice of the Government. It was taken in hand officially, enlarged, and organised as a prison as well as a penitentiary; the original plan being strictly adhered to, and the same management retained.

---

* The training institution for nurses, in Queen Square, Westminster.

At the time that I visited it, this prison consisted of several different buildings and a large garden enclosed by high walls. The inmates were divided into three classes completely separated. The first were the criminals, the most desperate characters, brought there from the prisons at Vienna, and the very refuse of those prisons. They had been brought there six or eight at a time, fettered hand and foot, and guarded by soldiers and policemen.

The second class, drafted from the first, were called the penitents; they were allowed to assist in the house, to cook, and to wash, and to work in the garden, which last was a great boon. There were more than fifty of this class.

The third class were the voluntaries, those who, when their term of punishment and penitence had expired, preferred remaining in the house, and were allowed to do so. They were employed in work of which a part of the profit was retained for their benefit. There were about twelve or fourteen of this class. The whole number of criminals then in the prison exceeded 200, and they expected more the next day.

To manage these unhappy, disordered, perverted creatures, there were twelve women, assisted by three chaplains, a surgeon, and a physician: none of the men resided in the house, but visited it every day. The soldiers and police officers, who had been sent in the first instance as guards and jailors, had been dismissed. The dignity, good sense, patience, and tenderness of this female board of management were extraordinary. The ventilation and the cleanliness were perfect; while the food, beds, and furniture were of the very coarsest kind. The medical supervision was important, where there was as much disease—of frightful, physical disease—as there was of moral disease, crime, and misery. There was a surgeon and physician, who visited daily. There was a dispensary, under the care of two Sisters who acted as chief nurses and apothecaries. One of these was busy with the sick, the other went round with me. She was a little, active woman, not more than two or three and thirty, with a most cheerful face and bright, kind, dark eyes. She had been two years in the prison, and had previously received a careful training of five years—three years in the general duties of her vocation, and two years of medical training. She spoke with great intelligence of the differences of individual temperament, requiring a different medical and moral treatment.

The Sister who superintended the care of the criminals was the oldest I saw, and she was bright looking also. The Superior, who presided over the whole establishment, had a serious look, and a pale, care-worn, but perfectly mild and dignified face.

The difference between the countenances of those criminal who had lately arrived, and those who had been admitted into the class of penitents, was extraordinary. The first were either stupid, gross, and vacant, or absolutely frightful from the predominance of evil propensities. The latter were at least humanised.

When I expressed my astonishment that so small a number of women could manage such a set of wild creatures, the answer was, "If we want assistance we shall have it; but it is as easy with our system to manage two hundred or three hundred as one hundred or fifty." She then added devoutly, "The power is not in ourselves, it is granted from above." It was plain that she had the most perfect faith in that power, and in the text which declared all things possible to faith.

We must bear in mind that here men and women were acting together; that in all the regulations, religious and sanitary, there was mutual aid, mutual respect, an interchange of experience, but the women were subordinate only to the chief civil and ecclesiastical authority; the internal administration rested with them.

When I was at Turin, I visited an institution for the redemption of "unfortunate girls," (as they call themselves, poor creatures!) which appeared to me peculiarly successful. I did not consider it perfect, nor could all its details be imitated here. Yet some of the natural principles, recognised and carried out, appeared to me most important. It seemed to have achieved for female victims and delinquents what Mettrai has done for those of the other sex.

This institution (called at Turin il Refugio, the Refuge) was founded nearly thirty years ago by a "good Christian," whose name was not given to me, but who still lives, a very old man. When his means were exhausted he had recourse to the Marquise de Barol, who has from that time devoted her life, and the greater part of her possessions, to the objects of this institution.

In the Memoirs of Mrs. Fry there may be found a letter which Madame de Barol addressed to her on the subject of this institution and its objects, when it had existed for three or four years only. The letter is dated 1829, and is very interesting. Madame de Barol told me candidly, in 1855, that in the commencement she had made mistakes; she had been too severe. It had required twenty years of reflection, experience, and the most able assistance, to work out her purposes.

The institution began on a small scale with few inmates; it now covers a large space of ground, and several ranges of buildings for various departments, all connected, and yet most carefully separated. There are several distinct gardens enclosed by these buildings, and the green trees and flowers give an appearance of cheerfulness to the whole.

There is, first, a refuge for casual and extreme wretchedness. A certificate from a priest or a physician is required, but often dispensed with. I saw a child brought into this place by its weeping and despairing mother—a child about ten years old and in a fearful state. There was no certificate in this case, but the wretched little creature was taken in at once. There is an infirmary admirably managed by a good physician and two medical Sisters of a religious order. There are also convalescent wards. These parts of the building are kept separate, and the inmates carefully classed, all the younger patients being in a separate ward.

In the penitentiary and schools, forming the second department, the young girls and children are kept distinct from the elder ones, and those who had lately entered from the others. I saw about twenty girls under the age of fifteen, but only a few together in one room. Only a few were tolerably handsome; many looked intelligent and kindly. In one of these rooms I found a tame trush hopping about, and I remember a girl with a soft face crumbling some bread for it, saved from her dinner. Reading, writing, plain work, and embroidery are taught, also cooking, and other domestic work. A certain number assisted by rotation in the large, lightsome kitchens and the general service of the house, but not till they had been there some months, and had received badges for good conduct. There are three gradations of these badges of merit, earned by various terms of probation. It was quite clear to me that these badges were worn with pleasure: whenever I fixed my eyes upon the little bits of red or blue ribbon, attached to the dress, and smiled approbation, I was met by a responsive smile—sometimes by a deep modest blush. The third and highest order of merit, which was a certificate of good conduct and steady industry during three years at least, conferred the privilege of entering an order destined to nurse the sick in the infirmary, or entrusted to keep order in the small classes. They had also a still higher privilege. And now I come to a part of the institution which excited my strongest sympathy and admiration. Appended to it is an infant hospital for the children of the very lowest orders—children born diseased or deformed, or maimed by accidents,—epileptic, or crippled. In this hospital were thirty-two poor suffering infants, carefully tended by such of the penitents as had earned this privilege. On a rainy day I found these poor little things taking their daily exercise in a long airy corridor. Over the clean shining floor was spread temporarily a piece of coarse grey drugget that their feet might not slip; and so they were led along, creeping, crawling, or trying to walk or run, with bandaged heads and limbs—carefully and tenderly helped and watched by the nurses, who were themselves under the supervision of one of the religious Sisters already mentioned.

There is a good dispensary, well supplied with common medicines, and served by a well instructed Sister of Charity, with the help of one of the inmates whom she had trained.

Any inmate is free to leave the Refuge whenever she pleases, and may be received a second time, but not a third time.

I was told that when these girls leave the institution, after a probation of three or four years, there is no difficulty in finding them good places, as servants, cooks, washerwomen, and even nurses; but all do not leave it. Those who, after a residence of six years, preferred to remain, might do so: they were devoted to a religious and laborious life, and lived in a part of the building which had a sort of conventual sanctity and seclusion. They are styled "les Magdeleines"

(Magdalena). I saw sixteen of such, and I had the opportunity of observing them. They were all superior in countenance and organisation, and belonged apparently to a better class. They were averse to re-entering the world, had been disgusted and humiliated by their bitter experience of vice, and disliked or were unfitted for servile occupations. They had a manufactory of artificial flowers, were skilful embroiderers and needlewomen, and supported themselves by the produce of their work. They were no longer objects of pity or dependent on charity; they had become objects of respect—and more than respect, of reverence. One of them who had a talent for music, Madame de Barol had caused to be properly instructed: she was the organist of the chapel and the music mistress: she had taught several of her companions to sing. A piano stood in the centre of the room, and they executed a little concert for us: everything was done easily and quietly, without effort or display. When I looked in the faces of these young women—the eldest was not more than thirty—so serene, so healthful, and in some instances so dignified, I found it difficult to recall the depth of misery, degradation, and disease out of which they had risen.

The whole number of inmates was about 140 without reckoning the thirty-two sick children. Madame de Barol said that this infant hospital was a most efficient means of thorough reform; it called out what was best in the disposition of the penitents, and was indeed a test of the character and temper.

Here are results which should bring reflection to the minds of our Irish Poor Law Guardians and Prison Boards, who declare that the Church is in danger, if one of the quiet, gentle, pious Sisters is admitted within the walls of the Poor House or of the Gaol. Here are results to show what the Communion of Labor can do when woman's best nature, combining with man's best, they become what God intended them, "the supplement to each other." Society may smile at these results, it may cry out, as it cried out, and sneer, and with damning insinuations meet the brave offer of Miss Nightingale to face disease and death, and all discomfort; and yet in reforming our Eastern Hospitals, a woman did the work, and succeeded, where the "hard-headed Scotch surgeons," and all the stiff, routinish, priggish, full and assistant surgeons, failed, though backed by the rough hospital orderlies, and the drunken harpies, called nurses, who raved, blasphemed, and were obscene, around the writhing hero who struggled for life amongst these fiends, or closed his eyes amid scenes and sounds which exceeded all that is recorded in Howard's Lazar-ettes, or in Roderick Random.

Oh! these things all do very well in a Popish country, but are not suited to a Protestant state, where freedom of individual action in its full development is the very soul of the religion. But is this true? Is Miss Nightingale's success a fiction? Is Mary Carpenter's triumph a fable? Is the St. James's Back Ragged School at Bristol a folly? Is Mrs. Sawyer's Home for Hopeful Discharged Female Prisoners a myth? These are all Protestant Institutions; in each the individual will of the promoters, or helpers, was developed, and all the chief agents are English.

We trust, however, none will contend that charity is limited by country—and as to its being confined by religion, let Mrs. Jameson answer:—

I am no friend to nunneries. I do not like even the idea of Protestant nunneries, which I have heard discussed and warmly advocated, I conceive that any large number of women shut up together in one locality, with no occupation connecting them actively and benevolently with the world of humanity outside, with all their interests centred within their walls, would not mend each other, and that such an atmosphere could not be perfectly healthy, spiritually, morally, or physically. There would necessarily ensue, in lighter characters, frivolity, idleness, and sick disordered fancies; and in superior minds, ascetic pride, gloom, and impatience. But it is very different with the active orders, and I should certainly like to see amongst us some institutions which, if not exactly like them, should supply their place.

In speaking on the subject with intelligent and experienced men and women, I have generally met with the strongest sympathy; but sometimes also with the vague, sweeping objection, that such communities are quite contrary to the spirit of the Reformed Church, and among Protestants quite impracticable. The worse for us, if it were true; but is it true?

The experiment has been tried, an attempt has been made, to found such an institution in a Protestant community, though not in this country; it has not yet stood the test of centuries, but let us see what has been done within a period of thirty years.

At Kaiserswerth on the Rhine, a small town near Dusseldorf, a manufactory had been established during the last war, in which the workmen employed were almost all Protestants. In 1822 the manufactory became bankrupt, and the workmen were reduced to poverty. Their pastor, Mr. Fliedner, then a very young man, travelled through Holland and England to collect from sympathising friends the necessary funds to support a church in his small parish. In this, we are told, he fully succeeded, and, it is added, "this was the smallest part of the result of his journey." While in England he became acquainted with Mrs. Fry. It was the meeting of two most congenial minds, and his attention was at once turned to the objects which then occupied her. On his return home he originated at Dusseldorf the first society in Germany for the improvement of prison discipline. Experience in prisons pointed out to him some ways of doing good which came within his then small means. He had been struck with compassion for the desolate condition of women who, when discharged from prison, already depraved by bad habits and without the means of subsistence, "are in a manner forced back into crime." With one female criminal, and one voluntary assistant, he founded his penitentiary in a little summer-house in his garden. This was in 1833. In the following year he met with a second volunteer assistant, and collected together nine more penitents, of whom eight had been more than once in prison. This part of the institution, memorable as the first beginning of an establishment, which has since extended to so many and various branches, has always been kept entirely separate from the rest. A general hospital, a lunatic asylum, an orphan asylum, an infant school, became so many seminaries for training hospital nurses, teachers (i. e. instructing sisters), and visitors of the poor (called parish deaconesses). On these I do not dwell at present, for we must confine ourselves to the theme in hand. It is the hospital at Kaiserswerth which constitutes the most important part of the establishment, and is likely to be the most extensive and permanent in its effects.

In 1836 Mr Fliedner established his hospital in the deserted manufactory. He had been led to think of it partly from the want of good nurses for the sick; partly from regret, as he said himself, to see "how much good female power was wasted," partly from a perception that the women who had voluntarily come forward to assist him required a larger sphere for the exercise of their faculties. He began, as usual, humbly enough—with one patient and one nurse. Within the first year the number of voluntary nurses was seven and the number of patients received and nursed was sixty, besides twenty-eight nursed at their own houses. The hospital contained in 1834, 120 beds, which were generally full, and more than 6,000 patients have been received since its commencement.

But the chief purpose of this hospital is to serve as a training-school for nursing sisters. Every one who offers herself (and there is no want of offers) is taken on trial for six months, during which she must pay for her board and wears no distinctive dress. If she persists in her vocation and is accepted, she undergoes a further probation (like the novitiate of the Roman Catholic Sisters) of from one to three years. She then puts on the hospital dress and is boarded and lodged gratis. The male wards are served by men-nurses, of whom there are five, who have been educated in the hospital and are under the authority of the Sisters. They sleep in the male wards and sit up in case of need. It is added that "the most fastidious could find nothing to object to in the intercourse which takes place between patients, surgeon, and Sisters."

As no inducement is offered to these Protestant Sisters any more than in the Catholic Orders, no prospect of pecuniary reward, or praise or reputation, nothing in short but the opportunity of working for the sake of God and humanity, so, if this does not appear sufficient for them, they are dismissed. After they have been accepted and made their profession, they receive yearly a small sum for clothing, and nothing more; they can receive no fee or reward from those they serve, but in age or illness the parent institution is bound to receive and provide for them.

A certain number of these Sisters obtain a particular education to fit them for parish visitors. The absolute necessity that women should be especially trained in order to make good and efficient parish visitors is apparent; for it is wonderfully and often pathetically absurd to see with what a large stock of goodness and conscientious anxiety, and what a small stock of experience, knowledge, and sympathy with their objects, some excellent women set off on their task as lady visitors of the poor. A number of the Sisters, trained properly, have been sent to distant towns and villages, at the request of clergymen and visiting societies. Others are occupied in nursing in private families, their services being repaid to the parent institution. The excellent Mr. Fliedner and his wife still conduct it, and receive their best reward, had they sought any, in the success of their undertaking. There are at present on the establishment 190 Sisters, of whom sixty-two are still probationers or learners. Of the Hospital Sisters, eighty are stationed in different hospitals in Germany; five in London; three at Constantinople (they are probably by this time at Scutari); five at Jerusalem; two at Smyrna, and two at Pittsburg in the United States;—making in all, ninety-seven women, properly trained and educated, and fully employed in their beneficent vocation.

Let me add, for it is a matter of interest at present, that Miss Florence Nightingale went through a regular course of training at Kaiserswerth, before she took charge of the Female Sanitarium in London.

In imitation of Mr. Fliedner's establishment, a similar institution for the training of Protestant nurses and teachers has been opened at Paris; another at Strasbourg; another at Berlin, under the especial protection of the Queen of Prussia, and under the direction of the Baroness Bantzau, who had previously gone through a complete course of instruction and experience at Kaiserswerth. The number of nursing sisters in the Berlin hospital is twenty-eight, and there are twelve probationers. A similar establishment was founded at Dresden by the late excellent and amiable Countess Alfred Hohenthal (née Princess Biron), in which twenty-one women are under a course of instruction. There are besides ten other institutions, which I find described as existing in different localities, but all emanating from the same origin, and containing altogether not less than 429 members. So that it seems no longer a question as to whether, in Protestant communities, a number of women can be properly trained and organised for purposes of social benefit, authorised and employed by the Government, aided and directed by intelligent and good men, and sustained by public opinion. I consider that the question has been answered; and I must repeat my strong conviction, that such a communion of labour and of love as I have endeavoured to describe is not a thing of country, creed, or custom, but is founded in the very laws of our being;—in that selfsame law which is the basis of domestic life: that it is one of the main conditions of social happiness and morals: and that the neglect of it in any country or community strikes at the heart of all that is best in men and women, increases the faults of both and their ignorance of each other, and tends consequently to the ultimate degradation and misery of all society.

There are two institutions in which woman's work is likely to find full employment; the Reformatory Schools, male and female, and the Workhouse. Many years ago, Frederic Hill advocated the adoption of a system by which women of zeal and piety could be permitted to devote their attention, to the prisoners in our Gaols; but it was considered, if it received attention at all, as impracticable. However, so many things considered impracticable fifteen years ago, are now considered absurdly common-place, that Mr. Hill has, we presume, thought himself justified in again shocking those people who believe anything novel, to them, as impracticable, for we find him thus expressing himself, in his account of his recent visit to Mettray, read at the Bristol meeting of the National Reformatory Union, held last August, and printed in The Law Amendment Journal, No. 22, p. 162 :—

To return to Mettray. If I may be allowed to suggest an improvement in what is already excellent, I would urge an extended use of female influence. To some extent this most humanizing power is even now called into requisition by means of the kind Sisters of Charity, who take part in the proceedings; but their exertions, though very valuable, are chiefly confined to the sick; whereas, to carry into full operation that family principle which is the foundation of the system at Mettray, female influence is required for all, whether sick or well, and at all hours of the day.

Even on grown-up men I have known great and beneficial effects to be wrought by a kind and intelligent matron of a prison; and under good arrangements, such influence—nature's own provision—should always be at hand; but for young boys, for those who in more favoured circumstances would be under a kind mother's roof, with sisters as companions and playmates, female counsel and sympathy are doubly important.

All who may have been sceptical as to the practicability of obtaining the assistance of judicious and delicate-minded women in the management of headstrong and uneducated men must, I think, have had their doubts removed by the noble spectacle which we lately witnessed in our Military Hospitals in the East; but to any who may be still unconvinced I would recommend a perusal of the evidence, on this subject, collected by Mrs. Jameson, and brought forward with the earnestness and ability for which she is so much distinguished.

To call Monsieur De Metz's attention to this point will, I am sure, be sufficient to secure for it the fullest and most candid consideration; for seldom have I met a man, himself possessed of so wide a knowledge and yet so ready and desirous to receive information and advice from others. It is no doubt owing to this distinguished characteristic, to his deep insight into human nature, and to his enthusiasm, perseverance, social rank, genuine eloquence, and great kindness and courtesy, that his eminent success is in great part due, and that he has been able to draw around him such a body of assistants.

These are Mr. Hill's opinions now, and we believe few who know the question of Prison Discipline will deny that he is right. We believe that our Irish Directors of Convict Prisons, seeing the success of the Female Refuge for Exemplary Prisoners, managed by the Sisters of Mercy, at Golden Bridge, are desirous that their Prisons should be visited by these ladies, but it is amongst young girl and boy criminals we should look for their chiefest and most patent success.

Upon this subject Mrs. Jameson has the following admirable observations :—

If what I have said of the salutary effects of female influence in prisons carry any weight, yet more does it apply to the employment of superior women in the Reformatory schools for young criminals. Profligate boys, accustomed to see only the most coarse and depraved women (their own female relatives are in general examples of the worst class), would be especially touched and tamed by the mere presence of a better order of women. I observe that in the last report of the school at Mettrai, mention is made of the nine Sisters of Charity who are employed to superintend the kitchen and infirmary; which last consists of a ward with about ten beds, and a corridor where the Sisters receive the out-patients; and to the constant watchfulness, medical skill, and gentle influence of these women much good is attributed.

Mr. Hill, in his work on Crime, in speaking of the officials in the reformatory prisons for boys, says expressly that some of these officials ought to be women "for the sake of female influence, and to call into action those family feelings, which Mr. Sidney Turner and Miss Carpenter think of such vital importance in the process of reformation." This is precisely the principle for which I am pleading, and in organising the new reformatory institutions it might be advantageously kept in view.

"It should be remembered," adds Mr. Hill, "that up to the time of his commitment, a criminal has often had no one to give him counsel or sympathy, no virtuous parent or kind relative to feel for him or guide him aright, and that there is consequently in his case a void which is perhaps first filled up by a kind prison officer. This may account for the almost filial affection often shown, particularly by the younger prisoners, towards a good governor, chaplain, or matron." What we have now to do is to enlarge the application of this principle.

The extreme difficulty of finding masters at the best of all our reformatory schools, that at Redhill, was the subject discussed in a recent meeting of benevolent and intelligent men, interested in this institution. I happened to be present. I heard the qualifications for a master to be set over these unhappy little delinquents thus described:—He must have great tenderness and kindness of heart, great power of calling forth and sympathising with the least manifestations of goodness or hopefulness; quick perception of character; great firmness, and judgment, and command of temper; skill in some handicraft, as carpentering and gardening; a dignified or at least attractive presence, and good manners,—the personal qualities and appearance being found of consequence to impress the boys with respect. Now it is just possible that all these rare and admirable qualities, some of which God has given in a larger degree to the woman and others to the man, might be found combined in one man: but such a man has not yet been met with, and many such would hardly be found for a stipend of 30*l.* or 40*l.* a year. Then, in this dilemma, instead of insisting on a combination of the paternal and the maternal qualifications in one person, might it not be possible, by associating some well educated and well trained women in the administration of these schools, to produce the required influences—the tenderness, the sympathy, the superior manners, and refined deportment on one hand, and the firmness and energy, the manly government, and skill in handicrafts and gardening, on the other? This solution was not proposed by any one of the gentlemen who spoke; it did not seem to occur to any one present; and yet is it not worth consideration? At all events I must express my conviction that, going on as they are now doing, without the combination of those influences which ought to represent in such a community the maternal and sisterly, as well as the paternal and fraternal, relations of the home, their efforts will be in vain: their admirable institution will fall to pieces sooner or later, and people will attribute such a result to every possible cause except the real one.

The reformatory schools for perverted and criminal girls present many more difficulties than those for boys. I do not know how it is intended to meet these especial difficulties, nor what consideration has as yet been given to them, nor in whose hands the administration of these reformatory schools is to be placed; for all I have as yet heard upon the subject, and all the pamphlets and authorities I have been able to consult, have reference principally to the treatment of delinquent boys, and very little mention is made of the poor female children of the "perishing and dangerous class"—(perishing and dangerous in every sense of these words they too surely are!) One thing is most certain, that in their case the supervision of pure-minded, humane, intelligent, and experienced men will be as necessary as the feminine element in the reformatory schools for boys; and for similar reasons, medical knowledge will be required in addition to the moral and religious influences. This has, I think, obtained too little consideration, and it is one of great importance.

It is worth noticing that a proposal, made during this last session of parliament,* to aid the female penitentiaries by a grant of public money, however small, and thus obtain from the Government the mere recognition of the existence of such institutions and their necessity, fell to the ground; even the usual deprecatory intimation that it would be "considered and brought forward next session,"—the common device by which troublesome propositions are stifled or shuffled off,—was not here vouchsafed: the motion was received with absolute silence, and set aside by a few words from the speaker.

I can conceive that there might be many reasons for this reluctance to discuss such themes officially. It might not only offend the nice decorum of our House of Commons; it might perhaps awaken in some generous and conscientious minds a keener touch of retrospective pity, a more acute and self-reproachful pain. Let us, therefore, set the past aside; let us accept the excuse that a far lower standard of feeling and opinion existed on this miserable subject some years ago; and let us think with gratitude of the more hopeful present, of the wiser and better future which we may anticipate both for men and women.

And since these female reformatories must eventually find their place among the public exigencies to be considered, one may ask, what makes the case of poor, depraved, delinquent girls far worse in itself, far more difficult to deal with, far more hopeless altogether, than that of depraved delinquent boys? How is it, that, below the lowest class of men, there is a lower class of women, abased by the total loss of self-respect, and perverse from a sense of perpetual wrong? It is so, we are told; but why is it so? Does it arise from the greater delicacy of the organisation—from the perpetual outrage to the nature of the creature thus sacrificed? I cannot go into these questions at present. I must leave them to be considered and settled by such of our medical men and our clergy who may be—what all of them ought to be—what our Saviour was on earth—meritists and philosophers; for these questions are of the deepest import, and must be settled sooner or later. Meantime it is allowed that the female reformatories now existing are utterly insignificant and inadequate in comparison to the existing amount of evil and misery; it is allowed that they present peculiar and unmanageable difficulties, that they are not successful, even the best of them. You hear it said that a hundredfold of the money, the labour, expended on them ought not to be regarded as thrown away, if but one soul out of twenty were redeemed from perdition. All very proper and very pious. But how is it that in this case nineteen souls out of the twenty are supposed to be consigned to a perdition past cure, past hope, past help? The truth is, that it is not merely the peculiar difficulties, nor the horror of corrupting influences, which interpose to prevent success: it is the incredible rashness and almost incredible mistakes of those who ignorantly, but in perfect good faith and self-complacency, undertake a task which requires all the aid of long training, experience, and knowledge, combined with the impulses of benevolence, the support of religious faith,—and, I will add, a genuine vocation such as I have seen in some characters.

---

* July 15, 1856.

Readers who know little of Prisons, of Reformatories, or of Hospitals, are, through the squabbles of Poor Law Guardians, the autocratic mandates of Commissioners, or the cases of assaults brought against Workhouse authorities, somewhat better acquainted with what the virtuous and indignant newspapers call the Bastiles of the Poor. We have heard it stated, on good authority, that ninety per cent. of the girls brought up in one of our great Dublin Workhouses are prostitutes, and that it must be so, as long as officers rude and brutal, and internal arrangements, are continued as at present. So it is in many cases in England, in many cases in Ireland. Virtue in rags side by side with vice in tatters. Brazen, bold-faced, sin-scarred women, beside the young girl who has been carefully if poorly reared. No hand to help, no voice to soothe, an iron reality of official, cold, unsympathizing duty, meeting the poor at every side, until the pauper fancies himself a prisoner, and poverty hangs around him like a gaunt spectre, haunting his steps as the shadow of his victim dogs the life of the murderer. And yet these Poor-houses sprang from a sense of religious duty, but we have diverted them from their original mode of management, and where religion and kindness should stand mercifully beside those who, guiltless of their own poverty, yet are struck down by the wise hand of God, or who are the evident causes of their own misery, we have placed around the inmates, official stolidity, drunken attendants, inefficient religious instruction, and too frequently vicious companions in misery. Let us take one passage from Mrs. Jameson, showing what our Workhouses are :—

Then, as to the feminine element, I will describe it. In a great and well ordered workhouse, under conscientious management, I visited sixteen wards, in each ward from fifteen to twenty-five sick, aged, bed-ridden, or, as in some cases, idle and helpless poor. In each ward all the assistance given and all the supervision were in the hands of one nurse and a " helper," both chosen from among the pauper women who were supposed to be the least immoral and drunken. The ages of the nurses might be from sixty-five to eighty; the assistants were younger. I recollect seeing, in a provincial workhouse, a ward in which were ten old women all helpless and bed-ridden: to nurse them was a decrepit old woman of seventy, lean, and withered, and feeble; and her assistant was a girl with one eye, and scarcely able to see with the other. In a ward where I found eight paralysed old women, the nurse being equally aged, the helper was a girl who had lost the use of one hand. Only the other day I saw a pauper nurse in a sick ward who had a wooden leg. I remember no cheerful faces: when the features and deportment were not debased by drunkenness, or stupidity, or ill-humour, they were melancholy, or sullen, or bloated, or harsh:—and these are the sisters of charity to whom our sick poor are confided!

In one workhouse the nurses had a penny a week and extra beer: in another the allowance had been a shilling a month, but recently withdrawn by the guardians from motives of economy. The matron told me that while this allowance continued, she could exercise a certain power over the nurses—she could stop their allowance if they did not behave well; now she has no hold on them! In another workhouse, I asked the matron to point out one whom she considered the best conducted and most efficient nurse. She pointed to a crabbed, energetic-looking old woman: “She is active, and cleanly, and to be depended on so long as we can keep her from drink. But they all drink! Whenever it is their turn to go out for a few hours they come back intoxicated, and have to be put to bed:”—put to bed intoxicated in the wards they are set to rule over!

The patients often hate the nurses, and have not fear or respect enough to prevent them from returning their bad language and abuse. Of the sort of attention paid to helpless creatures under their care you may perhaps form some idea. I know that in one workhouse a poor woman could get no help but by bribery: any little extra allowance of tea or sugar left by pitying friends went in this manner. The friends and relations, themselves poor, who came to visit some bed-ridden parent, or maimed husband, or idiotic child, generally brought some trifle to bribe the nurses, and I have heard of a nurse who made five shillings a week by thus fleecing the poor inmates and their friends in pennies and sixpences. Those who would not pay this tax were neglected, and implored in vain to be turned in their beds. The matron knows that these things exist, but she has no power to prevent them; she exercises no moral authority: she sees that the beds are clean, the floor daily scoured, the food duly distributed; what tyranny may be exercised in her absence by these old hags, her deputies, she has no means of knowing; for the wretched creatures dare not complain, knowing how it would be visited upon them. I will not now torture you by a description of what I know to have been inflicted and endured in these abodes of pauperism,—the perpetual scolding, squabbling, swearing. Neither peace, nor forbearance, nor mutual respect is there, nor reverence, nor gratitude. What perhaps has shocked me most was to discover, in the corner of one of these wards, a poor creature who had seen better days: to be startled when I went up to speak to one whose features or countenance had attracted me, by being answered in the unmistakeable tone and language of the well-bred and the well-born: and this has happened to me, not once, but several times. I never can understand why some discrimination should not be shown, unless it be that not one of those employed is of a grade, mental or moral, to be entrusted with such a power of discrimination. It is thought that no distinction ought to be made, where the necessary condition of entrance—poverty—is common to all; that no more regard should be had in the workhouse to the causes and antecedents of poverty, than in a prison to the causes and antecedents of crime. Then there is the rule, that this refuge for the poor man is to be made as distasteful to the poor man as possible. But cannot some means be used to exclude the undeserving? Why should this last home of the poor be not only distasteful but deteriorating?

I should say, from what I have seen, that it is in the men's wards of the workhouses, and yet more especially those of the boys, that female supervision is required, and where lady visitors would do essential good. Will they venture there? or will they think it "very improper?"

I was lately in a workhouse ward containing twenty-two beds; twenty-one were filled with poor decrepit old women in the last stage of existence. The nurse was, as usual, a coarse old hag. In the twenty-second bed was a young person of better habits, who had been an invalid, but was not helpless; she was there because she had no home to go to. There was no shelf or drawer near her bed to place anything in; this was not allowed, lest spirits should be concealed: the book she was reading—anything she wished to keep for herself—was deposited in her bed or under it: nothing was done for comfort, and very little for decency. The power of retiring for a little space from all these eyes and tongues was quite out of the question; and so it was everywhere. A poor, decent, old woman, sinking into death, in a ward where there were twenty-five other inmates, wished to be read to; but there was no one to do this: she thought she would try to bribe one of the others to read to her, by the offer of "a hap'orth of snuff;" but even this would not do.

Let us now see what woman's work could do for these earthly Purgatories for the good, and foreshadowings of Hell for the bad. Mrs. Jameson writes:—

I have not found in my limited travels any institutions exactly similar to our workhouses, that is, charitable institutions supported by enforced contributions. There are, however, two institutions at Turin which struck me as very remarkable, and which may be said, each in its way, to fulfil some of the purposes for which our workhouses were originally instituted.

One of these is a community of women called Rosieres, from the name of their founder, Rosa Governo, who had been a servant girl. It cannot be styled a religious community, in the usual sense, as neither vows nor seclusion are required: it is a working joint-stock company, with a strong interfusion of the religious element, without which I believe it could not have held together. Here I found, wonderful to tell, nearly 400 women of all ages, from fifteen and upwards, living together in a very extensive, clean, airy building (or rather assemblage of buildings, for they had added one house to another), maintaining themselves by their united labour, and carrying on a variety of occupations, as tailoring, embroidery (especially the embroidery of military accoutrements for the army), weaving, spinning, shirt-making, lace making—everything, in short, in which female ingenuity could be employed. They have a large, well-kept garden; a school for the poor children of the neighbourhood; an infirmary, including a ward for those whose age had exempted them from work; a capital dispensary, with a small medical library; here I found one of the women preparing some medicines, and another studying intently a French medical work.

This female community is much respected in Turin, and has flourished for more than a century. It is entirely self-supported, and the yearly revenue averages between 70,000 and 80,000 francs. The women are ruled by a superior, elected from among themselves, and in their workrooms were divided into classes, or groups, each under direction of a monitress to keep order. The rules of admission and entrance and the interior regulations are strict. Any inmate may leave at once whenever she pleases, but (as I understood) cannot be re-admitted. The costume, which is that worn by the lower classes in 1740, when the community was founded, is not becoming, but not very peculiar. All looked clean and cheerful.

I have been assured by some of my friends, who ought to understand these matters, that such an institution would be "quite impossible" in England, because the education given to the girls of the working class renders it "quite impossible" for a number of them to dwell together in unity, or in voluntary submission to a controlling power. If it be so, so much the worse!—but is it so?

The other institution I have alluded to, is yet more extraordinary, and of recent origin.

A few years ago a poor priest, who had served as chaplain in an hospital, being struck by the dreadful state of the convalescent women, who, after being dismissed as cured while yet too weak for labour, were obliged to have recourse to vice or to starve, fitted up a garret with four old half-rotten bedsteads, into which he received four wretched, sick, sinful creatures, and begged for their support. Such was the beginning of the "Casa della divina Provvidenza," called also "La Casa Cotelengo," from the name of its founder, who died about two years ago.

When I visited this extraordinary place, I found that the garret and its four old bedsteads had gradually extended to many ranges of buildings, for different purposes.* There is an hospital with 200 beds; another hospital especially for wretched, diseased women out of the streets; another for children, containing fifty beds; a refuge for forsaken infants; a small school for deaf and dumb (children and others); a ward especially for epileptic patients and crétins. The attendance on this vast congregation of sick and suffering beings is voluntary, and considered by the physicians, nurses, and sisters as an act of religion. There were about 200 attendants, men and women. The number of inmates constantly varied, and no regular account was kept of them: one day it was calculated to be about 1300, patients and nurses all included. The deaths are about six daily. All who would be rejected from other hospitals, who have incurable, horrid, chronic, diseases, who are in the last stage of helpless, hopeless, misery, come here; none are ever turned away. There are no funds, and no accounts are kept; nor, I must confess, is there any of the order and neatness of a regular hospital. All the citizens of Turin, more especially the poorer class, contribute something; and so "one day telleth another." "We trust to divine Providence, and have hitherto wanted for nothing," was the reply to my inquiry. "Sometimes our coffer is empty, sometimes it is full. If we are poor to-day, we shall be richer to-morrow. God helps us!"

---

* The original "four old bedsteads" are preserved in memoriam, and were pointed out to me.

In England, a political economist or a poor-law commissioner would have been thrown into fits by such a spectacle of slovenly charity. Too true it is—

"The wise want love, and they who love want wisdom;
And all good things are thus confused to ill!"

It will have appeared to all our readers that Mrs. Jameson desires to see woman's work an active work; a work springing from love, supported by love, and ever soaring to lofty and glorious heights of duty. Duty she would make the main-spring of all woman's work. Her complaint is, not that woman is unwilling, unable, to take her place amongst the workers of the world, but that she is not educated for this work; and when, despite her want of this special education, she surmounts all the difficulties of this want, she is still kept from the Communion of Labor, because, in these countries, unmarried woman has no recognized sphere of labor, save the ball room, the milliner's shop, the governesses' room, the various menial employments, and—the streets.

Our last Census shows that the population of women is half a million in excess of that of men. Of what use are those 500,000 women? At present, and according to our conventionalities, of little; but the real question is, of what use shall the excess of female population be in the Census of 1861? Mrs. Jameson declares she does not desire to see any woman withdrawn from the discharge of any domestic duty. All domestic duties are the joint duties of husbands and wives, brothers and sisters; and here it is that mind acting upon mind makes each "the supplement" of the other. But there are thousands of women who waste their lives in external mummeries of devotion, tract distributing, active collections for out of the way missions to unpronounceable pagans in unapproachable places, who could be, and who would be, glorious workers if the field were open; if conventional barriers were thrown down, and, before all, if early training were extended to them.*

The difficulty is, that whilst Catholics have the opening for each phase of self-devotion to religion, active, semi-active, and contemplative, in these countries Protestants have not one of the three, save that opening afforded by attention to schools. Years ago, Southey and Dr. Gooch were anxious to see Protestant Béguines established in England, and it is painful to read how earnestly, how hopefully, yet how hopelessly Southey wrote to his friends upon this subject. Even the Nurses' Training Institution, in which his heart was so much interested, failed, and he tells us he fears that the Dissenters would never permit its success, through their insatiable spirit of proselytism.†

Writing thus fairly and candidly, as Catholics, we do not understand why proselytism should interpose its hideous, soul-grasping hand to spoil this work of charity, this achievement of National usefulness, the Communion of Labor. Here, in Dublin, we have Saint Vincent's Hospital, exclusively the property of, and tended by, the Sisters of Charity, and the most scrupulous care is taken that Protestant patients shall have any clergyman of their own Church they please to name, called to attend them. In Jervis street Hospital the Sisters of Mercy attend, and there patients of all religions and of no religion are received, yet no complaint of attempted proselytism has ever been made. During the woman's work of the Irish Sisters of Mercy in the Crimea, works which have received no earthly recognition whatever from any, save the soldiers attended, no complaint of attempted proselytism was made; and knowing these things we hope, nay, we believe, the time when proselytism could interpose to prevent the observance of charity has passed away for ever, and earnest, deep-hearted women are prepared to show that amidst the quiet wards of home hospitals and amongst the prisoners of our gaols, amongst the young "City Arabs" and "Home Heathens" of our Reformatories, amongst the squalid rooms of our

* See Appendix, at end of this paper, for Mr. Frederic Hill's opinions on this subject.

† See "Life and Correspondence of Robert Southey, LL.D.," By his Son. Vol. IV. p. 156. Vol. VI. p. 60, 61.

Workhouses, they can be as useful and more heroic in duty than when attracted to the East by the eclat of the service, and as steady and determined in Southwark as they and their fellow laborers proved themselves in Scutari. Mrs. Jameson writes:—

“Would you make charity a profession?”

“Why not? why should not charity be a profession in our sex, just in so far (and no farther) as religion is a profession in yours? If a man attires himself in a black surplice, ascends a pulpit, and publicly preaches religion, are we, therefore, to suppose that his religious profession is merely a profession, instead of a holy, heartfelt vocation? If a woman puts on a grey gown, and openly takes upon herself the blessed duty of caring for the sick, the poor, the perverted, are we, therefore, to suppose that charity is with her merely a profession? Here we have surely a distinction without a difference! No doubt we should all be religious, whether we assume the outward garb or not; no doubt we should all be charitable, whether in white, black, or grey; but why should not charity assume functions publicly recognised—openly, yet quietly and modestly exercised? Why is female influence always supposed to be secret, underhand, exercised in some way which is not to appear?—till even our good deeds borrow the piquancy of intrigue, and we are told practically to seek the shade, till morally we fear the light? Why can we not walk bravely, honestly, and serenely, yet simply and humbly along the path we have chosen, or to which it hath pleased God to call us, instead of creeping about in a spirit of fear as if quite overcome by the sense of our own wonderful merits, and obliged to throw over them a veil of conventional humility?”

“Our pretension to such avocations as I have mentioned, may possibly be met by just the same arguments which fifty years ago were launched against ‘literary ladies;’ and if sneers at ‘blue stockings’ and female pedants could have turned women from the cultivation of their minds, and crushed every manifestation of genius, no doubt it would have been done. Luckily, two admirable and gifted men,—Professor Playfair, with his profound science, and tender, generous feeling, and Sydney Smith, with all the force of his strong masculine sense, and all the splendour of his wit,—came to our rescue at a most critical period. The former claimed for us the department of science; the latter, that of literature and independent thought.

This is twenty or thirty years ago. There are men now, equally manly and far-sighted, eager to instruct us and sustain us in well doing, eager to recognise in us fellow-labourers by divine appointment, companions by the grace of God, without whom no step in social progress can be attained, no lasting good achieved."

True, all true; but, as Mrs. Jameson wisely declares, women must be reared to know that they have duties like men, though not of the same class. At present an unmarried woman has but three phases of existence, eating and dressing and sleeping, for one; hoping for, and attempting to catch a husband, for a second; idling ingeniously, for a third. She has nothing to work for, she hopes like a child, she knows not what, and, like a child, all her pleasures are in the future, every pleasure depending on external circumstances; whilst her employments are but, as we have stated, ingenious idlenesses. Why should she do woman's work? Why should she hope—for she is objectless, and as Coleridge beautifully says:—

"Work without hope draws nectar in a sieve,
And hope without an object cannot live."

Woman alone can do nothing. She may be as self-immolated as Magdalen, as fervid as Teresa, she may be as wide-souled as Mary Carpenter, as earnest as Florence Nightingale, and as eloquent, high-hearted, clear-minded, persevering, and womanly, as Anna Jameson, yet without the co-operation of man, without that working together, and rendering each mind "the supplement" of the other, there can be no success for woman's work.

Mrs. Jameson never, for one moment, permits this point to pass from before her audience, or readers, and hence the genuine strength of all she wrote a quarter of a century ago, and of all she has written since, even to a quarter of a year ago. She sees that women are to be found to do woman's work; she knows that from her own efforts have come results such as would, in old days, have gained for her the highest and most noble testimony from Church and State. But times like these are times in which we fight out proofs and battle around theories. This Mrs. Jameson herself well knows, but with the faith, the working faith, that breathes only in charity, she hopes and works. True, all she tells us was fact four years ago. Four years ago women lived in far off quiet country places, and thought they could do all that we now know they have done for God's honor and for the love of England, but how, amidst the dreary stagnation of a life weary as poor Mariana's in the Moated Grange, could they hope?—for never more than then, (four years ago) amidst Bloomerism, and Baby Shows, and Woman's Rights meetings, and Frederica Bremer's petticoat convention, was woman's work so hopeless of development, and we doubt not that many a golden-hearted woman felt the truth of Shelley's thought—

“The Good want power, but to weep barren tears.
The Powerful goodness want : worse need for them.
The Wise want love ; and those who love want wisdom ;
And all best things are thus confused to ill.”

What is the scope, philosophy, and tendency of all we have written and quoted in our paper?—this, in brief, as Mrs. Jameson eloquently and wisely puts it—

“I would place before you, this once more, ere I turn to other duties, that most indispensable yet hardly acknowledged truth, that at the core of all social reformation, as a necessary condition of health and permanency in all human institutions, lies the working of the man and the woman together, in mutual trust, love, and reverence.

“I would impress it now for the last time on the hearts and the consciences of those who hear me, that there is an essential, eternal law of life, affirmed and developed by the teaching of Christ, which if you do not take into account, your fine social machinery, however ingeniously and plausibly contrived, will at last fall into corruption and ruin. Wherever men and women do not work together helpfully and harmoniously, and in accordance with the domestic relations—wherever there is NOT THE COMMUNION OF LOVE AND THE COMMUNION OF LABOUR—there must necessarily enter the elements of discord and decay.

“Despair we cannot, dare not.

“If men bring their conventionalities and practicabilities, into conflict with the natural law of God's divine appointment, we know which must in the end succumb. Meantime I would, if possible, assist in diminishing the duration and the pain of that conflict. If any thing I have now spoken carry conviction into the kind hearts around me, help ! those who can and will,—and God help us all !”

AMEN, AND AMEN.

APPENDIX.

The following passage from Mr. Frederic Hill's work on National Education is worthy the very deepest and most attentive consideration. It is taken from the first volume of the book, page 214. The whole work forms the best history of the educational aspect of the Nation before the benefits of a wise and comprehensive system was attempted:—

Mental Education of Females among the Middle Classes.—Public attention has lately been called by several excellent articles in the Journal of Education and elsewhere to this subject; and we trust that enlightened views respecting it have already made considerable progress: and that a silly admiration for Oriental ignorance and mental torpor among females, will soon give way to just appreciation of the superior beauty of a vigorous intellect and a cultivated mind.

Limited, however, as in the present range of female education,—devoid as it is in so many respects of matter to call forth the reasoning and inventive powers,—little as it is calculated, even in its engrossing province of ornament, to accommodate different tastes and various talent,—it is not during the period passed at school that the inferiority to male education is principally marked. The musical gamut is in our opinion quite as intellectual as the propria quæ maribus of the Eton grammar: and the poor girl, who, without any taste for natural beauty, love of imitation, or idea of form and colour, is forced to pass hour after hour in trailing her pencil over the leaves of a drawing-book, is not more unprofitably occupied than the boy who is driven through page after page of authors who are treating on subjects in which he takes no interest,—employing a style the beauties of which are entirely lost upon him,—and using a language the acquisition of every word of which is to him an irksome and disgusting task.

It is not, then, in school education that female instruction is so far behind that of males; it is in the time immediately following the period passed at school that the disparity is greatest. It is then that a young man chooses his occupation for life, and sets vigorously to work to qualify himself for its successful pursuit. With a clear object before him, and seeing how the acquirement of various kinds of knowledge will facilitate his progress, he no longer looks upon study as a burdon to be avoided by all possible contrivances. Formerly, he was like an obstinate child taking medicine; who does not admit one more drop into his mouth than is forced into it. He now takes willing and copious draughts at the fountain of knowledge; and months do more for him than years under the old régime.

Meantime, how is the young female situated? What objects can she select for attainment, and pursue with steadiness, as the main business of life? The road to wealth and distinction, even by the most quiet and unobtrusive paths, is, for the most part, closed upon her: and what is opened in its stead? On what course of persevering exertion has she any sufficient inducement to enter? It is too evident, that however great and varied may be her talent, she has scarcely any of the ordinary motives for cultivating it. Hence to a great extent the frivolous habits too often contracted or indulged in at this period of life ; and hence a want of mental energy and a dearth of knowledge.

Nor is the intercourse with the other sex often such at all to correct this evil. Rarely meeting, except at times of relaxation, our youth naturally avoid such subjects as call for a vigorous exercise of the understanding ; and our young countrywomen are led to suppose that the most important questions on which they shall be called upon for an opinion, or on which they must presume to reflect, do not go beyond the merits of the last published novel, the prima donna of the Italian opera, the oratory of some fashionable preacher, or the illustrations to a new batch of annuals. Unhappily, women are not true to their own cause in protesting against this state of mental slavery ;—a state to which we doom them, partly from a selfish desire to retain all power in our own hands, partly from an overweening idea of the strength of our own minds, (backed by an unfounded conception that those of females will not bear labour), and partly from a persistence in the customs and feelings of by-gone ages of ignorance.

Nor when we reflect for a moment, is it surprising that women who have grown up under this bad system should be opposed to its amendment. Many must feel that their best age for acquiring knowledge has passed, and that in the new career they should soon be outstripped by their juniors.

We have no doubt that to a like motive may be attributed the continuance of many an objectionable system besides the one under consideration. A man who has spent the best portion of his youth in the exclusive study of Latin and Greek, for example, is not likely, unless he be of a superior cast of mind, to look with a friendly eye on proposals for giving more extended education to those who in a few years may become his competitors in the world. This motive may not be present to his mind—he may not even suspect its existence ; but that it does exist, and is powerful in its operation, can, we think, admit of no doubt.

To return to female education. Doubtless it is more easy to enlarge upon an evil than to point out the remedy ; but we think that among others inquiries as to the cause of the evils we have pointed out, it might be worth while examining whether that rule of modern schools by which the sexes are kept entirely apart has not been carried somewhat too far ? Under defective management, indeed, a departure from this rule might be very objectionable ; but where active supervision is combined with sound discretion, would such deviation be equally objectionable ? Many an instrument which is useless and dangerous when wielded by an ignorant man, has only to be put into skilful hands to become the means of effecting great good ; and perhaps the fear with which we have shunned what we consider the mistake of our forefathers on this point, may in a measure have arisen from the badness, not of the plan, but of its administration : any change, however, would have to be made with caution. It is possible that the monastic and nun-like system of education is the less of two evils ; though an evil it certainly is.

Without any wish to see girls become boys, or boys girls, we hope we may safely desire that the character of the former had somewhat more of strength, and that of the latter somewhat less of coarseness and disregard of the feelings of others. To us it appears worth considering, whether, with a view to these desirable changes, the established rule might be so far relaxed as to allow boys and girls to associate occasionally in some of those studies which are common to both. We are sometimes inclined to hope that such a measure would be followed by advantages which are at present little expected from such a source. We are sometimes inclined to imagine that much of the feeling which gives rise to impure thoughts, and precocious love-fits, may be fairly ascribed to the nervous anxiety that exists in parents, guardians, and teachers, on the subject of separation :—an anxiety which is constantly forced on the attention of those concerned, and which endows the proceedings of each sex with a mysterious interest which does not naturally belong to them. We cannot but hope that the occasional presence of their sisters, cousins, and other females of the same rank as their own, would in general be an effectual check to the boys in the expression of coarse ideas or rude language ; and we should also anticipate a favourable effect on their deportment to each other at times when they are alone. The female character too would, we trust, be benefited by this occasional association. We cannot but think that, by the greater mental energy which would be thus infused, and the interest which would be thus awakened on a variety of important subjects, the young female would be better fitted for the high task she has to perform as man's companion and helpmate,—the sharer of his joys, and his comfort in affliction.

ART. IV.—NOVELS OF THE DAY.

The novelist, like the historian, has a double mission to fulfil; if the latter is required not only to detail facts, but to detail them impartially as well as correctly, the former is expected to deal with the acts, motives, and characters of human life, not as his own passions or prejudices might direct him to pourtray them, but as they are. Both historian and novelist mistake the real utility of their callings egregiously when they suffer their minds to be warped by particular distastes, or carried away from their proper vocation by one-sided views, in the hope to please or find favor with one section of the community, rather than to enlighten and elevate all. With the historians of the day, we have at present nothing to do, but before we commence our observations on some of the popular fictions of the past season, we must hazard a few remarks on the spirit in which many of them have been conceived and executed.

Any one who takes up either the Moral or Fashionable Tales of Maria Edgeworth, will perceive that the most wholesome and salutary lessons may be inculcated in a form perfectly free from either political or religious bias, and therefore the more likely to extend their own utility by not giving offence to any one. She was too wise to convert a good novel into an imperfect sermon; and far too prudent to weaken real religious feeling by making her heroes and heroines speak like saints, and act like sinners, with tags of Scripture perpetually in their mouths, and a spirit greatly opposed to it in their hearts. To take up a book of "Light reading," and to find it a heavy homily, is to go into a theatre and find it turned into a conventicle; there are theological essayists enough who are perfectly well able to fight the partisan battles of disputed opinion, and therefore it is altogether out of place to expect, or to desire, that novel writers should perform a double duty, and give us scraps from the Pentateuch and sentiments fresh from London drawing rooms at the same time and in the same page. This want of artistic propriety is a monster of modern growth, and the sooner its hydra heads are cut off as unseemly excrescences, the better. When the authoress of "Evelina" put to shame and to flight the circulating library impurities which Sir Anthony Absolute called "an evergreen tree of diabolical knowledge," she did so not by a semi-theological jargon which sickens the sense and disgusts the taste, but by giving us pictures of character, individualized by the discrimination of genius, but untainted by the puritanical leaven which seems to be fast superseding the functions of nature herself, in the present day. In all the multitude of characters given us by Jane Austen (clergymen included), we find nothing approaching to it. As we have said before, it would vainly be looked for in the multifarious volumes of our accomplished countrywoman, Maria Edgeworth, and still more vainly in those of Lady Morgan, who in her utter dislike to it, sometimes ventured a little too far the other way. If we look to the superior order of masculine spirits who have made novels the vehicles of instruction and amusement, we will, for the most part, find the same diffidence in making an olla prodriva of the sacred and the profane. Sir Walter Scott, indeed, has shown his distaste to the old religion of Christendom, by painting monks and abbots with huge appetites and unspiritual propensities, but these caricatures are the least happy of his efforts, and to those who feel sore on the subject, the tu quoque argument might present itself, by contrasting the lordly equipage of a "mitred prelate" of our own day, proceeding in state to a court festival, with the "sumptuous housings" of Prior Aymer's "palfrey," or the dinner carte of Lambeth Palace on a company day, with the venison repasts of Abbot Boniface in his more unpretending "refectory," surrounded not by "dissipated nobles," but simple monks.

We believe, as far as we can trace their origin, that it is to America belongs the honor and glory, such as they are, of introducing what are now known by the name of "Religious Novels," as a new kind of manufacture in the literary workshop. They certainly all have a smack of "the camp-meetings" and the "love feasts" of our transatlantic friends, and, in the curious jumble they treat us to, are redolent of "spiritual embracings", and other innocent exercises, which "high religious enthusiasm" may sanction, but which a less fervent christianity could very well do without. "A religious novel" is, in itself, a paradoxical sort of production, which contains—and necessarily ~~must~~ contain—an incongruous mixture of heaven and earth, calculated, perhaps, to satisfy the consciences of those who wish to indulge in a taste for "light literature," and to be excited by the trials and sorrows of persecuted heroines, but, at the same time, who fancy that roses require supplementary names to smell sweet, and that the simple word novel, without the "religious" prefix, could hardly be tolerated in serious families, the members of which look upon stage plays as snares of the evil one, and, until lately, treated tales, novels, and romances as if they contained a similar bait. Of course, every author or authoress who writes a book wishes that peace as well as praise should sweeten their labors and reward their toil, and as the manufacture of the religious novel was found to pay in America, it very soon found its way into England, where it was set up as an ostensible antidote to those French works of imagination which every body censures, purchases, and reads, but, in reality, because publishers found the speculation turn to profitable account, and therefore pushed it into its present morbid growth. Moreover, to authors themselves, it saves a great deal of trouble and a good deal of thought, and helps them to spin out a second volume, and earn for themselves a very righteous title at the same time. When Sir John begins to grow dull or to want something to do or to say, it is easy enough to bring in Saint John to assist him; and where the story halts and incidents grow few, an opportune chapter on "scriptural christianity," with strong and feeling allusions to all who are supposed to be opposed to it, keeps the press moving, and winds up the reader to the proper pitch of enthusiasm for the reception of the grand finale, where all are made happy in the usual orthodox way.

Now, the worst of all this is—and we think of it and say it with great regret—that it is attended with considerable danger to religion itself; and if we were inclined to draw a somewhat illogical conclusion from the premises in hand, we might offer it as a curious coincidence that "startling crimes" of greater magnitude than usual have been perpetrated since this hybrid class has made its appearance on the scene. If Strahan and Paul ever admitted novels at all under their luxurious roofs we are quite sure they were religious ones; and, although the labors of the elder Dumas may have contributed to the chemical manipulations of Palmer and Dove, we should suspect that the "Provisions of Lady Evelyn," et hoc genus omne, were added as a makeweight to their library, as well as to those of the defaulting directors of banks, railways, and other undertakings of a similar kind, who generally rank in the category of "serious family men."

Let us not be mistaken, however; indeed we hope there is no danger that we should. We do not object to controversial works, even though bigotry and bad taste mark every page of them, because such perversions of intellect are sure, in the long run, to work their own cure and to bring their own reward; but what we do object to is the interweaving of one-sided religious views into a theme where no one expects or wishes to find them. Catholic writers, so far as we know, have had the good sense to leave such delicate matters untouched, even though the provocation has been by no means small to tempt them to forego it; but the question is, how long will this abstinence hold? and it is a matter for novel readers to consider, whether they would like to have doctrinal points largely discussed instead of sentimental ones, and whether it will be an additional pleasure to them to have "creedal errors," and such like matters, staring them in the face, when the most they look for is "an interesting conversation" between Mrs. A. and Miss B. as to the difficult point of determining whether the "fast man" Lord George is a safe parti to encourage, or whether it would not be better to take up with plain Mr. Allworthy, although he adds an H to his oats and an R to his window, and had a grandfather who cashed bills or sold calicoes.

Having made these prefatory observations, we turn to the novel of "EVELEEN," by E. L. A. Berwick, not because it is the most perfect one on our list, but because it is altogether free from the controversial taint to which we so much object. It is moral and suggestive, without being spiritual at all. It is a daring attempt to make women better than they are, by increasing their self-dependence and elevating their views, and when an author has such utilitarian objects steadily in his eye, we shall not think it needful to point to minor discrepancies obvious in the execution of his plan. The plot is not novel, but it is admirably worked out, and the conception of the heroine herself is spirited and good. EVELEEN is the narrator of her own story; she is the niece of Mr. Barrington, who marries a second wife, and sinks from a comfortable house-keeper into a henpecked poltroon. Of course, having a tyrant to rule him, he has no will of his own, and his niece is obliged to take up the cudgels and meet the despot, not only in her own defence, but in the defence of others as well. This she does in capital style. Mary, her cousin, a gentle creature to whom she is exceedingly attached, falls ill, and change of air is prescribed. They are allowed by the careless stepmother to go by themselves, and when on the sea shore, they get into danger from the waves, and are rescued from it by the two heroes of the book. From this point the main interest of the work begins, and the character of EVELLEN unfolds itself. There may be improbability about it, but there is great consistency, great strength of principle, great strength of mind, and great readiness of wit and of resource. She discovers, in a very dramatic way, that her hero-preserver, instead of being, as she supposed, a simple commoner, is "a belted Earl," rejoicing in a rent-roll of forty thousand a year. Yet she refuses him her hand, even while she acknowledges (to herself) that her heart is his. But he is indolent, captious, voluptuous—in fact good for nothing except to despise everything and enjoy nothing, and poor, illused, and dependent as she is, she looks at the matter with an unaccustomed and unselfish eye, and still refuses to become Lady Landore, because she feels that as a Countess she might be still more unhappy than she is. But her womanly influence continues, and her spirited and seasonable remonstrances are not thrown away. We lose sight of the young noble for a season, but he is not idle, as we hear. Love lights the lamp of Reason, and prompts him to the exertion which EVELLEN has often recommended, and which he has the good sense to pursue. Meanwhile, the intricacies of the plot continue, and are made more complicated by the introduction of Mr. Cabbell O'Fea into it, a smooth and villainous compound, whom we hate for his hypocrisy and admire for the calculating coolness of his subtle and serpent-like mind. It will be at once conceived that this "domestic demon" is at last found out and punished, and that EVELLEN and her bien aimée meet at the altar and are as happy as heart could wish.

Now there is an excellent "moral" couched in all this, and we think that the more female readers dwell on it, the more they will perceive its drift. In ordinary life, it is no libel on the gentle sex, or on the author, to say that the proceedings of EVELLEN would be in the highest degree improbable. There are few friends would sanction them; there is hardly "a candidate" who, whatever her own misgivings might be, who would not grasp at so glorious a prize, and hope for the best hereafter, when it was secured. And yet the reasonings of the young but high-minded girl are correct, and the sacrifices of feeling and position consequent on them, as corollaries, are felt to be equally so. The mist which Cupid and Pluto conjoined, sometimes spread over the female vision, is like the mirage of the desert, so celebrated in song and story, and often tempts the victims into pitfalls and quagmires, when they think they are going to inhabit cottages embowered in roses or castles overburdened with wealth. A "capital match" is not always a capital thing. Hymen must be worshipped not only with willing but with disinterested hearts, or his lamp is extinguished almost as soon as lighted, and not all the splendor of the world can relume it again. There can be no question, therefore, that the hesitation of Mr. Berwick's heroine was founded in virtuous prudence, and is worth pondering over by those to whom it is particularly addressed. We like to see such efforts and inculcations proceeding from thoughtful minds, even though a little exaggeration may be observable as we go along; and although the whole subject is one that at every page would have admitted of scriptural appeals, references, and allusions, we are most happy to say that the author has had the good taste to avoid more than one or two which were called for, and are therefore apposite and sure to be well received. As to a controversial or offensive phrase, there is not such a thing in the book.

In Mr. Reade's still more popular novel, "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," we find the same absence of the introduction of ill-placed matter which we so much deplore. We have, indeed, the agency of a clergyman, where any other agent could not well be supposed to have the power to do so much good, but then his references to holy names and things are in their proper place, and even if in some few instances he oversteps the just limits, we willingly bear with them when we perceive the wholesome results which spring from his determination to combat tyranny and make "prison discipline" what it ought to be, not what it is. In style and manner of handling, Mr. Reade vibrates between Dickens and Thackeray, but with very little of the clumsy manipulation of the latter, and a great deal of the force and finish of the former. At the same time he is not an imitator of either ; nor has he need to be. Taken as a whole, Mr. Thackeray has never yet written a novel that can be said to equal "It is Never too Late to Mend," nor do we think he ever will ; and although there are chapters and characters in some of Mr. Dickens's best works which are superior to any that can be found in it, still we doubt if in the naturalness of both scenes and portraiture, there is not sufficient material to stand a comparison with even the great novelist in his plainest mood. The adventures of Mr. Dickens's hero in America, are poor indeed when compared with the stirring and life-like scenes of Australia given us by the new candidate, who, if he has no Frank Tapley to carry off his insipidities, has the regenerated burglar and his vivid spirit of accurate observation and daring courage to create our warmest sympathies in his fortunes and his fate.

In the authoress of "JOHN HALIFAX, Gentleman," we welcome a practised hand, whose last novel led us to expect a great deal—more, perhaps, than we have actually received. In "The Head of the Family" we had charming domestic scenes charmingly painted, with exquisite delicacy of touch and the nicest discrimination, while there were no violent contrasts, if we except the mad actress, whose appearance, we suppose, could not well be avoided, although, from the first, we never desired to see her face again. In JOHN HALIFAX, as it strikes us, there is a greater grasp at power with less nerve to sustain it. Taken, per se, Gentleman John is a character of great merit, which few novelists of the present day, would venture to grapple with, and in which the majority of them would fail if they did ; but then he is surrounded by a whole bunch of fellow-performers, who, with the exception of his excellent wife, are, if not positive failures, next door to it, at all events. Surely, the obtrusion of that coarse and repulsive fellow, Squire Brithwood, is altogether a mistake, and his lady another ? It is hardly possible that since the days of Squire Western, the country gentlemen of England have not so far improved as to make such a character a complete exaggeration, and it is out of all keeping to suppose that a man of Doctor Jessop's standing would have tolerated the language used by Brithwood to Halifax—in his own drawing-room, too,—without ordering his ejection from the house by the most summary mode possible. We know that his vulgar insolence is paraded for the purpose of heightening the forbearing courtesy and good temper of John ; but it shews a want of artistic appreciation to admit a blemish in order to heighten a beauty, and as it is evident that the portraiture of such characters are out of the authoress's line altogether, the introduction might very well have been done without. Had she indeed given us more than she has done of the shadowy Lord Ravenel, it would have been an admirable exchange, for there are great capabilities about the latter, which might have been nurtured into a first rate picture, had the attention given to the Gentleman been divided with the Lord. In Mr. Berwick's novel, of which we have already spoken, the character of Lord Landore resembles that of Lord Ravenel in many points, but the handling is very dissimilar, and we would take the liberty of advising the authoress of "John Halifax" to glance it over, if she have not already done so, in order that she may see how much she has lost by not working out her sketch of the indolent young noble and giving him more work to do.

In the conduct of the story there is an obvious falling off in the last volume, and the worst effect of this is, that it not only diminishes the general interest of the work, but somewhat lowers the hero himself in our estimation. In his own early love-scenes with Ursula Marsh, every passage is delicate in touch and full of discriminative beauty, but in the turbulent passion of his son Guy, and the unseemly domestic squabbles which attend it, we seem to have got under another influence altogether. It is not pleasant to suppose that in the rearing and governing of his own children, a man of John Halifax's capacity, should have so utterly failed as the conduct of his sons prove him to have done, and still less is it credible that the French governess, Miss Silver, wishy-washy and uninteresting as she is, could have caused such disturbance as she did, if the most common precautions were taken or vigilance observed. We have an idea that this cunning idiot was an after thought altogether, and most heartily do we wish that she had been left in her native France, where neither Guy nor his brother could have fought for her.

We might, if we so pleased, address ourselves to the unpleasant task of commenting on some of the offensive allusions to the followers of a different creed, which are very needlessly intruded here and there, throughout the book, but we abstain. It is evident enough, that the authoress is no true child of the Pope, but we submit it to her good sense that controversial views may weaken the interest of a story, without adding to the strength of a Church," and that although prejudice may be conciliated by an unbecoming enlistment of scriptural phrases and inferences, used without rhyme or reason, and often sadly misplaced, both religion and reason revolt at the unwholesome spectacle caused by parading them before the eyes of men, in the pages of a novel, whether from a sanctimonious desire to be applauded by the pious, or the more worldly one of being rewarded by the profane.

Mrs. Marsh's novel of "EVELYN MARSTON," like most of her productions, wears a pious as well as a sentimental air, and is an odd mixture of theology and romance; under any circumstances, this would be distasteful to us, but it is rendered still more so, by the bungling and inartificial nature of the execution of the work. In the "Previsions of Lady Evelyn," we have a gallery of pictures—Glenmore, Green, Canham, the young Countess, Clarinda, and the young tutor, with his unfortunate propensities to fall in love with the last person in the world he ought to do, for his father had been a clergyman, and his mother was almost a saint; and we have scraps of scripture to no end, beginning in the very first paragraph with a quotation from Saint Paul, so that if there was a consistently pious hero in the world it ought to have been Gerald James. But he is not that nor anything like it—in acts. He yields to temptations with a very ungodly facility, and encourages others to do the same. Poor Lady Clarinda, as well as her haughty sister, suffers from his basilisk glance, and runs after him from her father's house, in the disguise of a boy. To be sure, when she arrives at his lodging, determined "to throw herself on his protection," as the phrase is; she addresses the servant in scripture form. "A cup of cold water to one of these little ones, shall in no case fail of its reward," said the boy; well might the maid of all work exclaim as she listened, "Well, if I ever! laws! if he don't quote Scripture like any parson!" If she knew but the half of it she might afford to be twice as much surprised, and with double reason, too. Still, we overlook this "seriously" mistaken treatment, in admiration of the many coloured incidents and stir and bustle of the plot. And so it is with the other earlier works of the same clever hand. But her latter productions began to make us wish that she would not write quite so fast, and if she gives us another EVELYN MARSTON, we shall be quite sure to wish that she should not write at all, or that she should change her vocation and take to writing "Tracts" instead of novels, which might answer her purpose and not so utterly disappoint us. And the worst of it is, clever people, like Mrs. Marsh, are always prone to see the mote in the eye of their neighbours without being able to discover the beam in their own. In her first volume we find her objecting to those who hold "principles of the ancient, strong, stern, but somewhat narrow school, which permitted no tampering with truth, and believed that there was but one form of religious truth, and that it was theirs." The italics are our own. In a few pages farther on she says, "too much of the spirit, alas! still remains amongst us all. We cannot enter a company of our fellows, without detecting, whenever the question of religion is propounded, some prejudice of this description still lingering in the heart. It seems the last to be laid down, monstrous and unreasonable as it is."

As an excuse for the writer of "Evelyn Marston," it may be alleged that her polemical pruriencies form a necessary ingredient in its composition, without the intervention of which it would be impossible to fill a single volume, much less three. What story there is might, perchance, serve for a magazine article, although so meagre is the plot, and so extremely common-place and "used up" are the incidents, that we question if any magazine or periodical of the present day would accept it as a gift, unless it might happen that as its phylactery is long, the pharisees of "Household Words" might take a fancy to it, and adopt it as their own. But trite and worn out as the materials are, there can be no doubt that a great deal more could be made of them, and in the slovenly neglect to work them up, we have full reason to accuse the authoress of debarring us of a pleasure which she was quite competent to give, as well as of nauseating us with matter, which, as reasonable Christians and well-wishers to religion, we are exceedingly sorry to peruse. Of course, Mrs. Marsh will write again; and, with all her faults, we should be sorry to miss her from the annual field; but we honestly hope that she will at length recognize the fact that a good novelist and a good casuist are different things; and that recklessly to run full tilt at the Bible, because it is the Bible, and to transcribe whole pages from the Sacred Book into a light and frivolous work, is a degradation to the volume which ought to be treated in a very different way. Let her, by all means, combat social error, and advance sound social reforms, and we shall welcome her again and again. We are overrun with pestilent pictures of the worst phases of life, and the worst characters which disgrace it; we have Sand, Sue, and Dumas' abominations at home as well as abroad—indigenous as well as foreign—and the pen that affords an antidote to them will ever have our warmest commendations; but it will very clearly be seen, by the scope and nature of this article, that we have no stomach for the overloaded piety which seeks to discharge itself in volleys of words, and fancies that it relieves itself of the danger of being accounted a publican from inditing profane stories, by making those stories puritanical and profitable at the same time. Every human thing has its use—and its abuse. To be "a religious novelist," is to put a dagger into the hand of the scoffer instead of a sword into the grasp of those who hold those things dear which the sceptic holds cheap. There have been great novelists who were great moralists at the same time, and yet who scorned the clap-trap of religious reference at every hand's turn, because they knew their own province, they felt their own power, and they shrank from the unseemly contact and combination which are now the vogue, and which they knew were as perilous in reality as they were easy to be done.

"DRED!" Who has not read "Dred?" "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "Jane Eyre," ran their popular race at a period of time not very far distant from each other; and although the absorbing nature of the subject discussed in "Uncle Tom," with the novelty of characters and incidents touched on and introduced, weakened Miss Bronte's production, with its greater mastery of language and passion; still we think, and we fancy the public think with us, that as "Jane" exhausted the powers of her creator, so has "Uncle Tom" played Mrs. Beecher Stowe the same treacherous part—although certainly in not so very perceptible a degree. "Dred," in proportion, is undoubtedly nearer to the authoress's great work, than "Shirley," or "Viletto," is to "Jane Eyre;" but, notwithstanding, like single-speech Hamilton, and his first and last oratorical efforts, we feel, if the authoress does not, that the riches of the mine have been pretty well worked out by the laborer, and that, in all human probability, the lower she goes the less she will get. This, perhaps, was to be expected; one cannot be an intellectual prodigal without suffering by the excessive expenditure, especially when a particular region is chosen, and a particular object is pertinaciously kept in view. When Thomas Campbell was asked to write a poem similar in style and metre to his "Pleasures of Hope," his answer was, "No ; a man may make a single plunge and bring up a pearl, but he may dive a hundred times after, and find nothing but oyster shells to reward him for his pains." This was not Mrs. Beecher Stowe's view of her own capability, and it could hardly be expected that it could. Enthusiastic as she is as an abolitionist, and successful as she has been as a novelist, either motive might have swayed her to re-enter the lists, but with both to actuate her, impression was impossible. We might as soon have expected Scott to have stopped short at Waverley, or Dickens at Pickwick, or Byron at the Giaour, or Rosa Bonheur to fling by her pencil while the fame of her great picture was yet ringing in her modest ears.

We know not what time it may have taken to compose "Uncle Tom's Cabin;" but it is abundantly evident that its successor has been written in too great a hurry ; and although, in this instance, we could not go so far as to say that Mrs. Stowe's "easy writing is d——d hard reading," still the fact of undue haste is not less patent, and we have a right to complain that we are thereby deprived of a very sensible pleasure which we resent as an unnecessary loss. In the first place, the authoress had no story to tell ; she had an essay to write, and she has thrown it into the form of desultory dialogues, with interlocutors, the greater number of whom are thoroughly uninteresting, and by far too large a number of them coarse, vulgar, and revolting in the extreme. In the second place, the characters, such as they are, do nothing but talk ; they have the vox et proterea gift to an alarming extent ; but when they come to act, they are as barren of fruit as a fig tree in December. Dred, the hero of the book, in name, is a half-maddened mystic, who lives in the dismal swamp, threatens his tyrants in scriptural language, and is shot down, we are not told how, but certainly without striking a stroke in his own defence, or that of any body else. Nina is allowed to live, until she becomes interesting, and then she is carried off by cholera, as Mercutio is by the sword of Tybalt, just when we particularly wish her not to die. Her gay, bluff, good-hearted old uncle, is finished off in the same manner ; and although Harry and Clayton survive, they are so sketchy and imperfect as actors, that we hardly care a button whether they live or die. The villain of the book, Tom Gordon, outrages all our notions of poetical justice, by being allowed to lynch, whip, tar-and-feather, ravish, rob, exterminate, and commit such like atrocities, without a single hair of his guilty head being the worse of it. He may be getting drunk and blaspheming to this very hour, for aught we know, as when Mrs. Stowe dropped him, he was as prosperous as any slave-holding scoundrel could well be. We have certainly the consolation to hear that "Tiff" survives and prospers, and we are glad of it, inasmuch as we think that he and "Milly" are the only two characters worth a maravedi in the whole list. We might probably include "Tomtit" only that Tom evaporates like the rest, in order to make room for casuists and preachers, who, like almost all the other white people introduced, have little to recommend them but the ability to say much and do nothing.

What we regret particularly to learn from the book, are two disheartening facts; namely, that slavery, as an institution, is fixed and likely to be permanent; and that religion, properly so called, is at the very lowest ebb in the southern states of the American union. The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is in the hand of every man, woman, and child; black, white, or cream-colored; their songs are biblical, their sayings are biblical; like the devil, they can quote scripture for their purposes, and never hesitate to do so, by any compunctious visitings, or wholesome remorse. But, after all, the utmost extent of the contrition that even the worst amongst them exhibits, is a momentary inipulse, and may be typified by the exclamation of preacher Bonnie, over Ben Dakin, at the camp meeting:—"Take this poor sinner, now, O Lord! to thyself, for if you don't he will be drunk again in two days." We are presented with pictures of Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and others, and, with the single exception of Dickson, a more selfish, worthless or cowardly set of companions we never travelled with. We suppose that Mrs. Stowe has chosen the least disinterested as examples, but we cannot wonder that the whites are as black as sin can make them, when their spiritual affairs are directed by such men; and it is utterly hopeless to suppose that the blot of slavery can ever be removed, when each sect is afraid of giving its rival sect an advantage by counselling its removal from the national banner. If we required any additional illustrations of the danger which "the Bible let loose" is capable of doing, Mrs. Stowe's "Dred," affords a series of "notes and comments," which Christians of all creeds would do well to ponder over, and which we cannot but hope will have a salutary effect, if anything can.

---

ART. V.—THE BRISTOL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION :

WITH A GLANCE AT IRELAND.

The Law Amendment Journal. Being the Weekly Journal of The Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law.
Vol. I. No. 22. London : Published at 3 Waterloo Place.

We were passing the door of the office of The Morning Post, some weeks since, accompanying an esteemed friend who is one of the chief advocates of the Reformatory Movement, and he stopped before the door and said, "Ten years ago The Post, in describing some efforts I and others were making to bring the Reformatory Question before the country, described me as a well-meaning, philanthropic old gentleman, with an absurd crotchet. See what we have now done !—Erasmus was a great man—Festina Lenti !"

Doubtless there are few points in the history of Bull's legislation which have required so much support, from what Sydney Smith calls "those affecting circumstances," dates, facts and figures, before he could be induced to give to it even a very small share of support, and a still smaller share of earnest attention, as the Reformatory Movement; but he did attend at last, and we trust that through the zealous efforts of The National Reformatory Union and the Reformatory and Refuge Union, we shall be able to make Bull still more attentive, and shall be able, likewise, in the words of Canon Girdlestone, "to combine for the purpose of presenting a firm and united front to the common enemy"—Juvenile Crime, without sectarian or theological differences interposing to check the work we have in hand and in heart.

In the RECORD of our last Number we inserted a full report of the various Sectional Meetings of the Bristol Conference, but at the period of our publication, the papers read in the Sections were not before us.

As printed in the number of The Law Amendment Journal, placed at the head of this article, these papers were twelve in number, and on the following subjects:—

- 1 On the Reformatory Institutions in and near Bristol. By Mary Carpenter.
- 2 The Inefficiency of Simply Penal Legislation. By Lord Brougham.
- 3 Punishments in Reformatory Schools. By E. B. Wheatley, M.A., one of the Chairmen of the Quarter Sessions of the West Riding.
- 4 Visit to Mettray. By Frederic Hill.
- 5 Transportation and Reformation. By Captain Crofton, Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland.
- 6 On the Industrial Schools of Scotland, and the Working of Dunlop's Act. By Alfred Hill.
- 7 On the Connection between Juvenile Crime and the Drinking Habits of Society. By H. Cossham.
- 8 On the Suggestion of a Measure by which Juvenile Offenders may be Reclaimed, and a regular supply of Seamen be obtained for her Majesty's Service. By Thomas Philpotts.
- 9 On the Liverpool Akbar Hulk Reformatory. By Mr. Brougham.
- 10 On the Relation of Reformatory Schools to the State, and the General Principles of their Management, especially in reference to Female Reformatories. By Mary Carpenter.
- 11 On the Best Means of Providing for the Inmates of Reformatory Schools on their Discharge. By Rev. S. Turner.
- 12 On Previous Imprisonment for Children Sentenced to Reformatories. By Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart.

When the National Reformatory Union was founded at Hardwicke Court, one of its chief objects was declared to be the collection and dissemination of facts and experiences bearing upon and useful in successfully working, the Reformatory Principle. Taking this Bristol Conference as the first general meeting held in accordance with the objects as above stated, the members of the Union may feel fully satisfied with the result.

During the year 1856, the members have been active and earnest in their efforts, not alone to carry out the broad principles of conciliation and non-interference with the religious feelings of any shade of dissent, but they have been enabled by this honest, wise, enlightened system of co-operation to number, amongst their members, men and women of every religion. Not indeed that they deny that religion is, and must of necessity be, the foundation, and the pervading spirit of reformation, and its strongest and most perfect safeguard. As Canon Girdlestone well and truly wrote, last August, to The Daily News, the breadth of the principles of the Union is its chiefest perfection. He writes :—

In seconding a resolution at the late meeting of the National Reformatory Union in this place, I took the opportunity of vindicating the breadth of the basis on which that Union is founded. I have been since told in many quarters, and especially by members of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, that the breadth of the basis on which the National Reformatory Union is founded made it necessary at the meetings at Bristol to ignore all religion, and that it is impossible to expect the blessing of God upon efforts carried out in this manner. I think it right that the attention of the public should be directed to the fact, that religion was not ignored at the Bristol meeting. On the contrary, the absolute necessity of the religious element in all reformatory work was so plainly and earnestly stated, both by Lord Robert Cecil and Mr. Miles, on Thursday evening, that it was impossible to add anything to the force of those statements.

With regard to not expecting as much of the blessings of God upon the National Reformatory Union as upon the Reformatory a Refuge Union, the real difference between the two Unions is, not that the one ignores religion and the other does not, or even that one is really more religious than the other, but that the one does not consider it necessary to add to its rules a clause containing the words "Holy Scripture," and that the other does; though by doing so, as has been confessed to me by one of its members, it will in all probability exclude from its committee both Roman Catholics and Unitarians.

Now, this is objectionable, because, even in the abstract, it is better to widen where it is possible rather than contract the basis of mutual co-operation, and to dwell on the points on which all agree rather than on those on which we differ. It is objectionable also, because, in the case of a union, whose object it is not to found or manage any particular school or schools, but to provide such a medium of general intercommunication as may lead to the establishment, by those of various religious persuasions, of schools of the best quality for the reformation of the children of parents of the same persuasion, it is of great importance to interpose no unnecessary obstacle in the way of having persons of all persuasions on the committee. If it be the real intention of this addition, which I hope it is not, to discourage the founding of any Reformatories except those in which the authorized version is read, then it is mischievous in a still greater degree; for surely it is better that young criminals should be reformed on Roman Catholic or Unitarian principles, than that they should remain rogues and vagabonds.

In short, it appears to me that the breadth of the basis on which the National Reformatory Union is constituted, so far from being open to objection, most thoroughly fulfils the idea suggested by the title National, and to an extent hardly otherwise attainable without sacrifice of principle or reference to theological differences, enables all to combine for the purpose of presenting a firm and united front to the common enemy.

Your obedient servant,

E. GIRDLESTONE, Canon of Bristol.

Amongst the most important of the practical papers read in the Sections, are Mr Wheatley's on Punishment in Reformatory Schools, Miss Carpenter's paper on the Management of Female Reformatories, Mr. Turner's on the Means of Providing for the Inmates of Reformatory Schools on their Discharge, and Sir S. Northcote's on Previous Imprisonment for Children Sentenced to Reformatories. Captain Crofton's letter was also most important, but we referred to it at some length in our September number.

Sir Stafford Northcote is one of the most clear headed, earnest, and able advocates of the Reformatory system, and has brought experience, a high position, a trained intellect, and a powerful pen to back the National Reformatory Union. He has, both in his paper, Reformatory Schools, printed in The Quarterly Review, and in this paper now before us, shown himself fully capable of, as a friend of his says, "tackling" any difficulties surrounding the Movement.

He considers that previous punishment should be inflicted on all committed to a Reformatory who can be shown to have understood that they were criminal in infringing the law. He shows, with great clearness, that although the French principle, sans discernement, may be sometimes well founded, yet that in practice it is not acquiesced in by the popular mind of France. He writes :—

Those who have had experience of boy-nature know well that long before the age of 16, the faculties and the moral sense of ninety-nine in a hundred are sufficiently developed to enable the lad to discern clearly what is right and what is wrong, and to estimate the probable consequences of his own actions. It may indeed be true that a bad education and the evil example of those around him may have greatly blunted his conscience and his intellect, and that he may have become an object deserving far more of pity than of indignation ; but the same might with equal truth be said of many an adult ; and it would be hard to frame an argument which should lead to the acquittal of a youth of 16, on the ground that he had never been taught anything but evil, and should allow of his conviction at 18, after having gone through two years more of education in depravity, without a ray of light to rouse him to consciousness of his state. We cannot doubt that before an Omniscient tribunal, the advantages which each man has enjoyed will be duly taken into account when judgment is pronounced upon him; but such discrimination is beyond the power of an earthly judge.

There is, however, an argument of which we must take notice. M. De Metz, both in writing and in conversation, upholds the French system of acquittal, on the ground that it is important, both for the tone of the Reformatory establishment and for the prospects of the inmates when the time comes for their leaving it, that they should not have been stigmatized by a condemnation (flétris par la condamnation). I will not pretend to say what weight this argument may deserve with reference to the state of feeling in France, but as applicable to this country it seems to me a very weak one. That a boy who has been convicted of an offence before a court of justice loses somewhat of his self respect, and is under a disadvantage in the eyes of the world, is perfectly true; but it must be remembered that even on the French principle, in order to his first admission into a Reformatory School, it is necessary that he should have been charged before a court of justice, and that the offence with which he is charged should be proved to have been committed by him, and that his acquittal is no proof of his innocence, but a mere formality of the law. So far, therefore, as his character is concerned, the fact of his not receiving punishment for his offence does not prevent the stigma of guilt attaching to his name. The shame is in the commission of the offence; punishment stigmatizes by marking that the offence has been committed, and acquittal is honourable as showing that it has not been committed; but do away with this feature of an acquittal, and you turn it, so far as the impression it creates as to the boy's character, into a conviction. On this point I must appeal to the testimony of M. De Metz himself, who speaking of the French system before the establishment of Metray, tells us that there was a difficulty in placing out the young détenus (I am forced to use the French term to express the French idea), because "they inspired the master manufacturer who knew their antecedents with a certain distrust, in some respects legitimate, since the latter did not feel themselves sufficiently prepared to combat, in these young assistants whose reformation might be matter of doubt, the vicious tendencies and evil will that might reappear." These children, then, though acquitted as having acted without discernment, were by M. De Metz's own statement, stigmatized as offenders.

Sir Stafford, however, would not allow any portion of the punishment to be inflicted in the Reformatory. He would have no sign of the gaol about the school, and he considers, and considers wisely, that the farmer who sees the inmates of the school working freely and cheerfully, is apt to forget the prisoner in seeing only the boy.

Having stated his opinions thus, it became necessary that he should point out the species of punishment to be adopted, and accordingly Sir Stafford considers that the best previous punishment is separate confinement, the prisoner being carefully watched. He supports this opinion by the authority of M. Demetz, the Rev. S. Turner, Colonel Jebb, and the Rev. Mr. Burt. Flogging he considers unsuited to the class of boys sent to Reformatories, because "dragged up," as they generally are, from the cradle to the dock, knowing nothing of hands but their blows, nothing of lips but their curses, it can do nothing, save harm, to show them that, within the gaol as without it, the rough and ready code of discipline prevails.

He thus concludes his paper:—

I will sum up, then, the views which I have ventured to put forward by expressing generally my conviction that, so long as Reformatory School are confined to children who have been guilty of breaches of the law, such children ought to undergo punishment previously to their admission, and that such punishment should generally be a short term of imprisonment on the separate system. I am quite aware that at present it is only in a small number of prisons that the separate system of confinement is fully carried into effect; and I am no sensible of the evils of associated imprisonment, that I should willingly see a discretion given to committing magistrates as to imprisoning at all, where separation cannot be secured. But I should suppose that in a considerable number of gaols where the system is not adopted in its integrity, the means of separating two or three boys, and there would seldom be more at one time, from the mass of hardened felons might without difficulty be found; and where they do not exist they ought to be provided.

I should here conclude, were it not that I feel bound to add that while approving of the previous imprisonment of boys convicted of breaches of the law, I deeply regret that the benefits of the Reformatory system are still confined to that class alone. We have yet to strike at the root of the mischief of which we are now content to lop the branches. I trust the example which has been set us in Scotland, and many procure the authority to compel the thousands of vagrant children who now swarm through the streets and alleys of our large towns, to come into schools of industry, where they may be properly brought up as useful members of the community. In as far as the necessity for imprisoning a boy, before sending him to a Reformatory, operates to the exclusion of the destitute and perishing vagrant, against whom no crime is proved, in so far the advocates of a change in the law have my heartiest concurrence. But for this something more than the mere abrogation of imprisonment is needed.

The provision we require is one that shall open schools of industry distinct from, but giving the same kind of education as the Reformatory School, to all the children of the poor who may desire to avail themselves of such advantages. The parents should be made to contribute according to their means; the state, the parish, and private benevolence, might divide the remainder of the expense. To these schools the children of persons receiving parochial relief might be sent at the cost of the Union; and to these or similar schools vagrant and deserted children might be committed under magisterial authority. The Reformatory proper would be confined to those who had actually been convicted of and duly punished for crime, and the admission into it would be no boon to the criminal class, but only an extension to them of a benefit of which all might avail themselves, subject to modifications which would be suitable to the peculiarities of their case. In the adoption of some such system I think we may see our way to the solution of many of the problems with which we are now engaged, including that of Previous Imprisonment.

At the conclusion of Sir Stafford Northcote's paper, a discussion arose in which the Rev. Mr. Osborne, Chaplain of Bath Prison, Mr. Pownall, Chairman of Middlesex Sessions, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Recorder Hill, and Lord Stanley, declared themselves in favor of the addition of previous imprisonment; the Rev. S. Turner was in favor of previous imprisonment, and Sir John Pakington said that he had altered his opinion on this subject. Last session he had voted for the proposed clause, which made imprisonment discretionary with the committing magistrate; but he was now convinced that it was better to punish in every case, and that the proper place for that punishment was the prison, and not the school.

So far of the previous imprisonment point; we now turn to the no less important question of punishment within the Reformatory, after the boy shall have been transmitted from the Prison. To the consideration of this subject, Mr. Wheatley has brought knowledge, patient research, and all the qualities which render him worthy our deepest and most earnest attention. Having studied, and thought over, and lectured upon Mettray, that Mecca of the Reformatory School advocate, he is able to measure its points of discipline in every position, and to judge how far they may be adopted, and how many may be adapted to the requirements and peculiarities of these kingdoms. He writes:—

In cases of serious misconduct in a Reformatory, the power given by Mr. Adderley's Act to remit to prison for a period not exceeding three months may sometimes be advantageously exercised. I believe, too, that we shall find it desirable to seek by further legislation on this point for a power analogous to the French reintegration—that is, the capital punishment of the code of Mettray and other French Reformatories. When a member of the community proves himself so corrupt that the hope of benefit to himself does not countervail the danger to the rest, he is returned to prison, never to return to the colony. The effect of that measure, where it has been judged necessary at Mettray, is described as most beneficial, not only to the general body, but even in many cases to the unhappy member thus cut off, in whom, as with many of us in the world, the sense of opportunities neglected, of kindness despised, comes home with tenfold force when forfeited and withdrawn. Such a power I think we ought to seek by further legislation, lest we be forced to sacrifice the hopes of many to the inveterate corruption of one.

For the minor faults of more frequent occurrence, it is desirable that the Reformatory should have within itself a few cells. Simple closets, with windows large enough for ventilation but not for escape, will answer. They should be removed as far as possible from access of other boys and from each other; for if not, the isolation, which is the beneficial essence of the punishment, may be lost. On this point, that the cells should not be within hearing of each other, M. De Metz dwelt much in conversations which I had with him on his last visit to England, after he had seen some of our Reformatories.

He also insisted, with all the energy of manner which those who have seen him well know, on the "indispensable necessity" of having what he called a cachot—a dungeon. "A common cellar will do," he said, "with just openings enough to let in air. You should have a few boards and a bit of straw for a bed." Before those of sensitive nerves shrink from the greatest probably of living philanthropists as a savage barbarian, let them hear his meaning: "A boy," he says, "will sometimes, when put into the cell, in the first moment of excitement, hammer and kick the door, and shout as loud as he can by way of defiance. If the cell is your ultima ratio, he may continue that course for some time, receiving no benefit himself, and breeding insubordination in others. But if you have your cellar, you can introduce him to that. The straw bed is put there, not that you intend him to sleep on it, but for him to see that provision is made for his doing so in case he continue insubordinate. In an hour or two you visit him again, and find him probably cooled down morally as well as physically, and glad to exchange the cellar for the ordinary cell on condition of quiet submission."

To subdue insubordination there must always be a possible means beyond that actually used. The offender must not know the limit of your power, otherwise the boy of strong will and nerve will often screw his courage up to endure beyond that limit in the hope of obtaining a triumph.

While the cell may thus on the one hand be made of means to check those cases of insubordination, which will be the rarer the better the general management, and rarer still if provision be made for them, it may also be made a means by which punishment can be greatly diminished, if not altogether avoided.

I cannot do better than quote again the words of the directors of Mettray on this most important point in the administration of all punishment (Rapp. 1841, p. 28).

"If it be desired that chastisement should produce a salutary effect, it is necessary that he who is subjected to it should receive it with resignation, and should be the first to acknowledge that he has deserved it. To obtain this conviction in the culprit, in the first place, the punishment must be inflicted with calmness and temper; and be dictated by the strictest justice, that power of reason which should convince while it commands; and in the second, he who inflicts the chastisement and he who receives it must both be free from excitement.

"These conditions cannot co-exist while the indignation which is produced by any serious offence prevails.

"These conditions cannot co-exist while the indignation which is produced by any serious offence prevails.

"For this reason our labour masters are directed, when they have any complaint against a boy, to send him to an apartment which is our station house (Salle de Dépôt) but called the parloir, because we seek to avoid any name which may recall the prison to the minds of our boys. Nothing is prejudged by boys being sent to the parloir; they even go there of their own accord. As soon as this measure has become necessary in the case of any boy, they come immediately and apprise us. We have time to look to his antecedents, and if necessary to make enquiries.

"During this interval the culprit comes to himself; the master cools; we have an opportunity of considering and advising with one another; and thus when we give our decision with full knowledge of the case and in cool blood, we have security that true fatherly justice is done.

"If hitherto nothing has been made of these boys, it is perhaps because it has been thought possible as regards them to dispense with that patience, that douceur—the French word to which I confess I do not know any English equivalent—and above all with that discretion which their age requires, especially when we are dealing with a collection of boys among whom the most intelligent communicates his ideas to the rest, and who mutually inform and stimulate each other."

The parloir here spoken of and now called the Salle de Reflexion, is simply one of the cells used for punishment. The inferior officers can send a boy there, but he is considered as not in punishment, but awaiting his trial, till seen by the directors. I believe it is scarcely possible to over estimate the importance of this arrangement. Besides the advantage of giving time for cool reflection to all parties, so well pointed out in the extract I have read, it serves further to meet a great difficulty in the practical working of the Reformatory, viz., as to the degree of authority to be given to the inferior and superior officers respectively.

At Mettray the power of inflicting any punishment except the lightest is reserved entirely to the superior; and rightly, for if the inferior is to punish on the spur of the moment, he will often be at once complainant, judge, jury, and executioner; and with so many functions to exercise, is not likely to perform any very well. But by remitting the culprit to the cell for trial, he is enabled to maintain his own authority and check the spread of insubordination, and at the same time allow of cool and impartial trial before actual punishment be inflicted.

This caution, coupled with the principle of Beccaria before quoted, points out a Scylla and Charybdis, one of many such cases in the course of criminal reformation through which we have to steer.

While on the one hand sufficient time must be allowed between the offence and its punishment to ensure calm judgment and fatherly justice; on the other, the punishment must not be so long delayed that the association between the ideas of that and the fault be lost, lest the act assume in the sufferer's eye rather the aspect of cold-blooded cruelty than of cool justice; and seem to him a gratuitous infliction of suffering.

A few words as to corporal punishment., I am one who inclines to the old-fashioned idea, that in the cases of acute moral disease, the outbreaks of uncontrolled passion and wilful disobedience to which ordinary children are so liable, a counter irritation judiciously applied may often be useful to draw down, as the old herbalists would say, the bad humours from the nobler parts. But I believe its usefulness is limited to cases to which the general tone of the moral constitution is healthy. I have little faith in its efficacy in the chronic diseases, with which we have for the most part to deal in our Reformatories.

From being rather an advocate of corporal punishment for young criminals, I was first led to the opposite view by observations derived from our vast prison in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and from the black books at Quarter Sessions, in which it is remarkable how often, in those long lists of previous convictions which appear against a young criminal, a whipping has been one of the early punishments; and as far as my inquiries into the primary causes of youthful crime have gone, I find none more common than over severity of parents, step-parents, or others.

It is peculiarly difficult, in the administration of corporal punishment, to steer clear of the Scylla and Charybdis before-mentioned. If it follow quickly upon the offence, it assumes the character of a personal conflict, in which the blood of both parties is up, and the submission of the sufferer is in his mind merely that of the physically weaker to the stronger. If on the other hand it be long delayed, it assumes to the sufferer, who from the bluntness of moral sense which is characteristic of the criminal, scarcely realizes the moral wrongness of his fault, the aspect of gratuitous and cold-blooded cruelty.

The former is generally the character of corporal punishment as administered by the rough hands of parents, step-parents and sometimes employers, prompted rather by revengeful passion than by reason or desire for the child's real good.

The latter is, probably, for the most part, the aspect which corporal punishment, as administered by the officers of justice for crime, assumes to the culprit.

Both cases involve the fault so great yet so common, that of causing, from want of attention to the principles of human nature, some of those principles to act against us instead of on our side, in our attempts at moral improvement.

Our great moralist, Bishop Butler, has shown the wise ends for which there is implanted in our nature by its Divine Author a principle of resentment, which he acutely distinguishes into two kinds, hasty and sudden, or settled and deliberate resentment. The former is that instinct which we have in common with the lower animals, which leads us in self-defence to resist sudden force and violence without regard to its justice or injustice.

The latter in its proper use, as distinguished from the many abuses to which it is liable, is that sense of justice which leads us to desire that injustice and wrong, as such, whether done to ourselves or others, should be punished.

Now, the first of these feelings is, from the nature of the case, necessarily called into exercise by corporal punishment.

One great advantage of the cell as a means of correction is, that it avoids the calling this natural feeling into exercise. The solitude, and separation from exciting causes tend to allay instead of stimulating sudden resentment.

In dealing with a number of boys whose moral sense has been blunted by neglect, who have been habituated to call evil good and good evil, the first great difficulty is to bring their deliberate resentment, their sense of justice over from the side of wrong to that of right.

This is peculiarly difficult in the case of corporal punishment. The sight, or even the knowledge of acute suffering tends by the natural feeling of compassion to produce in others sympathy with the sufferer. This sympathy will be the stronger as their sense of his fault is weaker.

Where the culprit has little sense of his own moral fault, the sympathy of others both tends further to deaden that sense, and give him strength to endure.

To the boy accustomed to the reckless excitement, the alternations of prodigal sensuality and cold want of a criminal life, it is easy to screw his courage to the sticking place to endure the sharp but short severity of corporal punishment. If by strong nerve, and especially if helped by the sympathy of others, he endure without yielding, he gains a decided triumph—a thing to boast of, a laurel to which the eye of depraved ambition can look beyond the suffering.

Considered, therefore, merely as a deterrent, I believe that corporal punishment is less effective than the cell, because its limit is so soon reached and so plainly visible. The cell is more really formidable, because, though less severe, its mild discipline can be continued almost indefinitely.

Considered as a correction, it can be adjusted with a nicety which corporal punishment does not admit of, to the requirements of the case, and under proper arrangements prolonged from simple temporary preventive detention to long continued isolation as the moral symptoms of the patient, developed from time to time, may seem to require.

In both points of view, both as a corrective and as a deterrent, the plan adopted at Mettray is most important, viz., that the period of detention in the cell should never be fixed beforehand, but should be regulated according to the effect apparent during its continuance.

For these reasons, though I would not have corporal punishment absolutely excluded from the Reformatory, because, in the infinite variety of cases and characters, it may occasionally be useful and even necessary, yet I do strongly believe that it should be used rarely and with the utmost caution. At Mettray it was at first altogether excluded. Of late years it has been introduced there in the shape of a good cut on the hand with a ferule for slight offences. These were formerly punished by bread and water diet; but with the very hard work required there, that diet was found to operate injuriously on the health, and interfere, as the cell also necessarily does, with labour. It is administered with great caution, not in the presence of the boys in general, but only of other culprits, and of the director or his lieutenant. I am inclined to think that such minor offences are better dealt with negatively, by loss of reward, than by positive infliction of punishment; but that consideration belongs to my other proposed subject—that of rewards.

I have already detained you too long on the subject of punishments; but I must just add, in conclusion, the wise counsel of Montesquieu, which is no less valuable to the schoolmaster or manager in dealing with boys, than to the statesman with men:—

“We must not lead men by extreme measures; we must use with economy (etre menager de) the means which nature gives us to guide them withal. If we inquire into the cause of all disorders we shall see that they are owing, not to the mildness of punishments, but to the fact that faults escape punishment altogether.”

In the school let no fault be unpunished, but never use one morsel more of punishment than is absolutely necessary for its correction. To do so is, independently of any consideration of justice or benevolence, bad economy—a waste of motive power.

Considering punishment as deterrent, it is rather certainty than severity that we want.

Considering it as a Reformatory agent, we need, not that which will produce a sudden and violent impression, but that which shall operate surely, continuously, and so permanently—not the rush of the torrent, but the drop that wears the stone.

At the conclusion of the paper Mr. WHEATLEY, in reply to a question, said he believed that a proper system of rewards might almost supersede punishments. At present, however, the rewards given were too few. There should be rewards for the attainment of particular standards, and those standards should be open to all. He was in favour, too, of the principle of collective rewards, so that a boy should not only benefit by his own good conduct, but by that of others. This would give to each an interest in all.

LORD STANLEY observed, that the suggestion that the period of confinement in a cell should be indefinite was an important one; and he considered it would be quite as reasonable for a medical man to persevere in one course of medicine irrespective of its effect upon his patient, as for them to fix the time for the seclusion of the young offender in a Reformatory, regardless of its effect upon him. He believed rewards to be absolutely necessary in a Reformatory, but was in favour of competitive rewards rather than rewards for good conduct, on the family system, as adopted at Mettray.

LORD ROBERT CECIL was in favour of corporal punishment, not that he believed it tended to reform the individual so much as to deter others; and this was one of the main objects of punishment. He also spoke in favour of the system of rewards as adopted at Mettray.

Dr. WALLIS thought they should treat criminals as they treated lunatics.

Mr. SYDNEY TURNER objected to rewards, but would make the children's luxuries dependant on their own earnings.

Mr. JELINGER SYMONS considered that the cell punishment ought to be administered within the Reformatories.

Mr. ADDERLEY, M. P., cautioned the advocates of the system not to reduce the moral philosophy of the subject to a mechanical art, by holding out that, by a certain course of treatment, a bad boy could be reformed into a good boy. He feared too that they might discourage persons if they let it go abroad that the system of the schools was attended with so much intricate and refined philosophy.

The CHAIRMAN, Mr. Recorder Hill, congratulated the section on the paper and discussion they had heard; and with reference to the great question of whether punishment should be inflicted within the Reformatory, or be delegated to the gaol, it was one which must soon engage the attention of the Legislature, and which might therefore be well considered out of doors. He had had much consultation with M. De Metz on the subject, and he considered that the punishment should be within the institution, as he was then enabled, by frequent visits, to ascertain the precise moment when the boy might be released from the cell and let go free amongst the others. The chairman also offered some remarks on Mettray, defending it against some remarks in the paper, and contending that it was the great model of Reformatory Schools.

The thanks of the section were then voted to Mr. Wheatley by acclamation.

Having thus gone over the questions of punishments and rewards as ends towards reformation, the very important question arises—What are we to do with our tame elephants? and here the Rev. Sydney Turner offers the results of great, and long continued, and wide spread experience.

He tells us of four openings for the employment of the inmates of the Reformatories, upon their discharge; and as his observations and suggestions are, just now, of vast importance both to England and Ireland, we insert this portion of his paper at length:—

First, they may be apprenticed and placed in service in some part of England remote from their own locality. This I have been oc-asionally successful in doing, but it is only rarely that the opportunities occur. We have at present no machinery by which we can find or enlist masters in distant towns or country districts. To advertise is generally to invite those who want the premium, rather than desire to assist or protect the boy; country masters also in our ordinary trades ask extravagant premiums; and I have found it very difficult to enforce the agreement or indenture when any difference arise between the master and the boy.

In very few instances have I been able to keep the boy with his employer for any long period; in most cases he has left after a year or two, and returned to his original neighbourhood and his relations, risking and often incurring deterioration and relapse.

Some of the difficulties would be removed, or at least lessened, by the active operation of local Reformatory Committees acting on a settled plan to interchange the boys who are to be placed out. The Red Hill boy being apprenticed or engaged in Somersetshire or Devon; the Kingswood or Bamford-Speke lad in Surrey or Sussex. How far this could be done will depend on the good or evil report which our lads and the school they are in, obtain. I am not sanguine of its success—

1st, because I find that in France, with the advantage of a far more full and methodized system of patronage than we have here, Demetz is dissatisfied, and recommends that the Colonist should be kept and trained till able to go out as the adult workman, engaging on independent terms for the hire of his labour.

2ndly, because I believe that, when carried to any considerable extent, jealousy would be excited, and the Reformatory be accused of giving the criminal better employers than the pauper, or, as would be often the case, of intercepting employment and situations from the boys and girls of the vicinity who would have the first claim to them.

It will be observed that I have spoken chiefly of trade apprenticeship or domestic service. As regards farm work in England, I see no reason why we should not be able to find work with farmers for country lads discharged from country schools, if the committees managing the schools use reasonable exertion. But I fear that the London, or Manchester, or Birmingham boy will not be very easily transformed with any chance of permanence into an agriculturist in this country. Were our farm labourers' condition better it might be otherwise, but the town lad knows pretty well that the tailor or the shoemaker, &c., get their 18s. or 20s. per week, and the farm labourer his 10s. or 12s.; that one is at the top and the other at the bottom of the tree; and though he may for awhile be induced or forced to take up farm labour as training or discipline, he will not give himself to it as a means of livelihood.

It has been suggested that Home Colonies might be formed in Ireland and even in England, with the object of reclaiming and improving the waste and common lands, and on the principle of the labourers attaining a share in the land, and that boys from Reformatory Schools would be induced to work on these with such a prospect before them. I give the suggestion as it was given to me, certainly thinking that the general idea of getting the boys apprentioned and employed as farm labourers in some of the more remote and newly-purchased estates in Ireland, is one worth inquiry and thought.*

It is very evident that the main difficulty in the way of all schemes for the employment of our lads in England is the absence of sufficient guardianship, or as the French term it, "patronage." I fear that our fellow-countrymen have all too much to do in most cases to give any hope of this void being filled up. Our clergy and the supporters of our religious societies and institutions might do much, but unfortunately they are as yet but partially interested in the subject, and hitherto have shown more sympathy for a Polish Jew, or a Caffre with a six-syllable name, than for a poor plain "Tom all alone," the London outcast. A healthier feeling, however, is already being stirred up on this point. The Home Mission is beginning to assert its proper weight and greatness, and many opportunities may in time be found by the active friends of the cause for enlisting the aid and sympathy of our religious teachers, as well as of our magistrates and unemployed ladies and gentlemen, in the good work of watering and watching over the seed that the Reformatory School has planted.

A second means of provision in England would be by enlistment in the army. This is the great French Reformatory outlet; one-third of the colons placés of Metzray are enlisted. I hope I may not offend the feelings of any of our friends when I say I could heartily wish that this way were practically open to us; aye, and that a considerable number of our protégés were entered on it.

Of course no Christian minister can abstractedly admire war as a profession. But the discipline of the regiment provides so exactly for the weakness, the need of external regulation, the want of self-control, and moral self-action which characterises the young offender, and it seems so right that those who have injured their country by their criminal example and pursuits, should make sacrifices and endure toil and hardness in return, in the defence and protection of its interests, that I should be glad if I could place many of our Reformatory scholars in the army. I believe that, in effect, the older inmates of our refuges do frequently enlist. I find that about a dozen of the lads at Saltley have. I believe Mr. Wright's school at Buxton was nearly emptied by the impulse which the war gave to the military spirit of the inmates. I have myself several young friends and former pupils serving their Queen as soldiers, and their conduct and well-doing make me proud of them.

But the difficulties in the way of training the ordinary Reformatory pupil for the army are great. We know, indeed, that practically the recruiting sergeant is not very particular as to the antecedents of his recruits; but these recruits must be of age to act for themselves, and their previous position unknown, or at least not a matter of notoriety, as it would be if they were taken directly from a Reformatory School. And here lies the hindrance. You want to place the boy out at fifteen; he cannot enlist in the ordinary way before he is 17. and must be of a certain height. The army is, therefore, practically closed to the English Reformatory.

---

* See post.

I cannot help thinking that a Military Reform School might be set apart; that in such a school as Redhill a military class might be formed; and that without any sort of discredit or stain to the service a number of young recruits might be taken to be in the first instance employed for service in India or the Colonies—such lads having the privilege of transfer to the regular army after a certain period of probation and good conduct in this initiative division. As it is, however, the army is an exceptional resource, open only under particular circumstances of age, and physical development and individual inclination.

The same remark applies equally to the navy. Hundreds of the boys that feed our Reformatories would both be fitted for the sea and be most anxious to embrace it as their calling, and would be the better for the control and discipline of a well-regulated man of war. But here, again, the theoretical objection steps in and bars the way. I had some especially likely subjects for the navy examined and approved at the Rendezvous last year; but they were refused at the Admiralty, on the ground that if such boys were admitted, honest and respectable boys would be less likely to volunteer. I have no faith at all in the soundness of the objection. I do not believe that the average of language, manners, or conduct would be at all lower. I believe they would be higher, for the Reformatory School would give a higher tone and better preparation. No one need know where the boys came from; and while the numbers so entered would be sufficient to be a valuable assistance to the manning of our navy, it would not be large enough to excite any remark, or arouse any hostile or jealous feeling in other classes of the community. I believe the difficulty to be of the red tape order, especially as I know that a considerable number of boys of the vagrant and criminal class are taken yearly from the House of Occupation, as the reports of that establishment show. But at present the obstacle exists; and thus again an important outlet, valuable for the opening it would give to the natural excitability and love of adventure which distinguishes boys of that class, and for the discipline and regulation it would place them under while still young, is closed to us.

With reference to the merchant service, the recent alterations in the mercantile marine make it very difficult to get boys an engagement in it. Formerly, the law required a certain number of apprentices to be taken in every merchant vessel. This is now no longer compulsory; and lads who have not been to sea, and have had no training, find it much more difficult to get themselves engaged.

Naval Reformatories, such as the one lately established at Liverpool, will be the most effectual to give the means and opportunity which are so much wanted for placing Reformatory schoolboys at sea.

But they must not be confined to any one locality; at least there must be several of them. I hope we may ere long see another supported in common by our various Reformatory Schools in the English or the Bristol Channel. There will be plenty of candidates. I could myself send 15 or 20 from Redhill alone.

There remains the fourth, and to us at Redhill the most important of all means of disposal—emigration to the Colonies or the United States.

To me this seems in every way the best of all outlets, if proper means of training be adopted and proper care and discrimination exercised in the choice of those who are allowed the vast advantage it gives.

This effectually separates our young offenders from all former associations, introducing them to new scenes of action, where they can start afresh on the work of life, without any prejudice against them, or any bar or hindrance to their progress; if they be but honest and industrious, they must get on.

To the emigrant and the colony the past is comparatively nothing, the present character and habits, and the future efforts and conduct are everything. Emigration keeps the youth or girl in the labour market, securing society a return from their work, and repaying the country they have left and benefiting the new land that receives them. Every fairly successful emigrant not only makes more room for others at home, and raises the value of their labour, but becomes a customer to them, supporting some one at home by the fresh demand he makes for manufactures, implements, and luxuries abroad. This, too, calls forth all that is vigorous, active, and earnest, in the character of the boys or girls themselves. To turn their back for life, as usually must be the case, on all that they have formerly been used to and connected with—to go out four, five, or ten thousand miles, with the aim and purpose of independent, honest, self support is the act of the firm, earnest and right minded. I have seen in scores of cases the marked change that comes over the boy when once he makes up his mind to “go abroad.” He becomes daily more manly, and vigorous, and self-governing; the cowardly and the idle shrink from it.

Of the success which as a general rule attends the emigration of the boys, I can speak confidently. We have sent out from Red Hill above 400 lads, and have heard of or from above four-fifths of them; out of these many have fallen away and disgraced themselves and us; but the large majority have done us credit, and become useful both to the colonies and themselves.*

But the difficulties and anxieties that accompany this work of emigration from a Reformatory School can hardly be exaggerated; they are indeed very great. They have been greater than they need have been at Red Hill, and the amount of successful disposal in the colonies less than would have been otherwise, through one or two peculiar circumstances, which I mention not in the way of complaint but of explanation.

You are aware that our work began seven years ago at a period when Reformatory Schools were still at a discount, and Reformatory agency a matter of contempt to many and distrust to all.

No law existed then by which a boy could be detained in the school. If he came, he came in one of two predicaments; he had either served the full term of his punishment and came to us altogether as a volunteer, or he came under a conditional pardon, having a portion of his penalty of imprisonment remitted on the condition of his placing himself under our care, and remaining till we thought it right to discharge him. In the former case the boy was free to leave when he thought fit; and to keep him in the school became the more difficult in proportion as you succeeded in kindling in him the desire to emigrate and reform in earnest. We had therefore to help him out in many cases before we felt quite certain of his steadfastness or industrial ability, or to let him discharge himself upon the world at home, with every chance of his relapsing into crime. In the other case, the boys whom we had from the Government for the first two or three years of our connection with them were usually lads of 15 or 16 years of age, who had been many years in the criminal profession, who had passed through the minor stages of short imprisonment, and had received their sentences to 9, 12, or 18 months' imprisonment, as graduating higher and higher in the criminal class. In these we had to deal with lads who wanted the longest Reformatory training, and who were at the same time the least willing and least likely to submit to it, and who in fact came to us very much upon the understanding that 12 months' good conduct would earn their fresh start into life. I was obliged therefore in scores of cases to trust to hope rather than experience, and to send them out, not because by long training and effectual proof I had full reason to depend on them, but because they were of such an age, and had so far fulfilled the conditions of their admission, that I could not well detain them.

---

* Up to December 31, 1835, out of 372 sent out, 25 had relapsed into vagrancy or crime.

That many of the lads so sent out disappointed me I cannot be surprised; I think it is a great evidence of the intrinsic goodness of motive and feeling that can be stirred in lads of this class, and of the effects of the industrial and religious discipline they were subjected to at Redhill, that so large a portion have done well. But I have no hesitation in saying, both as regards the colony and the boy, he ought not to be sent out under nearly three years' training. You want to uproot and supplant bad habits, putting good ones in their place. You want to ingraft a steady control of temper and appetite. You want to make the lad really industrious and efficient. You cannot do so except under a sufficiently long period of probationary instruction.

But supposing that you have arranged these preliminaries to your satisfaction, there are difficulties still behind. You depend necessarily on certain friends whom you invite and enlist to help you. Your correspondents are willing perhaps to receive and help the lad, but they expect him to prove steady and useful, and above all to stay in his place at the wages they offer, wages necessarily rather lower than the average of the wages in the colony. The boy soon finds out that he is hired at a lower rate. He has eight or ten offers of better places from chance employers whom he meets with who would take no interest in his welfare, and who have no relation with you, but happen to want a hand for a few weeks or months, and willingly engage him, to cast him off when done with. You have no power to apprentice him, He has strong instincts of restlessness and change from his previous life. He leaves his place. Your friend, after a few trials of the sort, becomes disgusted; he has much trouble, and very little return, and you may expect that after aiding a few, he will say he finds his engagements too pressing and the boys too changeable to allow of his befriending any more. It may be worse, and often will be worse, than this. Of the boys you send out some turn out very badly. A serious case of misconduct occurs. One of your lads commits some serious misdemeanor, the influence of his bad conduct is felt at once. One bad fellow stops the passage more effectually than ten good ones can open it. The anti-convict prejudice is at once stirred: there are plenty of people in the colony who make the worst of the case. Your connection with a whole colony is, for a time at least, wholly arrested; worse too, the delinquent boy remains there to be a snare and injury to those who are sent out afterwards. He has a wonderful aptitude in finding out the boys from the same school, and seducing them into idleness and crime. Repeatedly, also, you find that the boys have been placed in situations the very reverse of those you wish for—retained in towns, made clerks, shopboys, and house servants, when you want them to be only out-door laborers employed in farms or in stock keeping; exposed that is to the very temptations and dangers which you have sent them abroad to avoid.

Many of these difficulties will, I should hope, disappear, or be greatly lessened, as the Reformatory system is more established, its objects more understood and recognized, and the experience of its agents and promoters more enlarged.

I have laid down for myself stricter rules and conditions at Redhill; and if enabled, as gradually I expect to be, to detain the boys much longer and so train them thoroughly, and to receive them on the average younger and less hardened, I look forward very confidently to so improving the article to be sent out, that it will be readily received and welcomed; and I think that every Reformatory School should make it a fixed law, in reference to emigration, that it is the reward and provision for the deserving, not a means of getting rid of the troublesome.

Further, I think that in every Reformatory proposing to give its inmates the advantage of emigration, the habits, training, &c., in the school should be carefully adapted to the sort of life, prospects, and employment, that the colonies present. Amidst the many disappointments I have had from boys' fickleness or dishonesty, I have hardly ever had a complaint on the score of idleness; on the contrary, I have had scores of acknowledgments that the Farm School lads understand labour, both what to do and how to do it, and are ready and willing to work. Their usefulness indeed has often counteracted the hindrances and prejudices arising from their changefulness or misconduct, the neighbours of their employers being often induced, from what they see of their industrial ability, to take others from the school. Their very fault of changefulness has indeed its root partly in the desire they have to get on and better themselves, and their sense of their own efficiency; they want to prosper and become independent, only they forget that if a man wants a good harvest, he must use not only exertion to sow, but patience to let it grow and ripen.

All schools proposing to send their boys abroad must give a prominence to industrial occupation. The working hours should be, for at least the last year of the lad's stay, eight or nine hours a day. They must carefully encourage and stimulate the ability and the will to work, by connecting the boy's labour with his self interest, his pleasure, his ambition, leading him to like it, value it, and be proud of it. They must make their dietary such as will promote muscular efficiency and endurance, not giving soup and gruel to swell and satisfy, but a fair proportion of meat, say twice a week, and especially bread to strengthen and develop growth. The rule should be, if a man will not work, neither shall he eat, on the one hand, and if he will work he shall have the fruit of his labour on the other.

They must give the boys as much general knowledge, both in school and in work as possible. I would have every boy know how to mend if not make his own clothes, and patch his own shoes. But the main thing is farm and garden work, including the use of the axe and mattock; the handling and feeding of horses and stock, and the milking of cows. If you have a brickfield, or the opportunities for grubbing and draining, so much the better. The out-door labourer is the man for the colony. The tailor and the shoemaker had better stop at home.

With reference to moral character and conduct, no boy should be allowed to go out unless he has maintained a thoroughly good, steady, and trustworthy character for many months previous to his going, and to ensure a reasonable dependence on him, the discipline and system of the school should be such as to try and prove him—such liberty being allowed, such an amount of self-government required of him as may secure you against mere prison submission on the one hand, and hypocrisy on the other. It is on this point that so many of our prison philosophers have erred, fixing their thoughts chiefly on the mere temporary interval of the man's punishment, they forget or overlook the most important question, what he is to do when that punishment is over. On the one hand they sequester him and pamper him into an artificial state of body and mind, unfitting him for the rough work and conflict of life; and on the other, they so watch and compress and subjugate him, that he loses all his habit and capacity for self-action and self-control, and becomes helpless and dependent.

We must beware of these mistakes in the Reformatory if we desire to see our lads successful emigrants. Everything that is active, open, and manly, must be encouraged; all that is timid and servile, proscribed. Better that the lad be a little rough, if he is but resolute, and able, than that he should be a model of order and civility, and, like the pet prisoner, supple and cunning, indolent and useless, a humbug or a drone. Better on every account that you encounter, as best you may, relapse and discouragement at home, than, by sending out the uncertain and half improved lads, incur hindrance and opposition abroad, and prejudice the prospects of the trustworthy and the good, who would else be welcomed.

With reference to the reception and guardianship of the young emigrants in the colonies, we ought to have a regular Reformatory

Union agent at each of the chief colonies, through whom the boys sent out could be engaged, and by whom they should be superintended and reported on. It would be an important security for the boys' well doing and well being, if committees of protection could be formed at the chief colonial ports, not to act, so to speak, in a collective capacity as an united body, but on the system of each member interesting himself in the care and disposal of the boys that arrived, in turn. Each man would have his circle of connections and friends, among whom he could place a few lads from time to time. The boys would thus be scattered and distributed; and that gathering of them in one neighbourhood avoided, which is always objectionable as tending to make them marked, and give them a class aspect and position, and which in case of the fault or miscarriage of any becomes so dangerous and harmful, by the certainty of infection which it entails. This I think the managers and supporters of Reformatory Schools should aim at; it can be done through the links and connections which most of us have with one or other branch of our colonial empire; only let there be due care to avoid anything like trade or traffic in the young emigrant—let there be no bargaining for his or her services and labour without fair wages, in return for a free passage. If the boy or girl are to really do well in the colony, they must land there as free, with no shadow of slavery or judicial servitude upon them.

It is a question which seems open to discussion, whether any form of agreement, or indenture, can be devised that will be binding in the colony if entered into here; or whether, if such a thing were legalized and could be practically enforced, it would be worth the while of any colonial employer to use the power so given. Those whom I have consulted have generally inclined to the opinion that, in a country where it is so easy to leave the master and so hard to follow and trace the apprentice, and where the servant has so many opportunities of making his compulsory service so useless or mischievous to the employer, it is better to depend on voluntary service, and on the ordinary relations between labour and wages, than to have any forced apprenticeship. Yet one would think that a two years' engagement under indenture might be managed, and would be at once valuable for settling and steadying the boy, and useful and available as securing to the master his fair amount of service.

It remains to speak of the expenses of this form of disposal, and of how they can be met. I do not believe that cheap emigration answers. If the boy be sent out in an ill-found ship, with chances of fever and disease about him, and with insufficient outfit and assistance at starting, it usually comes back upon you either in expense or hinderance, and gives you cause for regret, at least if your operations are continuous and considerable; yet how, then, provide for the heavy costs of passage, clothing, and landing—costs which, taking one colony with another, can scarcely be brought under an average of from £18 to £20 per head? It seems to me that this is the most appropriate field for individual benevolence to occupy in the Reformatory enterprise. The prevention and diminution of crime is so directly a matter of public policy that we seem to have a right to demand what is necessary for the maintenance and proper training of the young offender from public resources; that by Government contribution and local rating, severally or jointly, the Reformatory should be supported and maintained in due efficiency. But the assisting the offender to another country on his discharge from the Reformatory, though clearly the best thing that can be done for him, is not a necessary or natural item in his Reformatory treatment, and can hardly be paid from such sources. It is more rightly, I think, a matter of charity and private aid; and I would have our donations and subscriptions specially reserved and applied to make, what we may call a patronage or disposal fund, from which the charges either of apprenticeship or emigration may be defrayed. I have little doubt but that if the training in the school be really good, and proper discrimination be exercised in the choice of subjects, so that the REALLY IMPROVED and WELL MEANING boy, and he alone, be sent out, we shall find this disposal fund assisted by contributions from the Colonies themselves, and so the burden on the resources of our schools essentially lightened.

Mr. B. BAKER, referring to the observations of Mr. Turner on the lowness of the wages of agricultural labourers, compared with those of tailors and carpenters, and that class of workmen, pointed out that the expenses of the former in regard to house rent, &c., was much smaller. Of 35 boys he had put out of his establishment, "only five had been recommitted, but not more than one-half were doing exactly as he could desire.

Mr. MILES, M.P., agreed that the subjects for Reformatories, or those who had been in them, should be removed as far as possible from their old haunts, and for this purpose he would have committees in various places to communicate with each other, so that, for instance, a person in Sussex could be sent to Somerset, and vice versa. He spoke highly of the Ship Reformatory established at Liverpool, and said he had no doubt that if the Government would place at the disposal of managers of Reformatories, vessels, on board of which boys might be taught the duties of seamen, no difficulty would be experienced in obtaining for those boys engagements in the merchant service.

Mr. HASTINGS wished to draw attention to the answers sent by certified Reformatories to the Patronage Committee of the Union. By these returns it clearly appeared that no difficulty existed at present in getting rid of well-trained boys. The older the school was, the less difficulty there seemed to be—the managers of the Glasgow House of Refuge, which had been in existence for 22 years, having stated that they easily obtained situations for the large number who left there every year. There were difficulties enough for the Reformatory movement to overcome, and it was not wise to raise up imaginary ones.

After some observations from Mr. SYDNEY TURNER, in reply to Mr. Hastings—

Lord STANLEY said that the difference was one more in words than in substance. Mr. Hastings thought there was no present difficulty, and in this he was borne out by facts; what might come hereafter no one could at present foresee. He thought it would not be well to make it a recognised feature in the army or navy, that they annually received a certain number of these boys, as it would be throwing difficulties in the way of enlistment among other classes of the community. Also, with regard to emigration, if they were to establish a regular organization on a large scale of sending out to a particular colony large numbers of these boys, they would very soon find in that colony a feeling of suspicion and hostility if the boys turned out badly. He would have them so distributed and dispersed as to become lost in the community; and the Union should endeavour to establish an agent in each of the principal colonies, to gather round him a committee of Colonists interested in these matters, and each should render himself chargeable with the guardianship of one or more of the boys.

Miss Carpenter, to whom the Reformatory Movement owes so very much, in addition to her interesting report on the Reformatory Institutions in and near Bristol, read a most valuable paper, reviewing the relation of Reformatories to the State, combined with some admirable observations on Female Reformatories. It will be perceived that Miss Carpenter is fully in favor of the separate cell, as a mode of punishment, both during the previous imprisonment, and during the period of committal to the Reformatory, whenever punishment may be necessary; it is also evident that she considers the power of committal to previous imprisonment should be optional and should be "absolutely limited to fourteen days."

She is writing of the Juvenile Offenders' Act, and continues:—

Many difficulties in details of execution will of course occur in the working of this Act, which will be remedied as experience suggests improvements in its machinery. But there are two points on which additional legislation is imperatively called for:—

First, instead of merely giving permission to magistrates and judges to send children to a Reformatory, "it may be lawful," not enforcing their doing so, the law should absolutely direct that all children on a second conviction should be sent, and all on a first, unless security be given for their future good behaviour. It has been sufficiently demonstrated to the Government and to the public how inefficacious and injurious as well as costly is the old system of short imprisonments. There is little danger of our Reformatories being over filled, for those in existence are not yet half filled, and new ones are in process of establishment. The effect of the system in diminishing the crime of the country has not a fair trial until the schools are absolutely brought to bear on so large a mass of juvenile vice as the statistics laid before this meeting, prove to exist in one city only.

Secondly, the law for adults should be entirely abrogated in the case of children; and if it is deemed necessary that they should have some imprisonment, the length of it should be absolutely limited to fourteen days, and its duration should be shortened as much as the discretion of the judge or magistrate may suggest in the particular case.

The question of imprisonment will be discussed elsewhere, and neither that nor the theoretic principle of punishment will be here considered; but it may be right to state that the experience of the last four years has led me to the conclusion, that while a long imprisonment has a very injurious effect upon girls and boys, both physically and morally, yet a short period of seclusion in a separate cell under the good influences now happily administered to such prisoners, prepares those wild and lawless children to comprehend the necessity of yielding to discipline, and to receive in a more grateful and submissive spirit the advantages and the control of the school. Such preparatory seclusion could not with advantage be maintained in a school, which the child should enter with the opportunity of beginning with a new character.

It has been feared by many that these schools would hold out a premium to vice. The fallacy of such a supposition, under the existing state of the law more particularly, has been so frequently demonstrated, that no arguments on the subject will be here repeated. The following facts may, however, be valuable. A few weeks ago, a poor little girl, nine years of age, was received into the Red Lodge at the request of Mr. Thomas Wright, the well known visitor of prisons, on her discharge from three months' imprisonment for picking pockets, the mother being a notoriously bad character, and the eldest sister also having been in prison. The child came by herself from Manchester. On Saturday last the mother came with three other children from Liverpool and took her away, though expressing the warmest appreciation of the character of the school and the kindness shown her child. Since the establishment of the Lodge, in October, 1854, more than thirty applications for admission have been made without the child being received. About ten of these were inadmissible on account of age. In the cases of five, when all arrangements were made, the parents refused to let the child go; and in that of two others, the girls themselves refused. The remainder of the parents evidently applied for the admission of their children to relieve themselves from the trouble of controlling them, and withdrew when they found that payment in advance would be required. About six of the girls for whom application was made, appeared from the representations of the parents to be so thoroughly thievish that there was no prospect of their being otherwise than confirmed criminals if left at large. In the inability of the parents to pay, the law was explained to them; and they were advised to have the girl taken up and charged before the magistrate with the offence, the next time she committed one, in order that she may be sent under sentence to Red Lodge after fourteen days' imprisonment. In no one case has this been done! The law does not then allure to crime, and confer a premium on vice.

The Reformatories have hitherto been spoken of only in connection with the legal disposal of the children who have fallen into the hands of the law. The Government when directing them to be placed in these schools, allows a sum to the managers to defray the expense of their food and clothing, but no more. Provision for education and industrial training is left entirely to private effort, and is not made from the Treasury. The Committee of Council on Education has long watched over and aided the efforts made for the education of the labouring classes in this country, and has distributed the public money intrusted to it for that purpose, according to various regulations, most judiciously framed to meet the wants of ordinary schools for this part of the community. But these regulations were by their very nature quite inapplicable to Reformatory and Ragged Schools, which evidently needed more than any others both the pecuniary aid, and the benefit of visits from experienced inspectors. This their Lordships have perceived, and have recently framed a series of minutes expressly adapted to the wants of these schools, and calculated to give efficient assistance, both as regards rent, salaries, industrial apparatus, and the training of masters, for their very peculiar work. These schools are now therefore placed on a footing both in a legal and educational point of view, in which it only requires devoted and persevering effort on the part of managers to make them really good.

The Reformatories being all under voluntary management, there will of course be considerable diversity in the manner in which they are conducted. It is well that this should be the case, for the subject is yet in its infancy in our country; and a servile copy of institutions, which under different circumstances have succeeded well in distant countries, would be most unwise. It is desirable, with a view to the future success of these institutions and the eventual adoption of the best plans, that experiments should be tried by those who, having confidence in them, will give them a fair trial. All managers will, however, agree in believing that the instilling of moral and religious principles is of fundamental importance; that the Scriptures should be made the basis of religious instruction; and that no religious teaching will be availing unless religion is made a living principle in the hearts both of teacher and children. All will consider industrial training of great importance in these schools, especially such kinds of it as will best develop and train the faculties of the children, and fit them for future life. All will endeavour to give in the school the sound elements of common knowledge; and will make such arrangements for food, clothing, and sanitary operations, as, while offering no undue attraction or indulgence to the child, are most conducive to health and moral training.

A school for boys is necessarily different in many respects from one for girls. They are to be fitted for independent, active life; and when the tone of the institution is once established, "le clef des champs," as De Metz calls it, should be the only one employed. But girls are to be fitted for the home; and while the same preparation for an independent life is not required for them, a far greater degree of neatness, order, and propriety of demeanor is desirable.

The requirements of convicted children of the female sex have been hitherto overlooked; nor would it appear to be generally understood how many of these exist, and how dangerous is their position both with regard to themselves and the community; for we learn from the accompanying Table of Returns, of all the convicted girls who have been sent to Reformatories since the passing of the Act, that the whole number does not exceed those who have been sent to one Boys' School alone; and that throughout the whole of England and Wales only two large towns, Liverpool and Birmingham, and only two counties, Devonshire and Gloucestershire, have availed themselves to any considerable extent of the opportunities presented to them of rescuing young girls from a life of crime.

The fact that girls of the criminal class are far more degraded, dangerous to society, and difficult to control, than boys, is well known to those whose experience has enabled them to compare the two sexes. The proofs and causes of this state of things cannot be here entered on; the fact is in part referable to the greater natural delicacy and susceptibility of the nature of girls, which renders them open to a deeper impress both of good and evil. They have also been more directly exposed to the evil influences of bad homes, and the affections, which are very strong in these girls are therefore in close sympathy with vice. Their desire for excitement of every kind is strong, as also for the gratification of the senses. They are generally devoid of any good principles of conduct, particularly addicted to deceit, both in words and actions, of fine but misdirected powers, of violent passions, extremely sensitive to imagined injury, and equally sensitive to kindness.

In the work of endeavouring to restore the young girl to the natural condition of childhood, and to prepare her for future life, the experience of the writer during the last four years with this class, leads her to consider the following as important principles of management:—

1st. The physical condition of these girls will generally be found very unsatisfactory; and it is well known that the moral state is much influenced by the physical. All sanitary regulations for ventilation, regular and sufficient personal ablutions, suitable temperature, &c., should be strictly attended to. The advantage of agricultural labour not being procurable, regular walks beyond the premises, as well as outdoor play, should be regularly taken by the girls, and as much bodily exercise as possible should be devised for them in their daily industrial work as an exercise of their physical energies. The food should be sufficient, and of a more nourishing description than is allowed in most pauper schools. On this point considerable stress has been laid by medical men of high scientific experience. These children have been accustomed to a stimulating life, to feasting and fasting, and to various exciting stimulents. Unless the system is properly sustained under the change, it will sink.

2nd. The young girl is to be placed, as far as possible, in the same kind of position as children in a well ordered family in the working classes. She has been accustomed to be independent of authority, and to do only what is right in her own eyes. She must now feel under steady, regular restraint, administered with a firm, equal, but loving hand. Her irregular impulses must be curbed. She must insensibly but steadily be made to feel that it is necessary for her to submit to the will of others, and especially to be obedient to her.

The regular training of the schoolroom will greatly contribute to this, and all those nameless arrangements and manœuvres to preserve order and discipline, which are found so valuable in good British and National Schools.

3rd. Children of this class have hitherto felt themselves in a state of antagonism with society, and totally unconnected with the virtuous portion of it. The matrons, chaplains, and even governors of the gaols they came from, have usually been the only persons whom these children had been even able to call their friends, and are often most gratefully remembered by them. They must, as far as possible, be brought to feel themselves a part of society, regarded by it with no unkind feeling, but rather, having been outcasts, welcomed into it with Christian love, and entering into it as far as their own conduct renders this possible. Nothing in their dress or appearance should mark them out as a separate caste; as far as it is found safe and expedient, they should be enabled to associate with others; and, under judicious restrictions, persons of virtuous character and loving spirit should be encouraged to visit the school, and have intercourse with them.

4th. The affections must be cultivated as much as possible in a healthy direction. The love of their families must not be repressed, and the natural ties must be cherished as far as can be done without evil influence being exerted over them. The school must be made a home, and a happy one; but the children must be led to feel that the possibility of this depends on their own forbearance and kindness towards each other. Mutual dependence must be cultivated, as in actual society, they must be made to feel that all must often suffer through the misconduct of one, while the good conduct of every individual is a benefit to the whole number, to the school in general. They will then learn to feel it a duty and a pleasure to help each other in difficulty, and to be watchful over each other's conduct from no censorious feeling, but from a simple regard to each other's benefit, and to do what is right.

5th. The activity and love of amusement natural to childhood should be cultivated in an innocent and healthy manner. These cannot be repressed without great moral injury; but they may be turned to good account, and made the medium of conveying most valuable lessons on the rights of others and the nature of property, or even of imparting useful knowledge. The children should be allowed to possess little toys and articles treasured by childhood, which they may be permitted to purchase with earnings awarded them for work done. The valuable exhibitions now open to ordinary schools may be allowed to them occasionally, especially as a reward for good conduct. The Dioramas and Zoological Gardens may open their minds, and give a stimulus to the advancement of knowledge more than any other lessons.

6th. All rewards and punishments should be, as much as possible, the natural consequences of actions. Deceit or dishonesty will occasion an amount of distrust and watchfulness which a judicious teacher may render a very severe punishment to a child. The employment of bad language, and the indulgence of a quarrelsome disposition, will require separation from the society of others as a necessary consequence. All punishments should be administered with the greatest caution and impartiality, and should be evidently prompted by a desire to do good to the offender; the sympathy of the school, and even of the culprit, will thus be enlisted with the teacher. There should be no bribery to do right, nor deterring by fear only from doing wrong; a desire of improvement and love of duty should be cherished for themselves. Hence, artificial stimulants to good conduct, especially such as excite a desire to excel others should be especially avoided in these schools; they foster many bad passions. The children should rather be stimulated to surpass themselves; this will be greatly aided by a regular and impartial record of conduct, which should be frequently reviewed.

7th. As much freedom should be given as is compatible with the good order of the establishment. Those who prove themselves deserving of confidence may have situations of trust given them, and may be sent on errands beyond the premises. It is only in proportion as there is liberty, that security can be felt in the child's real improvement.

8th. The intellectual powers should be steadily trained, though not superficially excited. It is only by giving the mind wholesome nourishment, that it can be prevented from preying on garbage. Many are chary of intellectual instruction in these schools, as if they were doing a wrong to the working classes by imparting knowledge to them. We are conferring a boon on them, by reforming in the best way we can, those who, if neglected, may do them an irreparable moral injury.

9th. After the preceding remarks, it is hardly necessary to say that every effort must be made to infuse a good moral tone into the school. It will certainly exist if the preceding principles are well carried out. When a new comer or a badly disposed child finds the feeling of the school in harmony with obedience, order, and duty, and that public opinion, which is strongest when it proceeds from equals, is in opposition to everything wrong, the work of the teacher will be incalculably lightened.

The will of each individual child must be enlisted in her own reformation, and she must be made to feel that without this, the efforts of her teachers will be useless. Such confidence must be awakened in the minds of the children towards their teachers as to lead them willingly to submit to all the regulations for order, neatness, and regularity, which are an important part of their training, and to yield themselves implicitly to their guidance. From this the child must be taught to feel obedience to the Divine Will to be the highest happiness, and to desire to obey that Will.

Did time permit illustration of these principles, they might be made clearer; they are the result of close observation, and have been proved to be true.

May many labourers be raised up who will endeavour to rescue these lost ones—to save a soul from death, and thus cover a multitude of sins.

We have now placed before our readers the chief portion of the practical papers read in the Sections of the Bristol Meeting; but there are in the number of The Law Amendment Journal, in which these papers appear, other papers of equal importance. Mr. Frederic Hill's paper on Mettray is valuable, as any paper from his pen must be, but this paper is doubly valuable from the strenuous support it gives to the employment of women in Reformatories and Prisons. This is not a new theory of Mr. Hill's; he urged it upon the country, and upon the legislature, many years ago in his official reports.*

Mr. Alfred Hill's paper is a most able, elaborate, and useful contribution, bringing briefly and clearly, and into the shortest space, the history and philosophy of the Industrial School Question. The papers on Ship Reformatories, and on Intemperance as a cause of crime, are worthy of the Union, whilst in every point Lord Stanley shewed himself fit to fill the high position of President of the first provincial meeting of the National Reformatory Union.

There was read one paper, a paper from "the old man eloquent," a paper with much of the Henry Brougham of thirty years ago about it, to which we must refer.

This paper is one of the best analyses we have ever read of the short comings and imperfections of our legislature in the philosophy of law as connected with criminal jurisprudence. These topics, however, belong to another portion of our work, and must be treated in another paper, but that part of Lord Brougham's letter referring to the sources of crime do belong to the topics of our present paper. He writes:—

How grievously lawyers and magistrates and speculative reasoners have always erred in bestowing so little attention upon the Reformatory process, needs not further be shown; the fact is admitted, the lesson is plain, which all reasoning might have taught us before all experience, that each convict who unreclaimed leaves the gaol becomes the teacher, by his precept and by his example, of the crimes in which his former life had been passed. The patient who has been discharged from the moral hospital uncured, carries about with him a contagious disease, threatening the existence of society; and, unhappily, society cannot escape from him. I take a parallel case. A man has escaped from the pest-house with the fire of the plague raging through his veins, the contagious matter festering on his limbs, or rather the poison distilled in his lungs and dispersed by his breath; but you have no power of confining him, and no means of avoiding him; his infection will reach speedily the parts of the social system most predisposed to receive it, and none of the community are safe from the consequences of the disease. You cannot defend yourselves against this dreadful malady. What then is the course which common prudence requires you to pursue? You must run the risk of the mischief he will do, but you must instantly shut up all whom he has infected, and take especial care never again to let another be discharged uncured. What are we now about? Not one, but THOUSANDS, of uncured patients are every year vomited forth from our moral pest-houses; nay, the rules of these establishments absolutely require that all, or almost all, should be sent forth uncured.

---

* For Mr. Hill's opinions, and proofs of their wisdom, see ante, Art. "Woman's Work."—ED.

I have already asked the question, Why confine our Reformatory treatment to young offenders—asked it for the purpose of breaking down that groundless distinction which would prescribe one course for dealing with one class of criminals, and another for dealing with all others. Let me now ask this further question, suggested by the whole subject of Reformatory treatment, Why should we only begin the operation after men have become convicts? Why confine our attempts at counteracting vicious habits to the process of cure, and neglect that of prevention? Why be satisfied with trying to eradicate bad habits, when their having been formed renders the task of exterminating them so difficult? Why not endeavour to prevent those habits from ever being contracted, by operating upon the human being, the subject of our treatment in both cases, before he has become inured to vice, and while yet easily moulded to virtue? In a word, why not apply our whole force to distributing among the members of the community—most in want of it, least able to obtain it—the inestimable gift of a sound education.

I need not give proofs of the intimate connexion between ignorance and crimes. I need not repeat the statement which I made in 1835, when I moved my resolutions on Education, that even of the rioters and incendiaries tried in the winter of 1830-1, not by any means of the lowest ranks, only 150 out of 700 could sign their names, the rest being marksmen; that of those received into the Refuge of the Destitute, only one in 30, or even 35, have received any instruction; that a worthy magistrate of Essex declared nine-tenths of those who were brought before him to be marksmen; that all the young offenders whose cases are described in the admirable petition from the Liverpool magistrates to the House of Lords, almost every one was in a state of utter ignorance; that Mr. Clay, the excellent Preston gaol chaplain, found above half of those he examined ignorant of the Sovereign's name, and of the names of the months: while hardly two in the hundred could read and write; and yet, that by far the greater number had heard read to them books of the most flagitious character, offering direct incentives to a life of idleness and plunder. Facts such as these are not wanted to show the necessary connexion between ignorance and vice; and yet I am arguing for more than the mere blessing of elementary education—the reading, writing, and cyphering, usually taught to poor children after they have attained a certain age. My desire is to see the preventive process begin much earlier; for it is quite certain that the habits are formed in infancy rather than in early youth, and that it is as easy to train a child of four or five years old to good principles and kindly feelings and honest conduct, as it is difficult to break him off bad habits, acquired before he has reached the age of eight or even seven years.

Only consider in what portion of society the criminals, whose numbers infect every community, are born and bred. Not in the upper, not in the middle, not even in the better portion of the lower classes; but these criminals are raised from the comparatively small proportion of our people who are in abject poverty, and with difficulty can earn an honest subsistence, often being without the means of sustenance at all except from charity or from dishonest pursuits. Then, let Infant Schools be established in all our towns, especially our cities, enough to train the infant children of this class, not exceeding a tenth of the people in the larger towns, and not more than a fifteenth in the smaller ones. If this provision were made, the source of crimes would be cut off at the fountain head. Our criminal jurisprudence, our criminal police, would not have many subjects whereon to work; and our reformatory treatment would be easily applied to the few bad cases that might still remain.

I am, however, well aware that until we have established something that may deserve the name of a national education we have little right to speak of its last refinement, but its most important branch, the general establishment of infant training. And how long—how much longer—are we to wait before the most scandalous disgrace resting on our character as a people shall be removed? before the bitterness of sectarian controversy shall so far be allayed by the Christian feeling of mutual forbearance, and the heats of polemical conflict be so far tempered by the charities of brotherly love, as to let us reflect that “the greatest of all these things is charity,” and that the triumphs of sect over sect are as absolutely nothing, compared with the mighty and the holy conquests of sound knowledge over ignorance? How long must it be before we see the adversaries in such miserable contests prefer that victory which is far greater than his who conquers a great city, the victory over their own temper—leading to the storming or the sapping of the strong but not impregnable fortress of ignorance, immorality, and irreligion?

It is our highest duty to rescue the people from ignorance and vice, by giving them the inestimable blessing of a sound, moral, and religious education; to prevent the growth of crimes, while we provide for reclaiming from their vicious courses those who have been led astray—a cure only to be effected by making the punishment of criminals the instrument of their reformation.

That duty we have not discharged. But if we have planted no schools where the habits of virtue may be induced, stretched forth no hand to extirpate the germs of vice, we have kept open other schools where vice is taught with never-failing success, used both hands incessantly to stifle the seeds of virtue ere yet they had time to sprout, laid down many a hotbed where the growth of crime in all its rank luxuriance is assiduously forced. THE INFANT SCHOOL languishes, which a paternal government would have cherished; but Newgate flourishes—Newgate with her thousand cells to corrupt their youthful inmates, seducing the guiltless, confirming the depraved. THE INFANT SCHOOL IS CLOSED, which a paternal Government would have opened wide to all its children; but the Penitentiary day and night yawns to engulf the victims of our stepmother system—the Penitentiary, where repentance and penance should rather be performed by the real authors of their fall. THE INFANT SCHOOL RECEIVES NO INNOCENTS whom it might train or might hold fast to natural virtue: but the utterly execrable, the altogether abominable Hulk, lies moored in the face of the day which it darkens, within sight of the land which it insults, riding on the waters which it stains with every unnatural excess of infernal pollution, triumphant over all morals! And shall civilized, shall free, shall Christian rulers any longer pause, any more hesitate, before they amend their ways, and attempt, though late yet seriously, to discharge the first of their duties? Or shall we, calling ourselves the friends to human improvement, balance any longer upon some party interest, some sectarian punctilio, or even some refined scruple, when the means are within our reach to redeem the time and do that which is most blessed in the sight of God, most beneficial to man? Or shall it be said, that between the claims of contending factions in Church or in State, the Legislature stands paralyzed, and puts not forth its hand to save the people placed by Providence under its care, lest offence be given to some of the knots of theologians who bewilder its ears with their noise, as they have bewildered their own brains with their controversies? Be well assured, that the contempt lavished for centuries upon the cabals of Constantinople, where the Council disputed on a text, while the enemy, the derider of all their texts, was thundering at the gate, will be as a token of respect compared with the loud shout of universal scorn which all mankind in all ages will send up against us if we stand still and suffer a far deadlier foe than the Turcoman—suffer the parent of all evil, all falsehood, all hypocrisy, all discharity, all self-seeking—him who covers over with pretexts of conscience the pitfalls that he digs for the souls on which he preys—to stalk about the fold and lay waste its inmates—if we stand still and make no head against him, upon the vain pretext, to soothe our indolence, that our action is obstructed by religious cabals—upon the far more guilty speculation, that by playing a party game we can turn the hatred of conflicting professors to our selfish purposes.

Who can add to the force, and eloquence, and wisdom of these words? Who, knowing the facts as Mr. Clay, and Mr. Field, and Mr. Kingsmill record them, can question the conclusions? We may reason on them; we may question them; we may take individual cases in which great ability and education were combined only to make the criminal more criminal; but, unless we turn away from realities, and attempting

“——— by obtruse research to steal
From our own nature all the natural man,”

we must admit that, from first to last, every point advanced by Lord Brougham is fully and completely supported by facts, by figures, and by hard, bitter, stern realities.

The Rev. Mr. Turner states, in his paper,* that Ireland offers a fair field for the establishment of colonies for juvenile offenders. For our own parts we sincerely trust that, if such colonies are to be formed, our home-made juveniles will be considered, and first provided for. England sends us back our Irish poor, who may become a tax on English rate-payers; why should she send us criminal juveniles whilst no effort is made by Parliament to employ our own juvenile criminals in reclaiming themselves and the waste lands? A Bill for Juvenile Reformation is introduced, as unsuited to this country as moral pocket-handkerchiefs to the Caffres. It is resisted by the Catholic Bishops, it is opposed by the Catholic members of Parliament, and then is permitted to fall into utter forgetfulness. Why should there not be a Select Committee of the House of Commons next session to enquire into the whole management of Prisons in Ireland, and to decide upon the proper form of Reformatory Schools' Bill adapted to this country? Our friends, Captain Crofton, Mr. Lentaigue, and Mr. Corry Connellan, are fully able and, we doubt not, prepared and willing to give every information on the subject. Two years ago a Draft Bill, the outline of one suited to Ireland, was carefully considered, printed, and placed before the country and the Government; and although gentlemen officially, practically, professionally, and theoretically acquainted with the whole bearing of the subject, in every phase, approved the measure, and were closely engaged in its inception, its progress, and its completion, their suggestions were either forgotten or despised, and it was proposed to extend the English Juvenile Offenders' Act to Ireland; an Act exclusively intended for England, and designed to meet the peculiar requirements of that country. As a matter of course, the proposal was met at once, by every man knowing Ireland, as a proposal which should be opposed most strenuously, as being dangerous to the faith of our people, as opening a new field for proselytism and seuperism; and an attempt having been made to meet this difficulty, the matter was only rendered still more objectionable, whilst all other imperfections were permitted to remain in their original imperfection and unsuitableness; and so the bill became a dead bill.

How long our Irish juvenile criminals are to remain uncared for, until sentenced to penal servitude, we know not. For the young convict an admirable institution is being erected at Lusk, but just in proportion as we work the Reformatory Principle will the usefulness or necessity of this Institution be diminished, and we hope we shall live to see the Lusk Prison for Juvenile Convicts become the Lusk Reformatory School.

---

* See ante.

Meanwhile, let us say, borrowing the hopeful words with which Mary Carpenter concludes her beautiful paper already quoted :—

“MAY MANY LABORERS BE RAISED UP WHO WILL ENDEAVOR TO RESCUE THESE LOST ONES—TO SAVE A SOUL FROM DEATH AND THUS COVER A MULTITUDE OF SINS.”

REFORMATORY UNIONS.

We publish the following letters which have appeared in The Philanthropist :—

REFORMATORY AND REFUGE UNION.

To the Editor of the Philanthropist.

Sir—At the conference on Reformatories which was held at Bristol last week, there were some expressions used relative to the particular views entertained by the “Reformatory and Refuge Union,” which were calculated to convey an erroneous impression of that society. I trust, therefore, you will permit this explanation of the difference of the two Unions to appear in your columns. The Reformatory and Refuge friends and those of the National Reformatory held a meeting in February last, in order, if possible, to amalgamate, and so to join in one society, for the purpose of carrying out the grand objects of the “prevention of crime and the reformation of criminals.” The former party wished to base such an association upon Christian principles, and to nail their colours to the mast; the latter party urged that such a course would exclude many, who, though willing to join in the cause, might not wish to subscribe to the colours. These are simply the facts of the case, which it would be well to make known, the result of which was that as we could not agree upon the basis upon which the proposed society should be formed, we separated, each resolving to do as much good in their respective spheres, as those who are embarked in one common cause can possibly effect.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT HANBURY, JUN.

3, Sussex-square, August 25, 1856.

To the Editor of the Philanthropist.

Sir—Our attention has been drawn to the letter which appeared in your last number from Mr. Robert Hanbury, jun., on the difference between the views of the National Reformatory, and the Reformatory and Refuge, Unions.

Mr. Hanbury assures your readers that the real point of difference is that the latter party “wished to base their association upon Christian principles, and to nail their colours to the mast;” while the former party “urged that such a course would exclude many who, though willing to join in the cause, might not wish to subscribe to the colours.”

We are not aware that "Christian principles" were at all in question. The separation turned upon the wording of a resolution referring to the use of Scripture; and here the point at issue was not—Is the Bible an essential means of reformatory influence, and the teaching of the Bible the great instrument of the reformatory teacher? On such a point no difference did or could exist between any of the founders of either Union. The point was this, "Shall it be a fundamental rule of our Union that no school shall be comprehended in it in which the Bible is not used and taught from?" Shall, that is, such a rule be adopted as will ignore all Roman Catholic schools, and at once exclude the great Continental labourers in the cause—De Metz, Ducpeteaux, Pol, &c., from the association?

The promoters of the National Reformatory Union formed their society not to give money, or to disseminate a system, but as a general medium for gaining and imparting knowledge, and for communicating and awakening interest on the subject of reformatory discipline, upon as wide a scale as possible. They wished to inform all who wanted information—to obtain the advantage of inquiry and experience from all that could afford them. It was their desire to form an union not of schools but of individuals, as a sort of open club, in which all the labourers in the Reformatory cause might find and give mutual society, help and comfort. To have excluded any because of the rules adopted in the schools they were connected with, would have changed its character, and would have imposed upon its members a responsibility for the views and proceedings of others, which many might have felt unwilling to undertake—and it was from an objection to adopt any exclusive rule whatever—and not from any hesitation as to the particular resolution proposed—that they found themselves obliged to differ from the other association as to the ground they should take up—in proof of which it may be mentioned that several of them are members also of the Refuge and Reformatory Union, and gladly subscribe to its assertion of the paramount importance of sound Scriptural teaching.

What their feeling and their practice are was indeed truly and forcibly expressed by Lord Robert Cecil at the Bristol meeting—

"Religion must be the teacher's motive, in reality his only motive. Religion is the moving power of the reformatory school; without it the best machinery must inevitably fail; while with it an organization and staff, intellectually inferior, are often attended with gratifying success."—

We are, Sir, your very faithful servants,

T. B. LL Baker, Hardwicke; Henry I. Barton, Northamptonshire; G. H. Bengough, Kingswood; I. G. Blencowe, Sussex; C. H. Bracebridge, Warwickshire; Alwyne Compton, Northamptonshire; William Cartwright, Northamptonshire; C. Castleman, Hampshire; John Field (Chaplain), Reading Gaol; William G. Garnett, Lancashire; William Gladstone, Redhill; Thomas Hutton (Chaplain), Northampton Gaol; G. W. Latham, Cheshire; Lovaine; George Alan Lowndes, Essex; I. C. Mansel, Dorsetshire; D. Melville, Worcestershire; William Miles, Kingswood; I. Bligh Monck, Berkshire; H. O. Nethercote; Stafford H. Northcote, Devon; Charles Ratcliff, Saltley; W. B. Stopford; Sydney Turner, Redhill; I. W. Perry Watlington, Essex; E. B. Wheatley, Yorkshire West Riding; Thomas E. Winnington, Worcestershire.

NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

To the Editor of the Philanthropist.

DEAR SIR,—Will you have the goodness to correct an omission by publishing the following names in your next PHILANTHROPIST.

They ought to have appeared amongst the signatures to the letter addressed to you from members of the National Reformatory Union, in answer to Mr. Robert Hanbury's letter in your number for September last.

Mary Carpenter.

J. C. Mansel.

Cary C. Elwes.

O. W. Hambrough.

H. O. Nethercote.

I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

HENRY J. BARTON.

ART. VI.—THE IRISH CENSUS.

The Census of Ireland for the Year 1851—Parts V. and VI. General Report and Tables of Deaths. Presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty. Dublin: Thom and Sons, 87 Abbey-street. 1856.

"In conclusion, we feel it will be GRATIFYING TO YOUR EXCELLENCY, to find that, although the population has been diminished in so remarkable a manner, BY FAMINE, DISEASE, and Emigration, and HAS BEEN SINCE DECREASING, the results of the IRISH CENSUS ARE, on the whole, SATISFACTORY"!!!

Did the respectable and respected gentlemen who drew up and affixed their names to the Report from which the foregoing truly astounding sentence is taken,—(the General Report just published of the Commissioners of the Irish Census of 1851),—did those good and undoubtedly most competent Commissioners fully ponder and consider its words and tenor? Could they have done so, being what they are? or is it not far more likely—does not our previous knowledge of them make it much more probable—that, overpressed by their great and exceedingly creditable labors, they were not able, when at length approaching the termination of their heavy task, to give the same attention and thoughtful care to some of its concluding expressions, which they have manifested in the preparation of the deeply interesting and useful statistics, and historic and other details contained in their valuable Report?

Assuredly there cannot be a doubt of the soundness of this latter supposition. The alternative we will not, indeed we could not, bring ourselves to consider for one moment! It is not only improbable, judging from what in the ungainly but expressive phrase of the day, may be called their "antecedents,"—but it is really impossible, that they—or any one with a heart in his bosom, or a conscience to guide him—could have, aforethought, and with full deliberation, penned such a sentence—savouring as it does not a little of heartlessness towards man and even of profanity towards Heaven!

These expressions may at first sight appear too strong, but a little reflection will shew that they are really no more than what the case demands. Let first the fact, (unhappily too well attested), be taken, that more than a million of the Irish people have perished by famine or disease! Next, that nearly if not quite another million have been driven away in a despairing Emigration, losing fully one-half their number in the miseries of the ocean-passage, or the destitution and pestilence awaiting them on the American shore. Thirdly, that the amount and due natural increase of the population of Ireland have been so reduced and repressed by the appalling agencies just mentioned, that her people were fewer in 1851 than they were twenty years before, and can any one say that all this should be spoken of in the same breath with congratulations and satisfactions!

Renewing again and again our earnest and explicit protestations against being held to charge these Commissioners with wilfulness and deliberateness of intent in the sentence we are dealing with, we must be permitted in continuation to remark, that if that sentence could have a deliberate meaning, it would plainly be that the number and increase of our fellow creatures in any country are matters to be judged of and regulated by views of human policy in correction sometimes, and at other times in equally presumptuous approval and adaptation of the designs and dispensations of Providence; and that the desolating of a people's homesteads, and the waste and wide-spread destruction of human life, are not to be weighed in the balance with economic considerations and the theories of the day!!

Happily, however, without any paltering with the truth, or over-anxiety to conceal or excuse wrong-doing, the supposition can unhesitatingly be accepted as valid that the real force and true meaning of the expressions on which we are commenting, so far from being intended, were not so much as dreamed of, by the gentlemen who wrote them.

While thus willingly and repeatedly declaring this to be our belief in so far as the Commissioners of the Irish Census are concerned, and attributing the very unfortunate words they made use of in the passage quoted at the commencement of this paper, simply to the natural inadvertence of men hastening to conclude a labor which had we cannot say overtasked, but doubtless wearied and exhausted them, we certainly neither ignore, nor wish to appear desirous of ignoring, the sad and shocking fact, that there were, and are, in England, and we fear in Ireland too, in a few scattered instances at least, public writers and public men who deliberately avow the opinion, that the loss of so many of her people was a benefit to Ireland. With them we shall hold no argument; for the opinion is too monstrous and revolting to admit of argument, and calmness would be impossible in dealing with it.

Neither do we at all want to ignore the fact that there has been what the Census Commissioners designate as an "advancement of the country." The full nature, extent and value of this "advancement" we must afterwards more particularly consider. But there can be no question of the general correctness of the statement, so far as the "increased extent of arable land since 1841," the "progress of education among the people," and some other points. Coming now to a closer consideration of this Report; we must in the first instance express a regret that it was not found possible to comprise the results of the Census-Commissioners enquiries into less than the ten large blue books, of which the two last are now before us. "Blue books," according to a parliamentary proverb, "are never read;" and without going quite so far in our assertion, we will say that certainly those readers who make themselves at all extensively acquainted with the contents, are rather an insignificant minority of the general public. By the statist, by the future historian, by the philosophical and physiological enquirer, the "blue books" will be and are perused with attention and valuable fruit; for that class of readers have full and unlimited leisure for the purpose; and can examine closely, and carefully, and thoroughly sift, arrange, and methodize, the somewhat "rudis, indigestaque molis' of information which is the general characteristic of these overgrown productions, owing more to the misfortune than to the fault of their compilers. The zeal and industry of the latter are unduly taxed by the amount of work they have to do within a necessarily very limited and inadequate period. Facts have to be hunted out, gathered up, snatched as it were, almost at random, with little or no opportunity for selection or digestion,—impressions and assertions to be accepted and adopted without time for due examination, and views and opinions to be enunciated and supported without leisure sufficiently to consider and mature them. Greater latitude as to the time within which their Report was to be presented, and we are quite willing to believe greater natural capacity than common, have enabled the Irish Census Commissioners to avoid many of these shoals: but this has been to some degree counteracted by the length to which their own scrupulous exactitude and self-unsparing laboriousness have extended their Report. He should, however, be captious indeed who on that score would find serious fault with so valuable and creditable a work.

Entering as we are about to do into the details of this Report, we confess to no little difficulty in deciding at what point to begin. The difficulty is in fact double:—One phase of it arising from the extremely wide scope taken by the Commissioners' enquiries and the enormous mass of matter accumulated by them; while the other phase is simply attributable to the sad and sickening feeling inevitably excited by a close perusal of the mournful and frightful details. Having taken up the task, however, we must go on with it through all obstacles or discouragements, and do not at the moment see any more convenient mode of so doing than to continue upon the kind of text furnished by the quoted paragraph with which this paper commences. Before launching out at large into our commentary, we shall complete that text by as plainly and briefly as possible, setting out the leading statistics that tend to illustrate it.

On the one hand then, or one side of the account, namely, that of the loss to Ireland, are to be set down these facts, viz., had the population of Ireland increased up to 1851 in the same proportion as that of England and Wales, the official calculators say that she should in that year have numbered 9,018,799. They report that she actually numbered only 6,552,385 souls ! a deficit therefore of two millions and a half ! But the Commissioners have told us in the quotation so often alluded to, that our population has continued since 1851 to decrease, and they give at page 57 of their Report a table which estimates the diminution since 1851 to the present year as nearly 500,000 more, over and above all possible set-offs for births and immigration, whether of British and foreigners, or of returned Irish Emigrants. To this is to be added an estimate for the loss by the non-occurrence of the usual average of births ; an estimate for which the Commissioners supply data based upon the rate of increase in England and Wales, and on this item the additional deficit would be for the last five years about 60,000, making on the whole, up to the present time, a deficiency of more than three millions in our population !

The recorded deaths during the Decennial Period, 1841-1851, are stated to have been 1,360,000 ; but in more than one place the Commissioners allude to the fact that many unrecorded deaths must have taken place during the famine, especially in the remoter parts of the country. There is therefore reason to believe that the total deficiency of three millions of human beings before mentioned should be rated at perhaps some hundreds of thousands more ; and that as we have extended it over the five years since 1850, which period of five years is not taken into account in calculating the 1,360,000 deaths above stated, the real total of deaths for the whole period 1841-51, was at the least a million and a half and probably more. This, it is also to be remembered, represents only the deaths in Ireland ; leaving the loss of life among our emigrants through the accidents and miseries of their ocean-passage and in the destitution that they found themselves in when landed in America, entirely out of the statement. That loss has been by several trustworthy writers, thought to have been in the high proportion of from 25 to 30 per cent !

So much then for one side of the account—that of Ireland's loss. Now for her gain. As we shall have presently to go into details on this subject, it will not be necessary to deal at any length with it here. The points of improvement specially mentioned by the Census Commissioners are four in number : viz., 1st, the "increased extent of arable land and of value of farm-stock"—2nd, the replacement of "the worst class of houses by a better"—3rd, the "smaller proportion of families dependent on their own manual labor," and 4th, the "favorable progress of the education of the people." The increase of arable land between 1841 and 1851 was from 13,464,300 acres in the former year, to 14,802,581 acres in the latter, or an increase of 1,338,281 acres. That of the value of farm-stock was nearly one-third. In respect of house accommodation, in reference to which the Commissioners remark page xxii of General Report), "that the houses of a country are an index to the condition of its inhabitants," the following is the state of things ascertained by them :—

1st class, or houses above the rank of farmhouses, and buildings in towns corresponding to them in description and accommodation. Increase from 1841 to 1851	10,084
2nd class, good farm houses, and corresponding houses in towns, increase	54,574
3rd class, mud cottages of from two to four rooms and windows, increase	8,415
4th class, mud cabins, DECREASE	355,689

On the third point, the Report tells us that "three of the Provinces of Ireland shew a decrease in the proportionate number of persons dependent on their own manual labor for support, viz., 29 per cent. decrease in Connaught, 12·7 per cent in Ulster, and 7·8 per cent in Munster." On the whole of Ireland the number of persons engaged in "Agriculture," decreased from 66 per cent. in 1841, to 53 per cent. in 1851—the number engaged in "manufactures, trade, &c." remained stationary at 2·4 per cent, and that of persons engaged in "other pursuits" increased from 10 to 23 per cent.—this last class including independent, and professional persons.

On the fourth and last point—that of the "favorable progress of the education of the people, the Commissioners refer us for details to Part IV. of their series of "Blue Books." But they give as a general statement and summary of statistics on it, and on the 2nd and 3rd points with which we have just dealt, a "Table" (numbered xxi. at page xxxvii. of their "General Report"), from which we extract the following. We must premise that the object they proposed to themselves in drawing up this table was (to use their own words at page xxxvi. of the Report) to show that as ignorance diminishes the condition of the people improves.

1841.				1851.
Provinces arranged in the order of their education.	Persons 5 years old & upwards who could neither read nor write.	Families.		Provinces arranged in the order of their education.	Persons 5 years old & upwards who could neither read nor write.	Families.
		Occupying only 4th class house accommodation.	Dependent on their own manual labour.			Occupying only 4th class house accommodation.	Dependent on their own manual labour.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.		Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
Ulster .	42	36.3	64.1	Ulster .	37	12.1	45.4
Leinster .	48	83.8	63.2	Leinster .	43	71.3	43.5
Munster .	64	58.9	68.3	Munster .	58	82.0	51.7
Connaught	73	53.6	79.0	Connaught	67	26.2	45.4
Total .	58	49.5	67.9	Total .	50	21.6	49.4

Reviewing now the account thus summarily stated as given by the Commissioners themselves, we find the loss and gain to Ireland, on the whole, to stand as follows—

LOSS TO IRELAND.

Upwards of Three Millions of human beings, of whom about 1,500,000 died at home, and about two-fifths of the remainder died on passage, or from want and disease, in America.

Thirteen per cent. decrease in the number of persons employed in agriculture, without any increase in the number of those employed in manufactures and trade.

GAIN TO IRELAND.

1,300,000 acres increase of cultivation, 10,000, houses of superior class more in 1851 than in 1841, and 54,000 more of farm houses, and decent houses in towns.

Increase from 10 to 28 per cent of persons of independent means and professional persons—and lastly, increase of the number of those who can read and write.

Upon all this it is at present unnecessary further to remark, that there is no reason whatever why the "gain" to Ireland, such as it is, should not have occurred and in greater degree, although her population had not been so fearfully diminished. The addition of thirteen or fourteen hundred thousand acres to the "arable land" of the country, and the small increase of better houses, are no such extraordinary advances as to compensate for the loss of so many human beings, or for the miserable sufferings of the Irish people. If to secure these advantages and such others as the Report details to us, it was necessary that depopulation and death should come into play, must there not have been something monstrously rotten and wrong in the state of Ireland previously; and if so why are we not shewn the guarantees and securities, if any such exist, against the breaking out again of the old evils and mischiefs? If largeness of population were at the bottom of it, who is to ensure that now, when the potato-rot has all but ceased, and the cycle of years of plenty may be fairly expected, population will not increase again, and perhaps in that accelerated ratio of which history affords so many instances in the cases of nations whose numbers have been wasted by sudden and extraordinary causes.

The increase of "persons of independent means" and that of "professional persons," are not separately stated, doubtless from the want of data. We are, therefore, left to ourselves to guess at the proportion, and from what is known by every one of the general condition of Ireland, it is fair to suppose that "professional persons" form a very large item, if not by much the larger of the two. Unfortunately, it is also generally known that the "professions" in Ireland are badly paid and overstocked at present—in particular the legal profession in both its branches. We cannot therefore accept these items of increase as very strong proofs of growing prosperity. Neither can we accept as a proof of great improvement the increased per centage of persons who can read and write. It is not large in itself, and the Commissioners expressly guard themselves from affirming, "that these satisfactory changes," (namely, the one we are just speaking of, combined with the decrease of cabins, and of the number of persons dependent on their own manual labor,) "are altogether owing to the decrease in the proportions of those who could neither read nor write, as no doubt the diminution of the people had also its effect"!

We are sure that they would be equally cautious of committing themselves to the opinion that these changes might not have occurred, had the natural increase of our population gone on instead of the check and fearful diminution that they have had to record.

Meantime, while the "gain" is thus so doubtful, the "loss" of population and the sufferings, miseries, and cruel and numberless deaths that caused that loss, are facts which nothing can mitigate nor explain away.

There is, therefore, we are grieved and pained to say, but scant reason for "congratulations" and satisfaction, in the review of Ireland's present condition, even taking it on the Census Commissioners' own shewing.

Turning gladly from the extremely unpleasant duty of fault finding with any part of their most meritorious labors, we hasten to note some of the many points in which those gentlemen have amply earned the respect and warm approbation of their countrymen.

The tribute they are careful to pay to the conduct of our poor people during the fearful trials of the last ten years, although simply what it was due and right to pay, reflects credit upon themselves, and would prove, were proof wanting, that they have deeply sympathised with the sufferings, the destructive operation, and results of which it was their task to note down. In the extract we are about to give, it will be seen that the Commissioners have prefaced their remarks upon the admirable behaviour of the Irish people under those sufferings, with what must enhance in the eyes of every one the merit of that behaviour, namely, a description of the almost brutalising effects of extreme privations, upon the human subject. More than three millions of the Irish people had to make fearful experience of those effects, and the Commissioners will tell us how they bore themselves under the tremendous infliction.

It is scarcely possible to exaggerate in imagination what people will do, and are forced to do, before they die from absolute want of food, for not only does the body become blackened and wasted by chronic starvation, but the mind likewise becomes darkened, the feelings callous, blunted, and apathetic; and a peculiar fever is generated, which became but too well known to the medical profession in Ireland at that time, and to all those engaged in administering relief.

In this state, of what may almost be called mania, before the final collapse takes place, when the victim sinks into utter prostration from inanition, some instances may have occurred at which human nature in its ordinary healthy condition, revolts. Thus, a stipendiary magistrate stated, in the court-house of Galway, in extenuation of the crime of a poor prisoner, brought up for stealing food, that to his own knowledge, before he was driven to the theft, he and his family had actually consumed part of a human body lying dead in the cabin with them. See p. 310.

Generally speaking, the actually starving people lived upon the carcasses of diseased cattle, upon dogs, and dead horses, but principally on the herbs of the field, nettle tops, wild mustard, and watercresses, and even in some places dead bodies were found with grass in their mouths. The shamrock, or wood-sorrel (oxalis acetosella) mentioned by Spenser as forming part of the food of the famished people in his time, does not now, owing to the extirpation of weeds, exist in sufficient quantity to afford any nutriment; but along the coast every description of sea-weed was greedily devoured, often with fatal consequences; even the dillisk, or "salt-leaf," though a safe occasional condiment, became the cause of disease when used as the sole support of life.

Some approximation to the amount of the immense mortality that prevailed may be gleaned from the published tables which show that within that calamitous period between the end of 1845 and the conclusion of the first quarter of 1851, as many as 61,260 persons died in the hospitals and sanitary institutions, exclusive of those who died in the workhouses and auxiliary workhouses. Taking the recorded deaths from fever alone, between the beginning of 1846 and the end of 1849, and assuming the mortality at 1 in 10, which is the very lowest calculation, and far below what we believe really did occur, above a million and a-half, or 1,595,040 persons, being 1 in 4.11 of the population in 1851, must have suffered from fever during that period. But no pen has recorded the numbers of the forlorn and starving who perished by the wayside or in the ditches, or of the mournful groups, sometimes of whole families, who lay down and died, one after another, upon the floor of their miserable cabin, and so remained uncoffined and unburied, till chance unveiled the appalling scene. No such amount of suffering and misery has been chronicled in Irish history since the days of Edward Bruce; and yet, through all, the forbearance of the Irish peasantry, and the calm submission with which they bore the deadliest ills that can fall on man, can scarcely be paralleled in the annals of any people. Numbers, indeed, were sent to prison for petty crimes, often committed to save themselves or children from starvation, and there met their death from pestilential diseases arising from the overcrowding and contagion in those institutions; yet the slight amount of crime of a serious nature which prevailed throughout Ireland during the years of extreme destitution was remarkable; and instances occurred in which the judges, feeling that want alone drove the prisoners to its commission, directed their discharge without further punishment.

According to the Report of the Census Commissioners for 1841, the annual average emigrations between 1831 and 1841 was 40,346, and from the 30th June in the latter year to the end of 1845 it averaged 61,242 per annum. Such, however, was the effect of the potato blight and the warning voice of the pestilence, that the number rose to 105,955 in 1846, after which the emigration seemed to partake of the nature of an epidemic, and in 1847 the numbers who left the country more than doubled those who departed in the previous year. Owing to a slight mitigation of the potato blight, and a consequent improvement in the harvest of 1847, there was an arrest of the exodus in the beginning of 1848, when the numbers who emigrated only amounted to 178,159; but in the following year they again rose to 214,425. In 1850 the amount of emigration was 209,054. The emigration reached its highest point in 1851, when the numbers amounted to 249,721, after which they gradually decreased to 150,222 in 1854; yet, even in 1855, long after the extreme poor, the panic-stricken, and the destitute, had passed to other countries, or had found a refuge in the workhouses, or a rest in the grave, the remarkable spectacle of whole families—usually well-dressed, intelligent looking people—of all ages and sexes, the mere infant as well as the extremely aged—might be observed passing through the metropolis on their way to the emigrant vessel. Not the least peculiar feature in the extensive emigration of this period was the amount of money transmitted to their friends in Ireland by those who had already gone away; remittances which rose from the sum of £460,000 in 1848, to £7,404,000 in 1852, and according to the reports of the Emigration Commissioners, amounted in contributions, either in the form of prepaid passage, or of money sent home by the Irish emigrants, from 1848 to 1854, both inclusive, to as much as £7,520,000; remittances “which afford so honourable a testimony of the self-denial and affectionate disposition of the Irish.”

The Relief Commissioners bear the following testimony to the singular and marked forbearance of the Irish people at this time of trial:—"The orderly and good conduct of the peasantry is highly to be commended; all admit that the resignation and forbearance of the labouring classes was astonishing, when it is remembered with what rapidity the famine encompassed them." It is true that agrarian outrages spread over particular districts to such an extent as to cause several counties to be proclaimed; and thus, homicides rose to 338 in 1847, and executions to the very unusual number of thirty-two in the year following. These outrages, however, arose more from feelings which have so long existed as to be almost hereditary amongst the lower classes of Irish—a clinging to the soil of which they happened to be in possession with superstitious tenacity—bitter revenge towards those who evicted them—and strong prejudices against entering the workhouses, where they might have been saved from starving. Alluding to the number of deaths from starvation as decided by coroners' juries, the Poor Law Commissioners state, that "in many of these and other cases which came to their knowledge without any inquest having been held, the death was attributable to the determination of the heads of families not to resign the occupation of land, which exposed their families to intense privation, and not unfrequently to fatal consequences." Some of these families were at the time actually endeavouring to exist on the produce of a quarter of an acre of land! The middle and even the upper classes of society suffered many privations; and in some cases respectable families wanted not merely the ordinary comforts but even the necessaries of life. The previously incumbered state of many properties, and the immense local taxation, produced a state of things which forced upon the landed proprietors—themselves often deeply embarrassed—the strong and sudden necessity of evicting (perhaps too hastily and extensively) an insolvent tenantry—while the unfortunate people, thus deprived of what seemed to them their only chance for subsistence, had not yet learned to appreciate the value of Poor Law relief, nor to avail themselves of the means of emigration, in many cases provided for them. On this subject an acute and enlightened writer has made the following observations:—"The source of all mischief in Ireland, the real origin of every disturbance, and of almost every crime, is the want of employment; and as the occupation of land is nearly the only means of employment, and, therefore, of subsistence, it follows that the obtaining and retaining possession of it are objects which enlist the strongest of human motives—the struggle for existence. It is existence with a patch of land; it is starvation without it."

To alleviate the misery consequent upon this awful famine—the sad details of which soon awakened the sympathies of even distant countries—the most strenuous efforts which human sagacity, ingenuity and foresight could at the time devise were put into requisition. Several acts of parliament were passed in rapid succession to meet the emergency of the time—under which a large and wide-spread commissariat was organised, most extensive employment afforded, food supplied, and medical relief distributed over the country. The British Government granted millions either as loans or gifts. Private benevolence throughout the British Islands supplied hundreds of thousands of pounds; the country, through the Poor Law unions, taxed itself to the utmost of its capabilities; the colonies of Great Britain poured in their contributions; and every civilised country of the world sent its offering of food or money to diminish the amount of human misery then existing in Ireland. Some idea of that destitution may be formed from the facts that on one day—the 3rd of July 1847—out of a population of about 8,000,000, nearly three millions of people received food gratuitously from the hands of the relieving officers: and in addition, as many as 99,920 rations were sold at a moderate cost to those who were unable to procure food otherwise; that the Public Works afforded, in March 1847, employment to 734,000 people; that there existed one hundred and thirty-one workhouses, with their auxiliaries and hospitals, giving, within the space of two years, shelter, food and raiment to 1,027,602 persons, and at one period 800,000 were relieved daily at the charge of the poor rates; that, in addition to the ordinary eleemosynary institutions of the country, two hundred and seven temporary fever hospitals, through which passed, during the years 1847 and 1848, as many as 279,723 persons, were erected; and that an emigration amounting to very nearly a million occurred in six years. These details will afford some notion of the extent of destitution and disease which devastated Ireland, leaving extensive districts of it uncultivated, and presenting a most desolate appearance.

It will be remarked in the foregoing extract that the Commissioners, not content with bearing their own testimony to the endurance, patience and resignation of their and our poorer fellow-countrymen, under the scourges with which it pleased Divine Providence, for its own wise and inscrutable ends, to afflict them since the year 1846 nearly up to the present time, have carefully quoted also the testimony of others.

We now come to what should in all formal regularity have engaged our attention at the very commencement of this paper, if, like unto poets, reviewers were not permitted to plunge at once and without preface "in medias res," when they considered they could better treat their subject by so doing. We allude to what is in fact the commencement of the "General Report" itself;—the Census Commissioners' exposition of the plan upon which they based and conducted their enquiries.

The Act under which they were appointed enabled them to command the services of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, the Coast-Guard, and the County Constabulary, "together with such other competent persons as the Lord Lieutenant should appoint" in the capacity of Enumerators; and the same Act directed those "Enumerators" to "take an account in writing of the number of persons dwelling in Ireland, and of the sex, age and occupation of all such persons, distinguishing the persons born in the place, or parish, or county, where then living, and also an account of the number of inhabited and uninhabited houses, and of houses then building:—distinguishing those places and parishes, and parts of either, within the limits of any city, or borough, returning members to serve in Parliament;—and also of all such further particulars as by their instructions the Enumerators shall be directed to enquire into—such particulars and instructions having no reference to the religion of any person or persons.”

The latter special reservation puts us a little in mind of the old Roman objection to the numbering of the slaves: “ne nos enumerari cepissent.” But on the whole it was wise to exclude religious classification, as the main objects of the enquiry would certainly have been impeded, if the unfortunately too ready religious susceptibilities and jealousies of the various religious denominations in Ireland had once been awakened.

The Government of Ireland, using the latitude given it under the section just quoted from the Irish Census Act, added the following particulars to the Enquiry; viz., the names; relation to the head of the family in each instance; condition as to marriage and year of marriage; state of education; if a child, whether attending school; whether the parties could speak Irish; the names, age, sex, relationship and residence of all persons absent from their homes at the time of the Census; also, names, age, sex, relationship, and occupation of the members of each family who had died since the Census taken on the 6th June, 1841, together with the disease which caused death, and the season and year in which it occurred.

All these required particulars were included in “Form A,” or, as it was called, the “Family Return.”

Form B, the “House and Building Return,” was to describe the houses, in respect of their sizes, materials, and accommodation, and to state the number of distinct families living in each house. Curiously enough under this head of “Houses and Buildings,” the number of sick persons in each family on the night of the 30th of March, 1851, was to be included.

Form C, the proper “Sick-Return,” was to give names, ages, relationship, &c. &c., of all persons sick on the night before named. Forms D, E, F, I, and P, were to give accounts of the number of Lunatics and Idiots throughout Ireland on the same night. Also an account of the number of sick in the various public institutions, and of the deaths and coroners’ inquests from 1841 to 1851. Forms G, H, K, and L, were to enumerate the persons resident respectively in colleges and schools—military in barracks—prisoners, and pupils attending schools. And “Form O” was to give the number of emigrants from the 1st of May, 1851, to the 31st of December, 1855.

Having taken all measures that seemed requisite, and sent out all the forms—the copies of which amounted to more than a million and a half, the Commissioners found themselves enabled within little more than four months after the 30th of March, 1851, the day on which their Enumerators commenced operations, to more than satisfy section 9 of the Census Act, which required within twelve months an “Abstract of the Census of Ireland to be laid before both Houses of Parliament.”

After this their remaining publications proceeded in the following order, viz., : First, the exhibition of the Results of the Census by Townlands. The first county taken, viz., County Carlow, was presented to the Lord Lieutenant on the 15th of March, 1852, and the last, the County Tyrone, on the 30th November in the same year. In these papers, the area, population, houses, inhabited, uninhabited and building, together with the poor law valuation as far back as it existed, is given for every one of the 66,700 townlands of Ireland, the townlands being arranged by parishes and baronies ; and similar information was given for electoral divisions and Poor Law Unions. All this constituted Part I. of the Census.

Part II. embraced (by direction of the Lord Lieutenant) the Agricultural Statistics of Ireland for 1851 and 1852 ;—in continuation of the very admirable compilations of the same nature for the four preceding years, drawn up by Colonel Larcom. They shew, by Baronies and Poor Law Unions, the number of holdings in nine classes, according to the area of the farms, the acreage under crops, and the quantity of live stock in each class :—also the estimated value of the stock, average produce of the holdings, &c. &c.

Part III. published 30th of March, 1854, gave the “Status of Disease” in Ireland, on the night of the 30th March, 1851, together with a nosological chart of diseases “with their synonyms, popular and local names and Irish terms,”

Part IV., “Report on Ages and Education,” gave, by Provinces, Counties, Baronies, and Towns, the number and ages of the people, and of the per-centage of them who could read and write, read only, and who could neither read nor write, in 1841 and 1851 : also the number of schools and pupils attending ; and the number of the Irish-speaking population.

Part V. (volumes I. and II.) now presented, gives all statistics as to the “Deaths” of the People, and also contains “a Table of Cosmical Phenomena, Epizootics, Famines, and Pestilences in Ireland” throughout her history. And

Part VI. and last—now presented also—“has reference to the Area, Population, Habitations, House Accommodation, Families (and their Pursuits, Occupations, and Degrees of Education), Inmates of Public Institutions, &c. &c. of Ireland.” This part, the reader is aware, contains also the “General Report.”

The fearful interest that attaches to the circumstance of the extraordinary diminution of our population, brings us back to it again now ; and we proceed to extract the chier portions of the Commissioners’ general remarks and expositions concerning its main causes.

Supposing the immigration and emigration to have been equal, and that the increase of population by an excess of births over deaths, was in a similar ratio to that which had taken place in England and Wales during the last sixteen years, viz., 1·0036 per cent. per annum, the number of people in Ireland would have been 9,018,799 on the 30th of March, 1851. But as the last Census Returns have only afforded a population of 6,552,385, it is important to account (as far as is possible in the unfortunate absence of any general registration of births and deaths) for the deficiency in the population of nearly two and a-half millions, independent of the emigration alluded to. Inevitable deficiencies must result from any retrospective inquiry derived from the remnant of a population upon a certain day subsequent to the events to which it has reference. It is manifest that the greater the amount of destitution and mortality, and the greater the disruption of the social condition of the population in any walk of life, so much the more difficult will be the attempt to acquire subsequent information, and, consequently, the less will be the amount of recorded deaths derived through any household form; for not only were whole families swept away by disease, and large districts depopulated by emigration, or the inhabitants driven to seek refuge in the workhouse, but whole villages were effaced from off the land. Yet, notwithstanding these difficulties, in the way of a complete enumeration of death, and with a great decrease of population from non-births, owing to the diminution of marriages, as shown in our Report upon Ages and Education, and other causes which, during some portion of this period, sensibly affected the question—the recorded mortality for the five last years of the decennial period upon which it is our duty to report was as great as 985,366, or very nearly one million.

Concurrent with the foregoing state of famine and the disruption of the social condition of the people, pestilence came upon the nation in the following order:—Fever, Scurvy, Diarrhoea, and Dysentery, Cholera, Influenza, and Ophthalmia.

The total deaths from fever during the period between 1841 and 1851, amounted to the vast number of 222,029, in the proportion of 11951 males to a hundred females. Of these deaths, about one-half occurred in the rural districts; 22,464 in the civic districts; 50,408 in the permanent and temporary hospitals, and 34,644 in workhouses and auxiliary workhouses.

Under the head of Purpura and Scurvy were registered 167 deaths, the males much exceeding the females; and of these the great bulk was returned from hospitals and workhouses, upon medical authority, during the years from 1846 to 1850 inclusive. These deaths form, however, but a small proportion of those which absolutely occurred throughout the country, either directly or indirectly, as the consequence of Scurvy; and we have introduced the subject here, not so much because of the fatality of the disease, as on account of its forming so remarkable an illustration of the peculiar pestilential period from which the country suffered.

The first manifest decrease of Dysentery occurred in 1846; it then rose rapidly to its climax in the succeeding year, the numbers being 5,492 in the former, and 25,757 in the latter. In 1848, the deaths from dysentery amounted to 18,430, and from diarrhoea to 7,264; in 1849, both these diseases occurring in about the same proportions, produced death in 29,446 instances; and in 1850, the mortality from both these causes was 19,224. Even during the three months of the year 1851, prior to the taking of the Census, upwards of 5,000 persons were carried off by diarrhoea and dysentery.

The influence of the seasons was very strongly marked in these diseases, as well as in fever. As in the latter affection, so with this, spring was the time of greatest trial, 53,100 persons having died during that quarter; 36,398 perished in the summer season; and only 15,458 in the autumn, contrary to the usual opinion held respecting the prevalence and fatality of bowel affections during that season. In the winter quarter the deaths were 29,599.

The proportion of deaths from dysentery to all other diseases was 1 in 15, being the next most fatal after fever of the total class of zymotic or epidemic diseases, and the fourth most fatal from all causes—the scale being—fever, 1 in 6·1; consumption, 1 in 8·8; “infirmity, debility, and old age,” 1 in 10; dysentery, 1 in 15; marasmus and the diseases classed under that head, 1 in 20; convulsions (the frequent cause of death among infants and children), 1 in 32; diarrhoea, 1 in 33; small pox, 1 in 36; and starvation, 1 in 63. In comparison with the total deaths from all specified causes, dysentery prevailed most in the counties of Antrim, Kerry, Cork, Mayo, Galway county and town, Leitrim and Sligo—in fact, with the exception of Antrim, in the whole of that district which has been so frequently adverted to in the foregoing table as the location of blight, famine, and disease in former years, and which may be defined by a line drawn from Donegal Bay in the north to Cork Harbour in the south.

When the famine was most severely felt, and when fever and dysentery raged with the greatest violence, Asiatic Cholera again invaded the Continent of Europe, and advancing with rapid and fatally marked steps, soon approached the devoted island in the West, and reached our shores at the end of 1848. For some wise and inscrutable reason, upon which man can only speculate, it seemed good to the Great Disposer of events to mitigate considerably its fatality, compared with that of its first invasion, sixteen years before; for the returns only give as many as 35,989 deaths, in which the sexes were in the proportion of 98·57 males to 100 females, showing very nearly an equality of sexes. The period over which it extended was about eighteen months; and the number of cases recorded by the Board of Health, 45,698; of which 19,325 died, being 1 death in every 2·36 cases. However, as we mentioned at page 38, the records of that body are inapplicable to statistical calculations of this description. The disease was in all probability mitigated by the large amount of hospital accommodation, both permanent and temporary, in Ireland at the time of its outbreak, and by the wide-spread and effective organisation of medical relief then existing under the Central Board of Health. The remaining 16,664 deaths were returned to us upon the different forms issued from our office.

The disease broke out in December, 1848: rose to a considerable height in March, 1849, when the cases reported to the Board of Health were 3,292; and continued through the month of April, when they nearly trebled that number, up to May, when they amounted to 11,129. The disease rapidly declined the following month, and had nearly expended its violence by the end of the year—only 179 cases being reported in December. The deaths from Cholera during the year 1849, were 30,156: and although the disease spread into the following year the mortality was but 1,768. With the total deaths, however, from this disease, are included those from the affection in its endemic form, which occur from year to year. The most marked difference existed with respect to the influence of the seasons in the cholera return—thus in winter the deaths were but 1,861; in autumn, 6,206; in spring, 10,487; and in summer, 17,433. This visitation of cholera was characterised by the large number of children attacked, and by the number of cases in which præmonitory diarrhoea did not exist. Cholera prevailed most in the civic and least in the rural districts. Compared with their populations, the towns of Drogheda, Galway and Belfast, and the cities of Limerick, Waterford, Kilkenny and Cork suffered most.

Although Small-pox has decreased in Ireland, both in virulence and extent, since the publication of the Census Report in 1841, there was some increase of that disease during the pestilential period of 1847, '48, and '49: yet the deaths returned to us (amounting to 38,275 in ten years), are not, considering the present state of vaccination in this country, of sufficient amount to warrant the assertion that small-pox influenced the great mortality of which this introduction is the analysis, although during a portion of the period it prevailed epidemically, and was also very fatal in England. Dropsies likewise prevailed as the sequel of famine, fever and dysentery, during the latter years of the pestilential period.

An epidemic of INFLUENZA pervaded Great Britain in 1847 and 1848; where, although of brief duration, it was of unusual fatality. Its advent was marked in London by very peculiar atmospheric phenomena, which have been graphically described in the Report of the Registrar-General for that year. It existed nearly contemporaneously in Dublin during the December of 1847 and the January of 1848. The number of deaths attributed to this disease, as returned to us in March, 1851, does not exhibit, however, any very manifest annual difference for the five years preceding that date. The total deaths registered from influenza were 10,753, in the proportion of 85.5 females to 100 males. The first and second moieties of the imperfect decade extending from June, 1841, to March, 1851, exhibit a very marked difference; the first ending with the conclusion of 1845, numbering only 3,353 deaths, and the second from the beginning of 1846, to the end of the first quarter of 1851, affording as many as 7,400 deaths from this cause. 1,610 persons died from influenza in the workhouses. The disease prevailed most in the cities and large towns. In the winter and spring seasons the deaths were 7,214, and in summer and autumn but 3,539.

It does not appear that any other fatal epidemic disease influenced public health and mortality, beyond those specified during the years of famine and pestilence.

The diseases of the organs of sense—of sight and hearing in particular—although of very frequent occurrence, and largely influencing the welfare and happiness of mankind, do not, except when of a malignant character, prove fatal. Diseases of the organ of sight, however, occasionally become epidemic, especially in armies and schools, in gaols and workhouses, and wherever masses of the community are congregated together; they likewise spread even among rural populations throughout the open country. As the sequel to the great pestilential period described in the foregoing pages, Epidemic Ophthalmia burst forth, and from the years 1849 to 1852, both inclusive, as many as 118,835 cases occurred in the union workhouses of Ireland alone, besides vast numbers in the rural districts, as well as in the different cities and towns. The disease prevailed most during the warm weather of June, July, August, and September. It first attracted attention in January, 1849, during which year 18,812 cases occurred in the workhouses. In the following year the numbers reported were 27,200; and in 1851 they had risen to the height of 45,947—in the June of which year as many as 5,244 cases occurred. The disease prevailed most in the unions throughout the counties of Tipperary, Cork, Limerick, and Clare, as also at Athlone and Loughrea, and principally attacked children under fifteen years of age.

According to the report of the Poor Law Commissioners, who, for several years, published statistical accounts of the results of this disease—sight was partially injured in 1,925 cases; in 1,270 one eye was lost; and in 517 both eyes were destroyed. These facts will serve to account for the statement contained in our Report on the Status of Disease, that with the exception of Norway, Ireland presented, when the Census was taken in 1851, the largest proportion of blind, compared with its population, of any country in Europe of which the statistics were known. We there took the opportunity of suggesting the necessity of making some provision for this unhappy class of persons, beyond the asylum afforded by the workhouse.

The foregoing array of epidemic diseases has not exhausted the catalogue of calamities affecting human life or happiness, which occurred in Ireland during the years of famine and pestilence. In every country, even in England, with all its wealth—with its workhouses and its long established public institutions—deaths from starvation are annually recorded. The deaths registered in England from privation of food were, for many years, above 100 annually; and even in the year 1853, as many as seventy-eight persons perished there from want. In the Irish returns made in 1841, only 117 deaths were registered from starvation for the ten years prior to that period; but from thence, according to the registration made in 1851, deaths from this cause began notably to increase, from 187 in the year 1842, to 516 in 1845. After that period deaths attributed to starvation increased rapidly, so as to amount to 2,041 for the year 1846; in 1847 they reached the great height of 6,058, and in the two following years, 1848 and 1849, taken together, they amounted to 9,395. In 1850 they were even more than in 1846; and during the first quarter of 1851 as many as 652 deaths attributed to starvation were recorded. The total deaths returned to us under the head of Starvation amounted to 21,770, the sexes being in the proportion of 706 females to 100 males. As many as 333 of these occurred in workhouses, being persons received in a dying state, from the results of previous privation. Large, therefore, as the total deaths from this cause returned to us on the Census Forms may at first sight appear, a review of the past circumstances of the kingdom will, we think, strengthen the belief, that many more must have perished from disease remotely induced by privation during the years of famine and pestilence.

As coming into somewhat the same category with the foregoing might be, no doubt, enumerated a portion of the 133,923 deaths registered under the more diffuse title of "infirmity, debility, and old age," had we the means of distinguishing accurately the immediate or precise cause of death. These latter causes exhibited, like all others incidental to the years of famine and pestilence, remarkable annual changes, consequent, no doubt, upon scarcity of provisions, and all the calamitous results thereof, rising from 10,609 in 1845 to 23,285 in 1847, and again falling to 15,676 in 1850.

Mental disease bore its part in the list of calamities, upon which it is our duty to report; the receptions into Lunatic Asylums have greatly increased, and the deaths from insanity becoming greater from 1847 to 1850. Suicide alone rose from 83, in 1846 to 123 in 1848. Upon all these latter circumstances, we have reported in detail in the respective sections belonging thereto, and we have introduced them here only as forming items in the sum of that great calamity which befel this country during the years of famine and pestilence.

We already stated that with the exception of the partial agrarian disturbances in 1847, and the political disaffection in 1848, the country remained, considering its circumstances, remarkably free from increase of crime of a serious nature during the famine period. From our report upon the mortality in goals, it will be seen that the committals did not much increase from the year 1842 until 1847, but during that and the three following years they were greatly multiplied; and as a consequence thereof the gaols and prisons becoming crowded to excess, pestilential diseases broke out in these institutions, and increased the receptions into the hospitals thereof from 3,903; and the deaths from 72, in 1845—to the receptions amounting to 17,451, and the deaths to 1,406, in 1849.

In the year 1849 the Court for the Sale of Irish Incumbered Estates commenced its operations, and from the October of that year, during the six following years, about 2,500,000 acres of land, producing the sum of £15,706,324, were disposed of. This we allude to in enumerating the events of the great transition period which, together with the foregoing, has so largely assisted in that social revolution brought about by the failure of the potato crop.

In addition to the other social calamities of the period, and partially contingent upon them, was the scarcity of fuel, owing to the difficulty of saving turf during some of the wet seasons; and as years of misery came to be numbered, the clothing of the people either altogether failed in many districts, or remained in pledge unredeemed from previous years. This latter source of suffering was, when it became known, in a great measure relieved by the benevolence of the ladies of England.

There is one matter incidentally recorded in the foregoing extracts, which, although not immediately germane to our subject, we cannot help taking note of in passing. We allude to what is said about deaths from "starvation." In the paragraph on that subject we find these remarkable statements. "Even in England with all its wealth—with its workhouses and its long established public institutions—deaths from starvation are annually recorded. The deaths registered in England from starvation were for many years ABOVE 100 ANNUALLY. In the Irish returns of 1841 ONLY 117 deaths from starvation were registered FOR THE TEN YEARS PRECEDING !

"After that period (namely, when Poor Laws came to be established), deaths from starvation INCREASED RAPIDLY ! In 1842 they were 187 ; in 1845 they were 516 !!"

It will be in the recollection of many of our readers how strong and confident were the prophecies of those who aided in forcing poor laws upon us in Ireland, that after their establishment there would be no more deaths from starvation, such as were said to occur under the previously existing system of voluntary charity. Yet there was the experience of England to the contrary, her deaths of the class in question amounting as we have seen, to one hundred annually. And our own sad experience now shows us, and the fact is proclaimed and established by the Census Commissioners of 1851, that in the first year of the working of Poor Laws in this country, the year 1842, the deaths from starvation had increased from the average of little more than eleven annually, to 187 for that year alone, and in 1845, also for that year alone, (a year previous to the great distress), to no less than 516!!!

It should be repeated again and again, an annual average of eleven deaths before Poor Laws in Ireland—an annual amount increasing in a ratio that defies all average calculation afterwards—187 the first year after establishment of Poor Laws, 516 the fourth year after !!!

Truly the late Mr. O'Connell, and those who with him warned the country against Poor Laws, have had a melancholy justification for their unpopular counsellings.

We now proceed to give a few miscellaneous facts and statistics of interest, collected here and there from the Report, before approaching the most interesting and important consideration of all, namely, that of the causes, so far as traceable, of the terrible famine of 1846 and subsequent years, with a view to ascertain what are our chances of escaping a recurrence of such a calamity.

The decrease of the rural population of Leinster, between 1841 and 1851, was in the proportion of 45 to the square mile of her entire area, and of 58 to the square mile of arable land. Ulster decreased 48 in the first proportion, and 126 in the second; Munster 57 and 114; and Connaught 60 and 145. The decrease therefore of the rural population of Ireland was 52 on the square mile of the entire area, and 110 on that of the arable land of the country, with a small fraction in either case.

The decrease of the combined rural and civic population was for Leinster 39 persons per square mile of the entire area, Ulster 44, Munster 57, and Connaught 60—giving for the whole of Ireland, a proportion of about 50 to the square mile of the entire area.

The next table we give is compiled partly from the Irish Census Report and partly from that for Great Britain, and shows a comparison of mournful interest.

Population and Number of Houses in Great Britain and Ireland respectively in the Census of 1841 and that of 1851.

Census of	GREAT BRITAIN.			IRELAND.
	Population.	Inhabited Houses.	Uninhabited.	Population.	Inhabited Houses.	Uninhabited.
1841 .	18,658,372	3,465,987	188,141	8,175,124	1,328,379	62,908
1851 .	21,121,967	3,670,192	166,735	6,552,385	1,046,223	65,923
	Increase 2,463,595	Increase 204,205	Decrease 21,406	Decrease 1,622,739	Decrease 282,156	Increase 12,035

We have seen that the Census Commissioners calculate that had our population increased in the same ratio as the British, we should have had 9,018,799 in 1851, instead of 6,552,385. The real deficiency of our population therefore in the latter Census, was 2,466,414, nearly exactly the same amount as that of the increase of the British !!

The "Emigration from Ireland," is quoted from the Emigration Commissioners' Annual Reports; in which, while every effort at accuracy has been made, it is at the same time confessed that there can be "little doubt" that their estimates are below the truth. One simple cause for this is, that there are no means of ascertaining how many Irish went from any British port, save only Liverpool. The following table gives, (with this reservation), the number of Irish Emigrants in the ten years to December, 1851, with a continuation down to 31st December, 1855, and their respective destinations :—

Years.	United States.	British America.	Australia.	All other Places	Total
Part of 1841	11,524	1,755	3,078	19	16,376
1842	48,300	39,442	987	7	88,686
1843	23,420	13,578	509	2	37,509
1844	37,269	16,484	520	18	54,289
1845	50,206	24,713	"	50	74,969
1846	63,023	37,888	"	5	100,965
1847	116,668	97,392	1,118	1	215,444
1848	153,689	22,724	1,840	6	178,159
1849	176,643	30,735	7,041	6	214,425
1850	180,642	24,465	4,045	2	209,054
3 months of 1851	43,091	1,033	747	"	44,871
Totals	910,470 or 73·4 per cent	310,209 or 25·0 per cent	19,944 or 1·6 per cent	114	1,240,737
9 months of 1851	172,519	28,279	4,050	2	204,850
1852	192,535	21,617	6,286	10	220,428
1853	156,970	22,402	12,746	502	192,620
1854	111,096	22,922	16,203	3	150,222
1855	57,164	6,251	15,500	84	78,999
Total from 1st April, 1851, to 31st Dec. 1855	690,283 or 31·4 per cent	101,471 or 12 per cent	54,764 or 6·5 per cent	601 or 0·1 per cent	847,119
Grand Total from June, 1841, to 31st December, 1855	1,600,753 or 76·7 per cent	411,680 or 19·7 per cent	74,708 or 3·6 per cent	715	2,087,856

The proportions per cent, at each age, were as follows :—

Under one year...	1·14	30 years & under 40,	11·18
1 year & under 10,	11·76	40 years & under 50,	6·99
10 years & under 20,	25·97	50 years & under 60,	2·77
20 years & under 30,	39·75	60 years & upwards,	0·74

We doubt not that several of our readers will, on perusal of the foregoing table, be struck with the disproportion between the numbers of those who emigrated to the United States and to British North America respectively. We see that in the ten years ending 1851, upwards of seventy-three per cent. of the entire Emigration went to the United States, while only twenty-five per cent. went to British North America, or, taking the Australian Colonies into account, not more than 26·6 per cent. altogether to British possessions. But the disproportion appears still greater in the short period from the 1st April, 1851, to the 31st of December, 1855, when the per-centage to the United States rose to 81·4 per cent., while that to British North America fell to 12 per cent.; or, taking in as before the amount that went to Australia, only 18·5 per cent.

altogether, to British possessions. In round numbers, out of a total ascertained emigration from Ireland during the period 1851-1855, of 2,000,000, fully 1,600,000 went to a foreign country and only the remainder to our own colonies.

Thereby hangs a tale and we fear a significant one—significant of the past—significant in the present, and not without some degree of dangerous significance for the future. We announce no new fact and have to maintain no contested position, in saying that the vast majority of this emigration went away with bitter feelings towards England. The foundation for these feelings is one thing—the fact of their existence and operation is quite another. The former is debatable, and has been debated in every spirit and every point of view; the latter is frankly or reluctantly, but universally admitted, and even without an attempt at qualification. Those who have tasked themselves to analyse the causes of this state of things do not hesitate to say, that the traditions of wrong and misgovernment, unhappily rife among our people, and embittered by personal sufferings under the general impoverishment of the country, the distracted state of the relations between Landlord and Tenant, and the stinging sense of Parliamentary and newspaper insults to Irish popular opinion and convictions, political and religious—(all three of which evils have come to be considered inevitable incidents of English rule)—have had the climax of bitterness capped by the stern compulsion of exile in a famine-driven emigration, and that the result of the whole is a deadly aversion and hostility to England and all belonging to her! To go to Canada, or other British possessions, was to go under the hated British domination once more: whereas to go to the United States was to become citizens of an independent country—the growing and already formidable commercial rival of England in time of peace—her intrepid, and on more than one occasion, successful antagonist in war—and in their imaginations likely to be one of the chosen agents of Divine Providence in the final chastisement they believe to be in reserve for the country on which they charge all their woes!

The proper and regular course doubtless for this paper now to take would be, to proceed to set out with Poor-Law-Commissioner-like precision, table after table of statistics and special detail after special detail in due succession, bearing upon the various points of the Census Report. But we cannot bind ourselves to any other order than that suggested to us by our own estimate of the comparative importance of the various topics touched upon in its text, or in the appendices. Accordingly, we for the present pass by everything else to come to the hope for the future which is therein held out to us.

This is chiefly done in Part V. vol. 1, of the "Report on Tables of Deaths," wherein at page 256 we find the following:—

Improvement in the habits of the lower orders, and a higher education amongst the agricultural classes, are chiefly requisite to effect a change in the condition of the people. By this they would ultimately be raised in the scale of civilization, and by learning to utilize all the sources of subsistence which nature has so lavishly placed within their reach, the fatal consequences would be averted which must ensue to a people who trust for life only to one species of food, and when that fails are liable to perish from famine. But to effect any sudden alteration in the dietary of a people is a matter of greater difficulty than to effect a change in either their religious or their political institutions—the former under excitement may become as contagious as an epidemic; and the latter be enforced by the strong arm of power: while a revolution in diet, especially in Ireland where the accustomed food was easily raised and comparatively palatable, and moreover had become the basis of habits so firmly fixed as to influence the entire social condition of a people, required even more than the stern necessity of want, before it could be accomplished, or the inhabitants be brought to relish any other description of food.

We have, however, reason to believe that a taste for the substitutes offered has been gradually generated. Upon this subject the Commissioners of Health published the following remarks in their report upon the year 1851: "It has often been desired that the people of Ireland could be induced to turn from the potato to grain as their food, as tending to produce improvement in their habits, and as rendering them less liable to suffer from periodic famines. All attempts to effect this have hitherto failed: however, the knowledge that they have now acquired of the very superior nutritious qualities of oatmeal, and its price continuing to bear such a relation to the cost of potatoes as to render its consumption often more economical than that of the potato, will, it would seem to us, eventually and certainly lead to the desired end."—This is confirmed by the more general use among the people of Indian meal, and their improved knowledge of its mode of preparation, together with the fact of the greater consumption of bread stuffs in Ireland within the last few years, as compared with those before the famine.

Notwithstanding the fearful ordeal through which Ireland has passed, thus briefly and imperfectly sketched—an ordeal to which modern history can produce no parallel—we have good reason to believe that the country has improved in health, increased in wealth, and progressed in energy, since the recent calamity that seemed to threaten its very existence; the various social changes forced into action at that period being the means most fitted ultimately to ameliorate the social condition. The great surplus mass of the population—surplus not in proportion to the superficies of the country but from its unequal distribution, has been reduced. The system of minute division of land, the acknowledged source of perennial distress and periodic famine, has been happily got rid of, for though it extended cultivation in some degree, yet it increased at the same time the class of pauper holdings, now rapidly giving place to the large sized grazing farms, which from time immemorial have produced the cattle exports, the great source of wealth to this country; and finally, the facilities of the Incumbered Estates Act have relieved the country from expensive and almost endless litigation, and placed land within the power of a comparatively solvent proprietary, though it may have produced some temporary and individual hardship.

In conclusion, we may say, in the language of Sir Charles Trevelyan (in his Irish Crisis), that “unless we are much deceived, posterity will trace up to that famine the commencement of a salutary revolution in the habits of a Nation long singularly unfortunate; and will acknowledge in this, as in many other occasions, supreme wisdom has produced permanent good out of transient evil.”

The often-quoted saying of Talleyrand tells us that words were invented to conceal our thoughts. We are anxious to express ours upon the subject matter of the extract just given from the Census Report; and therefore we shall use as few words as possible in so doing—reserving till later any extended comment that there may be reason for making.

Passing the general and unexplained proposition at the commencement of the extract, we come to the second in order, namely, that our people would “by learning to utilize all the sources of subsistence lavishly placed by nature within their reach, be enabled to avert the fatal consequences of trusting for life to one species of food,” and that a species so liable to failure.

Nature has abundantly supplied Ireland with flocks, and herds, and fields of grain, and thus (so far as Nature’s operation goes), has “lavishly placed those sources of subsistence within the people’s reach.” How are they to “utilize those sources?”

Next arise the questions:—Why had the Potato “become the basis of habits so firmly fixed as to influence the entire social condition” of our people? How is it shown that they “could not be brought to relish” any other description of food? And where and how can it be shown that “all attempts at turning the people from the potato to grain as their food, have hitherto failed?”

Perhaps we should differently phrase the last question, and ask to be told what, and how many attempts have been made towards this desirable object? There may doubtless have been in some few private cases something of the kind attempted, but assuredly nowhere on a large scale.

The potato became the "basis" as it were of our peoples' social condition, simply because it was the cheapest and easiest reared food. The peasant planted it without cost, and in ordinary years the produce, which is well known to be nearly three times as great to the acre as that of any other vegetable of common use, not only supplied him and his family with food, but ordinarily left him a small surplus to sell, and thereby to procure the means of buying clothes or other necessities for his family. Meantime the skins and other refuse of the potato fed the pig, who "paid the rent"—i. e., the sale of which in proper season, was the peasant's chief means of meeting his landlord's demands.

All other descriptions of food are more costly to rear and not so prolific in the yield by two-thirds. The Irish peasant, in the vast majority of instances had a heavy rent upon him which, required his utmost efforts and utmost economy of resources to meet; and unhappily the instances were very many in which on the least apparent improvement of his condition, another turn was given to the rent-screw, and the whole value of the improvement taken from him. Thus, and thus alone, did it come about that he had to incur the danger of "the fatal consequences of trusting for life to one description of food." Thus was he compelled to incur that danger. Thus, when the potato failed, did those "fatal consequences" come upon him and his fellows. Hæc fonte, derivata clades!

The Irish peasant will "relish" good food as well as his betters, when he can get it to eat. He has no sentimental attachment to the potato, and when at all able will even go to the extravagance of buying a herring, to give it a "relish."

It was one of Sir Robert Peel's pompous plausibilities about Ireland, to talk of "teaching the Irish people to eat better food." When he used to utter this in the House of Commons ore rotundo, and with elaborate gesture and attitude, and to look around solemnly to receive the applause with which solemn humbug is so often received in that House, especially where its tendency is to excuse the legislator's own neglect or contravention of duty, it was hard to say which feeling most predominated in the minds of Irishmen worthy of the name—whether the feeling of indignation or of contempt.

“Why don’t the people eat bread and butter rather than starve?” asked the little princess when told of a wasting famine. “Why do not the Irish people eat beef and mutton and bacon and bread instead of bad potatoes?” expresses the exact parallel of the little Princess’s political economy, and the exact and real meaning of Sir Robert Peel’s plausibility.

We can go but a very little way with the Census Commissioners in their congratulations on the “improvement in health, increase in wealth, and progress in energy,” of the country “since the recent calamity.” Energy was not really wanting in Ireland, but was kept down and discouraged amongst our agricultural classes by the unrestrained powers of exaction in the hands of unscrupulous agents and landlords—we advisedly put them in this order, as of all classes from whom Ireland has suffered, the “Land-agents,” with of course some, or several, noble exceptions, were far the worst. Energy was repressed amongst the trading and commercial classes by the general impoverishment of the country, the want of a good home-market, the impossibility of rivalling in foreign or in English markets the powerful and long established capitalists of England, and the natural reaction upon those classes of the poverty of their rack-rented countrymen on the land.

“Health” has certainly improved, because famine and pestilence have for the time ceased. So much for health physical; social health is not much improved, nor can it become so till the disturbing causes—the distracted state of the relation between landlord and tenant, the anomaly of the Church establishment, and the glaring defects and evil of the poor law, are removed by remedial legislation.

“Wealth” has increased in a small ratio, but very little beyond what the war-prices for our agricultural produce have occasioned. The mass of the people are at bottom as poor as ever.

We must also differ with the Census Commissioners as to “the means most fitted ultimately to ameliorate the social condition of the people.” We cannot consider as such “most fit” means, the violent reduction of our population and the increase of large grazing farms in the place of their homesteads. The “means” in our minds “most fitted to ameliorate” their social condition would be those indicated in the last paragraph but one—that which treats of “social health.” If we add to these the more frequent and longer residences in Ireland of the owners of the soil and, thereby the spending in Ireland of a larger proportion than at present of the monies raised from Ireland, we have stated our “means,” and confidently leave them to the judgment of the reader.

The quotation from Sir Charles Trevelyan—that “admirable administrator” (!) in whose department occurred some of the most grievous blunders of the late war—brings not a little to mind Pope’s description of the care for the poor manifested by high dignitaries in his time,— “Lo ! the good Bishop, with a pious air Admits—and leaves them—Providence’s care !”

Having now with as much brevity as the subject admitted of glanced through the points suggested by the Census Commissioners for congratulation as to the present and hope for the future, we shall for a few moments put their report aside, in order to be the less embarrassed in expressing our own views.

Parliamentary and newspaper plausibilities and platitudes, no matter by what high authority, or with what amount of solemn and oracular pomposity given to the world—no matter how taken up and propagated—should not blind the man of sense and heart to the real question at issue, and its only real solution. They should not, and on calm and full and mature deliberation they surely cannot, blind him to the fact, that “prosperity” is not compatible with the export of food of which the hapless producers cannot retain their needful share ; that a system fraught with such anomalies as those in 1822, 1847, and other of our famine-years, when vessels bearing the oatmeal charitably subscribed in England for the starving Irish, were crossed upon their passage by vessels bearing away large freights of corn and live-stock from Ireland ;—that a state of things which, in the endeavor to reduce to practice the pet theory or nostrum of the day, of turning Ireland into the grazing and dairy-farm of England, must ever come in collision with physiological laws—ever be in antagonism to the natural increase of population, and have its best and only prospect of even temporary success, in the hideous chances of a famine-driven emigration,—that such a system and such a state of things cannot be held to furnish any sound or just grounds for congratulations and hope ; but rather must appear to involve a monstrous contravention of the beneficent designs of the Creator !

There is no question about the momentary ease of the present time. The war-prices and war-expenditure in a country where low prices and every-day-diminishing expenditure and increasing money-drains had previously been the rule—the much reduced land and labor-competition—(reduced by the removal of more than two millions of the laboring class, by death or emigration)—these circumstances, coupled with the plentiful harvest, have combined to give, as we say, a momentary ease. Transitory themselves, their effects cannot be otherwise than transitory also. And even while in full vigor of operation, there is a sad amount of destitution and misery in many parts of the land!

We have no intention nor desire of evading the subject of the Encumbered Estates' Act, and its actual and prospective operation upon the fortunes of Ireland. The monetary statistics belonging to this subject, as given in a recently published return from the "Statistics-office" of the Encumbered Estates' Court, may be summed up pretty much as follows, in round numbers, viz :—

Total amount of funds distributed up to }	£16,500,000
the present time ... .. }
Funds in hands of the court ... ..	1,400,000
Provisional Credits, &c., not yet paid in ...	300,000
Total ... ..	<hr/> £18,200,000 <hr/>

A small stimulus has been given to the internal circulation of the country, by this redistributing process, though not by any means to the extent represented by those figures, inasmuch as there is no inconsiderable deduction for monies paid to mortgagees out of Ireland. But the chief effect is, that a portion of the land of the country—not a large portion as yet, but one that is increasing and will increase—is being set free from the trammels of old encumbrances which tied up the hands of owners, even where the latter had the greatest desire to improve.

Four chief benefits were predicated of the working of the Encumbered Estates' Act, by the more sanguine of its advocates in this country. It was, according to them, to have for one of its directest consequences, the creation of a class of small landed proprietors in Ireland. Secondly, it was at least in so far to diminish absenteeism, and to cause rents not only to be spent at home, but to be spent in improving the land. Thirdly, it was, by substituting generally a solvent for an insolvent proprietary, to do away with one of the great causes for rack-renting and landlord-exaction, and thus to give the tenantry of Ireland a chance of being allowed to hold at a profit rent, and an encouragement to lay out, instead of hoarding in savings' banks, &c., what little money-capital they might have. Fourthly, it was (by the operation of the three foregoing postulates, and by that of the general improvement of Ireland resulting therefrom) to increase the employment and the remuneration of labor.

The first of these benefits has not taken place to any perceptible extent, and if it should there is nothing to prevent the occurrence of what has been and is every day happening in England, namely, the gradual absorption of small properties by purchase and sale, compelled or voluntary, into the larger estates of their rich neighbours. The second has been to a small, and very small, extent achieved in one of its branches, that of a reduction (infinitesimal,) of the amount of rental in the hands of absentees. In the other branch the progress made is also very small—inasmuch as with the very best intentions in the world a man cannot, unless a large capitalist, lay out money on land immediately after the heavy outlay for its purchase.

The owners of the properties in reference to which the financial operations already quoted of the Encumbered Estates Commissioners have taken place, were of course to that extent relieved of embarrassments, or have had more solvent parties substituted for them. But whatever the reason may be the "improvements" so confidently anticipated have proved but very partial indeed, save in the direction least favorable to the tenantry, namely, in that of an increase of pasturage instead of an increase of cultivation; and there being of course nothing in the Encumbered Estates' Act (nor in any other) to restrict the power of ejection of tenantry, or in any way to compel a moderation of rack rents, the one has continued to occur and the other continued to be wanting though nearly as sorely required as ever.

There is a fact of no little discouraging significance which is beginning to be generally known, and therefore may with the less reluctance be mentioned here. Lands that had been freed wholly or partially from incumbrances are beginning to be charged again, and the instances of this are rapidly multiplying. We trust some Irish member of Parliament will in the approaching session, move for a return on this subject, and cause the truth to be made known free of exaggerations, or concealments. It must be evident that if this process goes on to any large extent—and considering the whole social and economic condition of Ireland, we see nothing even to impede such a result—the so-called “land revolution” will fall sadly short indeed of what was predicted of it.

We have not space here to extend our brief review of its operation further than to say, in reference to the farmer class, that no security being provided by the act, or as we have said by any other, for the enjoyment by the farmers of the fruits of their industry and enterprise, they naturally abstain from risking the loss of their little capital by investing it in “improvements” which they may not call their own; and the additional employment that the making, entertaining, &c. of those improvements would give to the labouring population, is thus necessarily withheld.

Thus not as regards any one of the four points stated on which the Encumbered Estates’ Act has been held up as affording good promise for the future, can we see reason to concur with its more sanguine applauders,—neither as regards the increase of small proprietors in fee—the sensible diminution of absenteeism, and increase of home expenditure,—the substitution upon a large and permanent scale of solvent for insolvent proprietors, with the collateral advantage of a less rent pressure on the tenantry in consequence of the more independent circumstances of their new or emfranchised landlords,—nor finally, as regards a substantial increase in the employment and pay of labor. A temporary and transitory improvement is all that we can allow, or that can with any amount of ingenuity be shown to exist. In short, there is a “momentary ease” as we have before said, but not to a degree to warrant any great amount of congratulation, and indeed not such as to give solid grounds for better hope in the future. To us that future appears overclouded, and for the considerations that follow.

Taking the simple fact of the inevitable increase of population, we cannot see how their renewed pressure upon the land is to be obviated. If the available land of the country has been increased by reclamation, it has been so far as the people are concerned more than proportionably diminished by the quantity thrown into “grazing farms.” There is no symptom of the increase and spreading of manufactures to give employment to the surplus agriculturists. There is no suggestion how the means are to be supplied to or acquired by the people, for the purchase of that "better description of food," which they are exhorted and lectured to eat. There has been no such influx of English capital or liberation of Irish as to provide funds for the larger and more general employment and remuneration of labor, and no encouragement nor even common security held out to the farmer classes to spend money in making improvements. In fact, as the law of landlord and tenant now stands, it would be insanity for them so to act. Finally, there is absolutely nothing whatever to prevent the recurrence of the extreme subdivision of the soil, whenever and wherever the gaps in population are filled up. For more than a century there has been an active and most stringent legislation directed against "sub-letting," but it has gone on notwithstanding, as in the absence of other sources of subsistence the "surplus" population, as it has been called, had to have recourse to the parceling out of the land.

We now turn awhile from considerations of the present and speculations on the future to some views of the past, brought under attention by the Census Commissioners, chiefly in their "report on deaths." Before quoting, as we intend to do, from the text of the interesting and valuable "first volume" of this Report (Part V. of the Commissioners' blue books) we think it might be the directest way to give a general idea of the labors and research of those gentlemen, if we lay before the reader a kind of summary of the elaborated contents of that volume:—

TABLE OF CONTENTS (PART V. VOL. I.)

SECTION I.

- Early Records of Pestilence.
- The Pre-Christian Period.
- The Historic Period.
- The Scientific Do.
- Origin of Written Irish History.
- Heroic or Bardic Period.
- Chronology of the Irish Annals
- Annals of Tighernach, Ulster.
- Clonmacnoise, Innisfallen.
- Chronicon Acotorum.
- Annals of Kilronan, Connaught, Boyle, and of the Four Masters.
- The Book of Conquests.
- Irish Version of Nennius.
- Annals of Multifernán, Glynn and Camden.
- (Then follow six or eight others, besides "Chronicles" and "Acta.")
- Richard Staniburst's Writings, Holinshed.

County Histories and Annals.

Irish Physicians and Hospitals, &c.

Dublin Bills of Mortality.

Meteorological Records.

Tables of "Cosmical Phenomena."

Pestilences and Famines, twenty-six here enumerated, including the modern Influenza, Cholera, and Potato Rot.

The last General Potato Failure.

Famine and Pestilence, 1846-50.

(Twenty-one items under this head)

SECTION II.

Analysis of the Table of "Cosmical Phenomena."

"Meteorology, Weather and Seasons."

(Eleven items under this head.)

SECTION III.

Reports on Deaths in Hospitals, Infirmaries, and Asylums.

(Eleven Tables under this head)

SECTIONS IV. V. VI.

Deaths in Prisons, &c.

SECTION VII.

Analysis of Tables of Pestilence and Deaths, (65 pages)

SECTION VIII.

Forty Pages of Special Sanitary Report on Dublin.

The foregoing list of topics, with a not very long appendix and index, occupy 560 pages of a blue book, much of which is in small print.

The kind of "History of the Potato" which is given at page 237 (et seq.) has interest in itself, but more in the light it throws upon the condition of our people at various times.

History dates the introduction of the potato into the British Isles at about 1586—and Youghal in the South of Ireland, the residence of its introducer, Sir Walter Raleigh, is named as the spot whereon it was first cultivated about, or prior to the year 1602. But as the estates of Raleigh passed to the Boyle family in that year, the potato must have been planted before that period. Clusius, the botanist of Leyden, says the potato was cultivated in Italy prior to that date, and Ouvier denied that Europe derived the potato from Virginia. Sir Robert Southwell, President of the Royal Society, stated at one of its meetings in 1693, that potatoes had been introduced into Ireland by his grand-father, who first had them from Sir Walter Raleigh. From Youghal the potato subsequently spread over the country. But at what time the potato became a staple article of the food of the Irish people is a question upon which historic evidence is not so clear. The subject of the early history of the potato engaged the philosophical mind of Sir Joseph Banks half a century since ; * yet notwithstanding the great learning and research which he brought to bear upon the subject, it is still surrounded with so much difficulty as to partake of the nature of speculation.

For a long time after the introduction of the potato, corn, peas, and beans, and, possibly, parsnips, still formed part of the food of the people ; and from the researches which we have made it is evident that its cultivation was very irregular throughout the country, some localities, especially in Ulster, having only adopted it generally within the memory of the past generation. It was grown in gardens as a rarity, used at table as a delicacy, and described by herbalists as an introduced exotic ; but we do not find any warrant for believing that it was at all cultivated by the people as a general article of food until from the end of the seventeenth to the beginning of the eighteenth century. It is asserted " that potatoes were ordinary food in the south of Ireland before the time of the Commonwealth," because they were introduced at a supper-table ; † but in 1663 Mr. Boyle exhibited some specimens to the Royal Society of London, and read before that body a letter from his gardener at Youghal (the cradle of the potato), in which he describes this esculent as " very good to pickle for winter salads, and also to preserve. They are to be gathered in September, before the frost doth take them ;" and, after describing the best mode of culture, he continues—" I could speak in the praise of the root, what a good and profitable thing it is, and might be to a commonwealth, could it generally be experienced, as the inhabitants of your town can manifest the truth of it." ‡ It would appear from this passage that the potato had not then become an article of common food amongst the Irish, even around the locality where it was first cultivated ; we are, therefore, the more surprised at finding Sir William Petty, in his Political Anatomy of Ireland (a work believed to have been written in 1672, although not published until 1691), enumerating among the articles of food, " potatoes from August till May ; muscles, cockles, and oysters near the sea ; eggs, and butter made very rancid by keeping in bogs."* The present great historian of England would lead us to believe that the potato was cultivated in Ireland to such an extent as to influence the character and feelings of the people, so early as 1689; and he certainly has authority for the statement; † for in Tom Durfey's "Irish Hudibras," published in the May of that year, the esculent is frequently referred to; and after the arrival of William III., the natives are said to have been prevented enjoying their "Banni-clabber [thick milk] pottados." John Dunton, likewise, in his "Conversation in Ireland," published in 1699, describes the Irish cabin in his day as having behind it "the garden, a piece of ground sometimes of half an acre or an acre, and in this is the turf-stack, their corn, perhaps two or three hundred sheaves of oats, and as much peas, the rest of the ground is full of their dearly-beloved potatoes, and a few cabbages." Again, describing the habits of the people generally from Galway to Kilkenny, he says, "Bonny-Clabber and Mulahaan, alias sowre milk and choak-cheese, with a dish of potatoes boiled, is their general entertainment;" and in the "keens" of that day, allusion is made to the "pigs and potato garden." Moreover, John Haughton, who published his "Husbandry and Trade" in 1689, when describing the growth of the potato in Ireland, says, it has "thrived very well and to good purpose, for in their succeeding wars, when all the corn above ground was destroyed, this supported them; for the soldiers, unless they had dug up all the ground where they grew, and almost sifted it, could not extirpate them." And then he adds, "now they begin to spread all the kingdom over." The potato was not adopted equally early in all parts of the country, for in districts of Ulster, not more than two generations back, potatoes were seldom used after harvest. ‡ The potato was introduced from Ireland into Lancashire about 1633, and that was the first district of England in which it was "extensively cultivated. It was there the disease styled the curl first made its appearance in 1778; before which period it was altogether unknown." § "Without, however, extending this notice of the potato to too great a length, by quoting the various authorities bearing upon the subject, or critically analyzing the ingenious speculations of writers, we may remark that,—as all modern experience has proved the potato to be one of the most fickle in its growth of any vegetable cultivated to the same extent, the most likely to suffer from atmospheric vicissitudes, and the most liable to

* Transactions of the Horticultural Society, Vol. I., for 1812 ; read May 7th, 1805.

† See " An Account of an Irish Quarter," printed in 1654, and quoted by T. Crofton Croker, in his " Popular Songs of Ireland, with Introductions and Notes," where several authorities relating to this subject are quoted. Gerrard, the English herbalist of 1597, is one of the first authors who alludes to the potato, and after him Richard Bradley, F.R.S., in his " Planting and Gardening," published in 1634. At a meeting of the Royal Society, in March, 1662, a letter was read, containing a proposal for " preventing famine, by dispersing potatoes throughout all parts of England ;"—this subject is alluded to in Evelyn's Sylva. Threlkeld, the Irish Botanist, described the plant in 1726, and says we had it through Thomas Herriott. See also, upon the subject of the potato, an article on " The Food of the Irish," in the Dublin University Magazine for February, 1854, and Mr. M'Adams' learned paper in the Quarterly Journal of Agriculture for 1834-5.

‡ See Birch's History of the Royal Society.

* The subject of this "bog butter," alluded to by Petty, and also mentioned in the Irish Hudibras, has been as yet but partially investigated, although large quantities of it have been found, and many specimens preserved in museums. From what we have been able to collect respecting it, there is no reason for doubting the assertions of Petty and Durfey, that this butter was buried at the end of the seventeenth century. See a curious account of the Tallow dikes in Lucas Jacobson Debes' "Description of the Islands and Inhabitants of Fœrroe." 1676. For farther information on this subject, see also Mr. Wilde's paper in the Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, for 1856.

† Macaulay's History of England, Vol. III., p. 158, and Vol. IV., p. 110.

‡ M'Skimin's "History of Carrickfergus."

§ Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia.

disease—had it been cultivated in Ireland to such an extent as to constitute the most material portion of the food of the people, its failures would have been noticed in history, contemporaneously with those other losses of food which have been so frequently recorded since the middle of the seventeenth century. As already stated, the potato was introduced into Ireland at the end of the sixteenth century; but we have no proof that it was so extensively planted as to become a staple article of human food, and to displace corn to any extent, until towards the end of the seventeenth century. The first great destruction of the potato crop occurred in the winter of 1739—40, and was attributed to the early, very severe, and long-continued frost of that period. There had been a very wet summer and autumn in 1739; and although the frost, no doubt, was one of the chief causes of its destruction, yet we are inclined to think that the potato failures in 1739, '40, and 1741, were not altogether attributable to the severity of the winters. A century ago, imprevi- dence and bad agriculture were more marked than in the present day; and thus, when the great frost broke out in the November of 1739, and which increased in intensity during the following month, it found all the potato crop not already used, in the ground, either undug, or in pits with such a loose covering of earth as was penetrable to the frost; and thus it was said that the potato crop was destroyed in one night. Three hundred thousand people are stated to have perished of famine resulting from this failure. Even in 1741 the people were cautioned against eating potatoes, which were believed to be diseased, and likely to produce disease in man.

It appears then that whatever may be the supposed depraved taste of our population in our own times, the Irish people of former days required no lecturing, nor scourging by famine and pestilence, to induce them to eat other food besides the potato. "For a long time after the introduction of the potato," says the extract we have just given, "corn, peas, and beans, and, possibly, parsnips, still formed part of the food of the people." It appears too that whereas theorists of the present day are very anxious to get rid of the potato—(we have heard and believe that at a meeting some years ago of a certain society in Ireland, much in favor with rich agriculturists, a potato plant was exhibited labelled "The Upas-tree of Ireland"! )—there were writers equally forward to recommend it formerly, as in the letters alluded to in the notes to the foregoing extract—letters written in 1662 and 1663 to the Royal Society of London.

The eighteenth century brought the potato into general use, for the simple reason that the impoverishment of the people and of the country diminished their consumption of other food. For a long time Irish industry, aided by the goodness of her soil and climate, maintained a stout fight against the ravaging effects of civil war and legalized plunder; resisting even the effects of Strafford's misgovernment in the early part of the seventeenth century, of the wasting civil wars in the middle of it, and the ungenerous and cruel legislation against her commerce in Charles II's reign.

"I have discouraged," wrote Strafford to his master, Charles I. in July, 1636, "the clothing trade of Ireland, and will discourage it, in regard it would trench not only on the clothing trade of England so as if the Irish should manufacture their own wool, which grows in very great quantities, we (the English) should not only lose the profit we made now by in-draping their goods, but his Majesty lose extremely by his customs. And in conclusion, it might be feared they might beat us out of the trade itself by underselling us, which they were able to do."

In Charles the Second's reign passed the 12 Chas. II., chap. 4, prohibiting our export of wool to England; next the 15 Chas. II., chap. 7, prohibiting our cattle export thither, and all valuable export trade to the Colonies; then the 22 and 23 Charles II., forbidding all valuable import trade from the Colonies to us. The destructive agency of civil war was again called into action in the period 1688-91; and the moment it was over, legislation, not less injurious to the commercial interests of the country, began again, with the 1st William and Mary, chapter 32, the 7 and 8 William III. chapter 32, and finally the 10 William III. chap. 3. The result is thus described by the historian Barlow:—

"Ireland had rapidly increased in wealth and improvement to the admiration and envy of her neighbours, till it was again laid waste by the revolutionary wars under William III., and even from this calamity it was recovering with astonishing quickness. But the effects were permanent of the restricting laws then passed—insurmountable by the fertility of the soil, the ingenuity of the inhabitants, the navigable rivers and multitude of harbours of Ireland."—Barlow, Vol. I, p. 290.

Here then we have the cause only too lamentably patent and unmistakeable, why the better articles of food began to disappear out of the dietary of the Irish peasant, and the potato to "displace corn from the end of the seventeenth century."

The Laws punishing the profession and practice of the Catholic Religion as a crime, and plundering and persecuting its votaries—the “Penal Laws,” as they are generally called, added their mischievous operation to that of the evil legislation already spoken of. Catholics were thereby prevented from acquiring property in land, or even retaining what they had, save in small portions and as tenants at will;—from pursuing trade or any business in corporate towns; from all, even the humblest, situations of emolument, and were mulcted on every pretence and all possible occasions. As they formed the great bulk of the nation, the economic derangement resulting from these repressions, and restrictions upon their industry and enterprise was of course very great, and affected the whole body politic. The difference of religion too between the recognized, that is, the Protestant proprietors of land and their Catholic tenantry, embittered the relations between them, and aggravated the consequences of the continually increasing pressure of population upon their sole means of employment and subsistence, that supplied by the holding of small parcels of land. Rack-renting, with all its train of misery and wretchedness, became the rule, and deterioration of agriculture and a further diminution of national wealth necessarily followed. Under all these circumstances there can be no just ground for wonder, that the people ceased to live and feed as well as formerly; and until the yet remaining results of those evils, and the continued operation of such among them as still subsist, shall be obviated or counteracted, it is in reality little other than a mockery of the people’s sufferings to talk about “persuading them to eat better food!”

We find ourselves under an exceedingly great temptation here to quote from successive writers and commentators on the state of Ireland during the last 150 years, in further illustration of the evils which bad legislation and misgovernment have inflicted during that period upon Ireland; but to do so at any length would be in fact to write a history of that period, and would swell the present paper far beyond any reasonable dimensions. Not to go back so far as Sir Wm. Petty, (founder of the fortunes of the present Marquis of Lansdowne, though not his direct ancestor,) and to other writers of the latter portion of the 17th century, we have Swift, Thomas Prior, Primate Boulter, &c., in the earlier part of the succeeding century, bearing their witness to the evils at work and the evils they were producing. Swift speaks of

The intolerable hardships we lie under in every branch of our trade, by which we are become as hewers of wood and drawers of water to our vigorous neighbours. The idleness of many; but this is an effect of the former, created by English misrule. A great cause is that Egyptian bondage of cruel, oppressing and covetous landlords, by which the spirit of the people is broken and made for slavery, the farmers and cottagers throughout the kingdom being to all intents and purposes as real beggars as those to whom we give our charity in the streets, and those cruel landlords are every day unpeopling the kingdom. It is a very melancholy reflection that such a country as ours, which is capable of producing all things necessary and most things convenient for life, sufficient for four times the number of its inhabitants, should yet be under the heaviest load of misery and want. Swift's Works, Vol. 6-10, &c., &c.

We are at no loss to point out the sources of our misfortunes—no country labours under so wasteful a drain of its treasure as Ireland, without the least value returned. There is not in history an instance of any one country paying so large a yearly tribute to another. (Prior, 1729.)

There is no country in Europe which produces and exports so great a quantity of beef, butter, tallow, hides and wool, as Ireland does, and yet our common people are very poorly clothed, go barefoot half the year, and very rarely taste of that flesh meat with which we so much abound." (List of Absentees, 1783.)

"While neither money nor goods go out of England for Irish exports to England, nor for Irish exports on English account elsewhere, they are paid by the expenditure of Irish Estates in England. The drafts from Ireland by those who spend the rents of their Irish Estates, &c., in England, the monopoly of wool and profits on other trades on which we restrict the Irish, amount to millions. (Britain's Commercial Interest, 1767.)

If one reflect on the great advantages Ireland has from its situation for trade, the number and excellency of its ports, the clemency and healthfulness of its climate, the fertility of its soil, the convenience of its rivers, &c., &c., we should conclude it one of the happiest kingdoms on earth. But reflect what little use Great Britain has made of these advantages. She has wretchedly mismanaged our trade, so as to impoverish us and our tillage, so as to starve us—she has sent away our wealth and goods, made our nobility and gentry absentees, and instead of a gainful trade, handicraft arts, &c., &c., we have been made little better than contemptible drovers and butchers for others.

(Madden's Reflections and Resolutions, 1738, p. 8.)

"The Popery Laws were equally repugnant to humanity and good policy. The first great principle of government ought to be, to make every subject of the State as useful to it as possible; it is impossible for Papists to become such under their present circumstances, (1772.)

The Papists incur penalties for foreign education, yet are not allowed education at home—they cannot be physicians, lawyers, soldiers—If they become traders and mechanics, they scarcely enjoy the rights of citizens. If farmers, they shall not improve, being discouraged by short limitation of tenure, and yet there is complaint of the dullness and laziness of a people, whose spirit is restrained from exertion, and whose industry has no reward to excite it. (Secretary Hutchinson's Account of Ireland, 1773.)

Restrained at every step by the recollection of our limits we have not only had to abbreviate considerably the few passages we have given, but to omit many, from other writers and authorities all tending the same way. And under similar pressure we pass over more than 60 years from the last date quoted to come to modern expressions of opinion.

We preface them with saying, that, although a better understanding of the real and permanent interest of all, has put an end, in so far as these countries are concerned, to violations of free trade and natural right in matters of commerce and mutual exchange, the effects of the old injurious laws have not passed away, nor above all has the wasting money-drain from Ireland ceased. Absenteeism is greater than ever; Irish taxes have been largely increased, while Public Expenditure in Ireland has largely diminished, as her comparatively small amount of manufactures has only locally and partially increased (in the North of Ireland) the drain of money for articles imported from England, which in a better state of things we might produce and sell cheaper at home, has of course not been reduced.

The "Devon Report," p. 12 of the "Digest," published in 1847, says:—

"The deep evil in which all others appear to have their source is, the disproportion in the various districts of Ireland between the demand and the supply of labor. And the remedy must be the Removal of this Disproportion."

On the heels of this declaration came the Famine and its direful attendants and followers; and now in the ninth year since the above was written, we see and acknowledge that the famine &c., have, to a certain extent, "removed this disproportion." But, for how long? And, what other and better agencies did the Devon Commissioners propose, or have any other Commissioners since put forward?

The Devon Report further specified as points to be attended to, with a view to remedy the ills of Ireland—

"The importance and absolute necessity of securing to the occupier some distinct mode of remuneration for permanent improvements. The want of this was confessed, and it is equally wanting at the present day. Parliament has neglected to apply a remedy in this case, and manifests no disposition to approach the task. The Report states, and truly, that "the master-evil, poverty, proceeds from the fact of occupiers withholding the investment of capital and labor from the ample and profitable field for it that lies within their reach,—this withholding being attributable to a reasonable disinclination to invest labor or capital on the property of others without security for remuneration for the investment."—pp. 155—8, &c.

There are very many similar passages in various other parts of the Devon Report, but what we have quoted is enough to shew that the want of security or protection to the tenant was as great an evil when Lord Devon drew up his report, as in the days of Swift, of Mr. Secretary Hutchinson, or other writers of the last century from whom we have quoted before.

And what says Mr. Sharnan Crawford, of the present time. We find the following in a letter of his just published, addressed to the Dublin Freeman's Journal, on the subject of the state and prospects of the Landlord and Tenant question. It can scarcely be necessary for us to premise that the opinion of such a man—one who has so deeply, intimately and for years studied the question, has a thoroughly practical knowledge of it, and of the condition of the tenant class generally, and by his admirable conduct in his capacity as a large landed proprietor, has so undeniably proved the rectitude and sincerity of his intentions, is entitled to every respect, although we may not go with him in all the details of the remedial measures he has from time to time proposed, and that he may well be accepted as an unimpeachable witness upon the state of the country.

There was never a period when it was of more importance to urge forward a settlement of the land question. If there be that great progressive movement in agricultural improvement which is represented to be in action, then, in order to stimulate its operation, tenant security becomes infinitely more necessary for its further advancement—and now more especially requires the exertions of the friends of that question because its enemies avail themselves of exaggerated statements of the improvements of Ireland to argue that any such measure is not required—that Ireland is prospering without it. I believe that there are several districts in which agricultural improvement has progressed under fostering landlords, and I also admit the evidence of general improvement, in so far as that there are fewer paupers on the poor's rates and better wages for the labourers on the land where labour is required. But I never can feel assured of national improvement till I see it accompanied with some evidence of a revival of Ireland's exhausted population. I should like to find the working man replaced upon the soil; not, as before, a miserable cottier, renting conacre from a grinding middleman, but holding his piece of land under the head landlord, so circumstanced by tenure or otherwise as to give him full security for the value of his labour expended on it, and drawing from it an independent support for himself and his family.

In place of this I fear that the exterminating and consolidating system is largely operating. It is the fashionable doctrine to call this, improvement; but the extermination of human beings, and the substitution of brute animals for the human race on the soil of Ireland, is not an improvement grateful to my mind. I fear that some of the facts disclosed in the last agricultural statistical return give evidence that this system is progressing. We find stock of all kinds increasing, while cereal crops are decreasing—but more especially with regard to sheep a vast increase in their number appears since 1852. This is the great stock of the grazier; while the pig, the cottager's stock, declines in its number. I confess I have an apprehension of the undue extension of the grazing system, which in Ireland can only co-exist with a reduced or exterminated population, thus impairing the national resources for every purpose which requires the application of human power. I wish, therefore, to see the real agricultural farmer, whether large or small, stimulated to improve the soil by some law or system of letting which will secure him in the fair profits of the labour and capital he expends, and thus, by increasing production and increasing the demand for labour, to supply the means of sustaining and employing a renovated population.—“Freeman's Journal,” Oct. 15th, 1856.

If Mr. Sharman Crawford had never said or written anything save the foregoing, he would yet have deserved well of his country. There is more pith, and matter, and truth, and value in those two paragraphs, making together but a short page, than in all the long speeches and disquisitions about Ireland that have been spoken and made by ministers, or opposition, since the famine of 1846—51 forced the more frequent and particular consideration of Ireland upon Parliament, or, we fear we may add, at any time previous. We have italicised two or three passages which deserve special attention—a degree of attention, it is perhaps vain to expect from an English government of any party, while there are so many underlings of office to interpose with plausibilities, and specious statements, that act as opiates to the political conscience.

Limited as was the space we could give to the endeavor, and hurried and compressed as our remarks necessarily have been, we cannot but think we have succeeded better than the Census Commissioners, in assigning causes for the deplorable fact that the people of Ireland have "trusted to one species of food alone," and that a species so disastrously and fatally precarious.

The whole matter treated of in the "Census Report"—at least with very minute exception indeed—is of a deeply painful nature; and therefore we have no right or pretext to shrink, merely on account of its giving us pain, from touching upon any particular part or parts of it that come fairly within the scope of our review. Amongst these, the question of the sufficiency, or otherwise, of effort made to mitigate the calamities of the famine, appear to have a prominent place. In reference to this, the Commissioners say:—

To alleviate the misery consequent upon this awful famine, the most strenuous efforts which human sagacity, ingenuity, and foresight, could devise were put in requisition. The British Government granted millions in loans and gifts. Private benevolence throughout the British Isles supplied hundreds of thousands of pounds; the country, (Ireland) through the Poor Law Unions, taxed itself to the utmost of its capabilities; the colonies of Great Britain poured in their contributions; and every civilized country of the world sent its offering of food or money to diminish the amount of human misery then existing in Ireland.

There can be no doubt of the truth of all the latter part of this statement. Private benevolence throughout the three countries nobly did its work—the Colonies most charitably and generously assisted, and the same is to be said of several European nations, including even the Turks. America was not behind hand either, in her contribution. It is also true, and pre-eminently true, that Ireland "taxed herself through her Poor Law Unions to the utmost of her capabilities." The British Parliament took good care she should do that. But the British Parliament did not itself make "most strenuous efforts" to alleviate the "misery" of the time. So early as the autumn of 1846, the loss of food—of the food of the people of Ireland—was calculated to amount in money-value to £16,000,000, and the British Parliament expended a sum amounting to little more than a million and-a-half, to alleviate the sudden and dreadful destitution. In 1847, the amount of loss was nearly trebled, and the British Parliament voted (and with great difficulty was induced to vote)—a niggard sum of eight millions. Some eight or nine years before, it had, with a generosity which was honorable to itself, but totally undeserved by the recipients, given freely no less than twenty millions of money to the slaveholders of the British West Indies who had no claim in morality or justice to compensation for the loss of their slaves by Emancipation, but rather were criminal for having ever held human beings as property. For the starving and perishing Irish there was far less consideration—the eight or ten millions, (in the two years, 1846-7), was the total sum Parliament gave to them: and so long as there seemed a possibility of getting any portion of it repaid the screw was vigorously applied, and all propositions of further advances were indignantly and insultingly scouted. We do not allude to the illusory proposition of Lord George Bentinck made for a party purpose. The “Sixteen millions” scheme which he proposed would really have effected less than what was otherwise done. At the very utmost not more than four millions a-year were to be expended, whereas the sum actually voted, was made available at once to the fullest extent the immediate emergency required, and the delays were avoided which a change and re-election of ministers, and an organization of the Bentinck-Hudson railway scheme, so as to enable it to be got to work, would inevitably have occasioned. But we do allude to the scornful rejection of the earnest remonstrances and really practical and honest suggestions of the popular Irish members.

We do not want to give more credit to the latter than they really deserve, nor to cast more blame upon others than is rightly to be charged. There is no doubt whatever, that on the first sudden announcement of the impending calamity—announced just at the end of the Parliamentary session of 1846, English, Scotch, and Irish members alike—and men of all parties and persuasions who had the means or opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject, were totally at fault as to what was to be done. A reference to Hansard’s volume for the latter part of that session will shew how completely puzzled, in short, our legislators were, and how crude, vague, and hesitating their suggestions of measures of remedy. Under these circumstances the efforts of the Government really did them credit, and confessedly were of service, so far as they went. At any rate there was scant fairness in criticizing them, after the sudden emergency which they at least partially met, was over for the time, and especially the criticism is unfair on the part of those who really had nothing better or other to propose. Nor is the inadequacy of after measures—those adopted in the succeeding years, a ground for exclusive blame of the Ministry of the day ; for without dreaming of exonerating them from a portion of the censure, and a heavy portion of it, it should be borne in mind, that the House of Commons was got with great reluctance to go even so far as the ministerial plan proposed, and that any attempt to go farther would certainly have been indignantly rejected, as was proved by the manner in which the subsequent suggestions and enlarging amendments we have before mentioned that proceeded from popular Irish members, were treated by the House.

When speaking of the efforts of the Government we should not omit to mention the great stimulus they received from the earnest humanity of the then Lord Lieutenant, the lamented Lord Besborough, and his Chief Secretary, the Right Hon. Mr. Labouchere. If it had lain within their power, far more extended measures of relief would have been carried out in Ireland, and hundreds of thousands of lives would have been saved.

We cannot omit the following general description by the Census Commissioners of the state of things that had to be dealt with :—

Some idea of the destitution may be formed from the facts that on one day, the 3rd of July 1847—out of a population of about eight millions, nearly three millions received food gratuitously from the relieving officers, and in addition, as many as 99,920 rations were sold at a moderate cost to those who were unable to procure food otherwise :—that the Public Works afforded in March 1847, employment to 734,000 people ; and that there existed 131 Workhouses, with their Auxiliaries and Hospitals, giving, within the space of two years, shelter, food, and raiment, to 1,027,602 persons, and at one period 800,000 were relieved daily, at the charge of the poor-rates :—that, in addition to the ordinary eleemosynary institutions, 207 temporary fever hospitals, through which passed, during 1847 and 1848, as many as 279,723 persons, were erected ;—and that an emigration amounting to very nearly a million, occurred in six years. . . . With all efforts to relieve famine and avert disease, hundreds died from actual starvation ; thousands wasted away in the poor-houses, and thousands also perished from disease induced by despondency of mind and prostration of physical strength ! . . . These details will afford some notion of the extent of destitution and disease which devastated Ireland, leaving extensive districts of it uncultivated, and presenting the most desolate appearance.

It is but fair, after the remarks we have made on the inadequacy of the measures of relief, to give the statement of them, which the Commissioners have embodied in Part V. of their Report. And it is a more pleasing act of justice to take the opportunity of stating what was done by private benevolence.

"Advances nearly amounting to £10,000,000 were made by Parliament; Local and Central Relief Associations distributed sums which could not have fallen very far short of a million and a-half as estimated by the "Friends or Quakers-Committee." Sir C. Trevelyan thus estimated it:—

Advances under 9 Vic., c. 7,—9 and 10 Vic., cap. 107.
"Labour Rate Act"; and 10 Vic., c. 7. ("Temporary Relief Act.")
Loans for Building Workhouses,	...	£6,967,420
Debts of Distressed Unions,	...	1,420,780
Grants by Parliament, 1845-9.	...	300,000
		844,521
Total,		£9,532,721
Arterial Drainage and Land Improvement, 1846-8,	...
under Board of Works,	...	1,191,187
		£10,700,000

Of these advances, &c., the following, however, have been partially and are to be fully repaid, viz:—

Workhouses,	...	...	...	...	£1,420,780
Drainage and Land Improvement	...	...	...	...	1,191,187
Certain Votes under Board of Works	...	...	...	...	300,000
Repayments under Labour Rate Act	...	...	...	...	250,000
					£3,161,967

The actual amount, therefore, of bonâ fide grants given to Ireland in her dire necessity, was less than eight millions! This was the full extent of the "liberality and generosity" of the British Parliament. Not one half of the estimated amount of Ireland's loss in the very beginning of her visitation, the autumn of 1846. And we confidently say, that if there be an error in our calculation, it is on the side of exaggeration of those "gifts," and not on that of diminution.

Now for private exertions:—

When the potato failure of autumn, 1846, became known, the Society of Friends in London opened a subscription; and the British Association for the relief of extreme distress in Ireland and the Highlands of Scotland was formed on the 6th of January, 1847. A "queen's letter" was issued with the same object; and the 24th of March was appointed by proclamation for religious observances "in behalf of ourselves and our brethren, who in many parts of the United kingdom are suffering extreme famine and sickness." . . . The remotest stations in India—the most recent settlements in Canada, contributed, and, £625 was subscribed by British residents in Mexico. The sum collected under the queen's letter was £171,533; by the British Associations £263,251. Five-sixths of these sums were sent to Ireland, the other one-sixth to the Highlands of Scotland. The National Club in London collected £17,930. The General Relief Committee for all Ireland collected (in Ireland), upwards of £50,000, independent of £10,000 in cash, and an equal value in food, sent them from the sum raised by the queen's letter.

British North America sent	...	...	...	£12,463
United States	...	...	...	5,852
British India	...	...	...	5,674
Cape of Good Hope	...	...	...	2,900
Australia	...	...	...	2,282
Ireland herself (independent of local subscriptions)				9,888
Detached subscriptions in England	...	...	...	8,886
The Society of Friends collected and were sent,	...	...	...	168,000 of which £108,651 were spent on food, and £5,000 to £10,000 was the value of clothes sent from America and England. The "Ladies Relief Association for Ireland" raised	...	...	...	£11,463
South America	...	...	...	772
The Military	...	...	...	386
Scotland, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Gibraltar,
The Channel, West Indian, and Ionian Islands	...	...	...	2,168
Irish Relief Association, including £17,782 from England, £151 from Ireland, France £1,390; Italy £2,708; British America £2,821; United States £847; India
£5,947; West Indies £1,043; Australia £2,314; and £508 from Military, Pensioners, and Constabulary.				42,000
(p.p. 286—288, vol. v.)

The statement of the foregoing account, as we copy it from the "Census Report," appears to want some clue to explain whether the double entries, if we may so call them, for various parts of the world represent repeated contributions, or are simply different modes of classing the same items.

We observe that Turkey has been omitted in the preceding enumeration of our foreign sympathisers. The Sultan of Turkey contributed the splendid donation of one thousand pounds sterling!—besides which there were a few minor sums from private parties in Constantinople.

A thousand other details of interest and great value can be extracted from the "Census Report," and its pains-taking and copious Appendices. It has not been in our power to do more than (if we may be pardoned the expression) summarise the leading and principal of them. But the results of the Commissioners' most intelligent and indefatigable labors are not such as can be discussed and dismissed at one review of them, and would require and repay many and many a searching before anything approaching to justice could be done, or those labors be adequately appreciated. Indeed there is hardly one, if there be one, subject connected with Ireland, from the most interesting archaeological and philological matter supplied to the Commissioners by those whom they no more than rightly designate "the eminent Irish scholars," Dr. O'Donovan and Mr. Eugene Curry, M.R.I.A., down to the latest statistics of a village national school, that is left untouched, or respecting which information is not given.

On one point, and one point alone, do they seem to be seriously at fault; and on that point they only share the fate of a multitude of other writers and public men of the present and preceding times. We allude to their prognostication of the coming fortunes of Ireland.

We make no pretence to keener foresight or better success ourselves. All that we pretend to is, to see more reason for doubting the efficacy of the measures and agencies to which they look for the permanent improvement of Ireland.

We admit of course that the Encumbered Estates' Act was one of absolute necessity under the circumstances of the country, and has operated beneficially; but not that it has raised up a class of small proprietors, nor that it has anything in it to check the tendency of property in these countries to agglomerate in the hands of a small number of rich men. Neither has it checked, save in a very small degree, the evils of absenteeism; nor has it caused upon the property of absentees, or of residents, any large increase of expenditure for permanent improvements.

We admit the increase of "grazing farms;" but we also deplore it. With Mr. Sharman Crawford and others we cannot bring ourselves to rejoice that animals are supplanting men.

We admit an improvement of agriculture, but not in proportion to Great Britain. The area under wheat in England has increased 36 per cent., in Scotland 35, or nearly so; while in Ireland it has increased but 18½ per cent. And we have before quoted from page xxxiii of the Census Report, that the number of families engaged in agriculture has decreased from 66 per cent. in 1841 to 53 per cent. in 1851.

We admit a diminution of small holdings, but deny that that is necessarily a benefit. On the Continent the countries that are most prosperous internally are those in which the land is in a great number of hands. In our own country, the counties of Armagh and Down have been often boasted of and held up as examples of industry, thrift, and prosperity; while the county Tipperary, which they together equal in extent, has long been notorious for the poverty and bad condition of its people. Yet Armagh and Down had between them no less than 25,385 farms under 5 acres in area; and only 2,174 farms over 30 acres; while Tipperary had but 13,000 small farms and 3000 of the larger; and this before the famine and the great emigration.

We admit present high prices and of course we admit that there has been a good harvest. Both those circumstances being necessarily transitory, cannot be of much value to the "prosperity" argument. And we regret to say, that while we write accounts are multiplying of the fatal spread of the potato disease in many parts of Ireland.

We admit of course the fact that population in Ireland is at present in a better proportion to the means of subsistence, than before the terrible ravages of famine and pestilence; but we see no sort of provision made nor policy inaugurated whereby, when population increases again, as increase it will and must, a corresponding increase shall take place in the means of subsistence. And after all that has been said and written, and avowed and declared of the expediency and desirableness of settling the distracted relations between landlord and tenant, nothing at all has been done towards that end, and towards giving the farmers of Ireland that reasonable security for the enjoyment of the results of their own industry and expenditure of capital without which they would be little better than insane if they expended their labor and their money on the soil.

The breathing time which, at the expence of so much misery and suffering, has been obtained by the statesmen who control our fortunes, is fast passing away; the old evils un-eradicated are threatening to grow up anew, ere long, ranker and more obstinate than ever, and no provision is being made to meet them. The best service that could be done the present or any other set of men holding the reins of power and responsible for the destinies of this country, would surely be, not to assist in lulling them to sleep with sadly unfounded congratulations, but to waken them sharply up to the real precariousness of the present calm in the condition of Ireland, and to the very evident symptoms of the social distractions which may be slowly, but still are most assuredly, growing and threatening again.

---

NOTE ON PAGE 850 OF THE FOREGOING PAPER.

Very many authorities supporting the opinions stated or quoted in this portion of the foregoing, will be found in the papers entitled "The Survey of Ireland," IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Vol. II., No. 6, p. 217; "Rev. Samuel Madden," Vol. III., No. 11, p. 693: Ibid; "Maguire on the Development of Irish Industry," p. 735. Also in The Repeal Prize Essays: Dublin: Duffy, 1845; in the Reports of the Parliamentary Committee of the Loyal National Repeal Association of Ireland, 3 vols. Dublin: Browne, 1845; and also in one of the most valuable books which the student of our political history, in its rise and fall, can read, An Argument for Ireland, By John O'Connell, Esq., M.P. Dublin: Browne, 1847; Second edition.—ED. I. Q. R.

ART. VII.—MR. MIALl AND HIS IRISH POLICY.

The Liberator : a Monthly Journal of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control. Nos. I. to XVIII. London.

The Non-Conformist, Nov. 12, 1856.

The English Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage, has reached that period of existence, when the observer in politics is obliged to make account of its presence and action, although, perhaps, he may not, as yet, be able to forecast the measure of its success. Nor is that success altogether matter of conjecture, calculation, or experiment. The fruits of the movement have been early but not unripe; although small they are sappy and full-flavoured. England, late our pupil, is now our mistress in political agitation. When a trade, a manufacture, an adventure, no matter where it may have originated, is in perfect harmony with the genius of a people, its development will be thoroughly national. The system of agitation invented by O'Connell had wonderful, though often secret, affinities with the English character. Its organization was practical from the outset, but in England herself it became so emphatically English as to preserve hardly a trace of relationship with the Irish original. Agitation in Ireland required to be stimulated by eloquence, to be amused by wit; it was wayward, pettish, and subject to intervals of languor. As it was the creation of genius, it never condescended to work for mediocrity. Like the bow of Ulysses, no humouring could supple, as no strength could force it, until it recognised its master's touch; and great indeed was the master who could collect the waste and straggling energies of a people like the Irish, give aim to their irregular impetuosity, reanimate it when spent, and check it when violent, reconciling and matching its opposing elements till he made them obedient by habit and united through obedience. But the organization, working under this influence, although as perfect as the materials would admit of, was necessarily such as to obey no other influence. Before O'Connell's day we were the Bashi-Bazooks of politics; he made the most of us, but we are Bashi-Bazooks to-day, unreclaimed, though, it is to be hoped, not irreclaimable. We start upon our campaign in rather imposing force; brandishing the most dissimilar but formidable looking weapons; bestriding hobbies, wild, and often freshly caught; uttering the bravest words, pledging the most indissoluble union, plighting the most sacred troth. For a time we put our gipsy tendencies under a restraint that would be heroic if it lasted. We have not of course forgotten ourselves to stone that we should see a friend's house without indistinct suggestions of free quarters and forced contributions; true it is, at the sight of a well dressed traveller, or even of a brother Bashi in a lonesome place, instinct will speak, and we feel mechanically for our knives; but in the end we do control ourselves severely, and are virtuous though with a sigh. Nature, however, soon has her way for she is stronger in our leaders than in our very selves, and the historian of the war has early to chronicle our doings on our friends and on each other. No one is unfamiliar with the exploits of the well known chief called Tablet in the course of the last year. He came to the service from another country, exactly as a countryman of his undertook to make a Macedonian phalanx out of the original Bashis. Agreeably to custom, and just as Colonel Clutterbuck might become Sefid Pasha, he took the name of Tablet, once belonging to a deceased leader whose armoury he inherited, but who living overtopped him by the head and shoulders, and whose palm was so broad that the lance he bequeathed was too big for both the hands of his successor. Tablet II. came to his command with unexceptionable testimonials; he had letters of introduction to all the authorities, but unfortunately he soon proved a more decided Bashi than any of the rank and file he came to drill. His first attack was upon a general officer of the Parliamentary force, Moore by name, with whom, in the language of that corps, he was supposed to be in the habit of acting. The polish and temper of that officer's weapon are generally known, but the place was ugly, the road slippery, and the occasion altogether too seductive for the weakness of a Bashi. Tablet II. ventured a blow with the spear of Tablet I., yea and got pinked with the edge as well as beaten with the flat of the general's sabre. But he was neither intimidated, nor reformed. Thus there is, in these regions, a house known as the Catholic University, a modern structure, sheltered, however, by venerable names while awaiting the growth of a young and small, but flourishing plantation by which it is surrounded. Tablet professes an intense concern for its prosperity, but the Bashi-Bazook is great and will prevail within him. He has frequently to pass the place in the course of his expeditions, and never does so without attempting to break a window or chip an ornament, if he cannot force a door, or scale a wall, for with the entire force, mischief is only less a passion than plunder. We might instance another celebrated partisan called "Nation," and promoted equally with Tablet to the place and name of a preceding leader; for Nation is, perhaps, even more predatory and irregular in his habits than Tablet. His appearance cannot fail to strike the least observant spectator, since he carries, in the most conspicuous place, the spoils of many friends and enemies. He has a German silver puzzle from Carlyle, a tatter of fustian from Meagher, a vinegar cruet from Victor Hugo, and a metaphor from Castlereagh. He has waylaid and attacked his brother officer, Freeman, and has totally lost sight of the enemy in fencing with his friends generally.

The entire list would carry us too far, but no one can say that this is an over-coloured or distorted picture of the hopelessness of Irish politics, or that upon the overthrow of the O'Connell influence, political society did not drop asunder. It would be desirable, no doubt; and profitable, to investigate the more immediate causes of this weakness, this paralysis, this decomposition of political life. They are to be found of course, to some extent, in the national character itself, but principally in the depravation of that character by past misgovernment, and by the actual misconduct of those whose natural duty it is to guide, moderate and reform the temper of the Irish mind. At all events, effective agitation in Ireland has died out because the success of our movements is far too intimately connected with the personal qualities of our leaders. In England as every one knows it is far otherwise. The anti-corn-law league was modelled to a great extent upon the various Irish associations which had gone before it, but neither oratory nor wit, nor enthusiasm, had a share in its management. The league altogether resembled the Society at present working for the disendowment of religion. That Society is governed and set in motion by a cool and resolute purpose to compass its end by any fair and available means. It grows out of the voluntary consent of earnest men to work together for a common object. It is not swaddled in pledges or engagements; it is not tied up to the letter of a programme; it extorts no sacrifices from its members; it appeals to their interest rather than to their virtue; it relies upon facts more than upon principles; and is willing to fetch a circuit, where the straight road is beset. A representative character it must have to some extent, as it has been pushed to the surface by public opinion, but it does not assume any species of deputed authority, as that might involve the responsibility of making bargains or agreeing to compromises, a delicate, dangerous, and ungrateful duty. Its great strength is in the simplicity and distinctness of its object and its office. Its object is one, the disendowment of religion, and therefore its office is one, the promotion of that object. It does not regard itself as a contracting party enabled to make terms with a religious establishment, for the society has no business in life but the destruction of the Establishment. The operations of the Society are just the dissemination of its opinions at all seasons, and their application wherever that is possible; no matter how trifling the occasion, or how apparently unimportant the success. The circulation of tracts, the registration of opinion, the support of a journal exclusively their own, the supply of practical instruction in the working of the movement, the collection and tabulation of all desirable statistics, the promotion and publication of lectures upon the objects of the body, a regular scrutiny of the parliamentary divisions, in reference to the subject of religious equality—such are the principal modes of action adopted by the Society, whose leading publication, the "Liberator," has completed its first year and first eighteen numbers, representing eighteen months of existence. The operations of the Society as recorded in this volume are nothing wonderful; it does not seem to have the slightest ambition to be looked upon as an infant prodigy. It no way courts a reputation like that of baby pianists who at four years of age execute brilliant fantasias and derange your entire nervous system with variations of the "Carnaval de Venise," but lose all attraction when the nature triumphs over brandy, and the infant reaches four feet eight. The dimensions of the Society are not out of proportion.

tion with its years. Somewhat spare, but compact, sinewy, and active, it is gradually filling in. The questions at present disturbing the Church Establishment in England, and eating into the compromise, by which alone it exists, are daily detaching members from its communion, and whether these take the direction of Rome or Geneva, the hands of the society are strengthened. From whatever cause, the communicants of the Establishment are thinning in number. A Tractarian curate insists upon a travestie of Catholic symbolism, and a table, a candlestick, a hood, a flower-pot, a nothing, costs him half his congregation. The odious emblem, and perhaps the offending minister, is removed, but the congregation will not return, and the Society for the disendowment of religion has zealous adherents in the new dissenters. Suppose on the other hand, a peer, an influential commoner, an eminent lawyer, a great lady, an archdeacon, a vicar, a fellow of college, passes over to the Roman Church, the Establishment has perhaps no active hostility to dread from him, but its supporters are diminished, its numbers are thinned, although in a degree scarcely perceptible; and above all that exasperation is increased, which will eventually lead to new defections, and give additional strength and prominence to the leaders of what is called the voluntary movement.

The society is peculiarly dangerous to the Establishment, because it never stumbles from impetuosity, and is never disappointed from being over sanguine. It makes up in activity what it wants in weight, and husbands its strength for the opportunity which its vigilance detects or its sagacity provides. Hence if its efforts be modest they are at least successful, and its blows always tell, for they are aimed not at the most vital but the most exposed parts of the Establishment; and provided it inflict a real injury it finds abundant matter for gratification although the injury itself be small. The agitation it has for some years been leading against church rates is an instance of this. The question of church rates by no means involves the principle contended for, as a man may be a faithful son of the Establishment and yet vote against a rate. But the merit of the society lies in having appropriated the question, and clothed it with a character which perhaps did not originally belong to it. The object of the voluntaries is plainly to habituate bodies of the people to act in opposition to the Establishment, to regard this opposition as a normal and necessary state of things, and to acquire a conviction that the Establishment is vulnerable. Accordingly every defeat of a rate, and every narrow escape from defeat, is carefully registered; the progress or decay of opposition in every parish is noted for the instruction of the public; the state of opinion and action in the colonies with reference to the object of the Society are all collected into a body of data, enabling the directors of the movement to keep it well in hand, and turn events to account at the desirable moment. This is done without anger, agitation, or apparent effort. The Association goes to its daily work with the same regularity, and with the like absence of excitement or emotion that belongs to the man of business, who never invokes his gods or appeals to his own or other people's passions, or even thinks it necessary to waste an argument when he presses for the winding up of a dishonest and decrepit concern. The association and the man of business have their work to do, and they both do it without question or hesitation, as a matter of course, a matter of duty, a matter of necessity, their part in life, their stock in trade, their reason of existence; and it is not difficult or hazardous to predict success for an association of this kind when its aim is just and its means honorable.

The question is one in which the Irish have of course a more immediate and a more than common interest. They require no enlightenment as to the theory or working of the voluntary system. They take some thirty thousand pounds a year for the education of their clergy as a matter of convenience, but as a matter of principle, they support that clergy at a cost of certainly not less than £400,000 per annum, and are, we believe, a thousand times more averse to Government handling than any Protestant in the Empire. They feel the existence of the Establishment in Ireland to be a blot upon their honour, a drain upon their substance, a monument of conquest, a brand of inequality. Its abolition is a long foregone conclusion, and as soon as the ability of the Irish will come to match their strength, there is at once, without waste of breath or expenditure of ink, an end of the Establishment. It will fall because it is opposed to the truth of things, because it has no proper place in nature, no function in the economy of the State—because it is a mere nuisance, a naked deformity. It will disappear because it has no life from the blood of the country, not even from a vice in the blood; it will fall because it cannot pretend even to the odious but undoubted relationship of an excrescence; it will fall because it is altogether foreign to us and to our system ; it will fall because it is not a part of the nation, but a cap-and-bells or convict's jacket, the emblem of our folly and the garb of our servitude. This, whether expressed or suppressed, has been the feeling of the country for many a bitter year, and will continue to be its feeling during the duration of the Establishment. Our friends the English voluntaries will therefore understand that what is a principle with them is an instinct with us. As soon as it shall be in our power the Establishment must fall. Compromise is impossible ; the same island, according to the remark of an authority we shall quote presently, cannot contain a Catholic people free to work its will, and a Protestant establishment existing in defiance of that will. So long as the English form of Protestantism is maintained in Ireland as an established religion, so long will the members of that communion be looked upon as a garrison, and its ministers as garrison chaplains and no more. As an establishment it purports to be something national ; but if it be odious as a reality, it is ten-fold odious as a fiction. To an English voluntary, Church establishments are suggestive of simple injustice, but with us the idea is more complex : involving literal murder ; robbery as undoubted as ever earned a halter upon land or short shrift upon sea ; persecution longer, more immoral, and more ingenious than ever afflicted man or outraged heaven ; time past, the memory of which is in malediction ; time present that overflows with insult ; hands lately upon our throats ; hands still in our pockets ; hands filled with plunder ; hands filled with bribes ; unappeasable hatred and unquenchable greed.

It is hardly necessary for us to guard against being supposed to say one word in disparagement of the established form of Protestantism, or of any religious confession. With its doctrines or morality we have no concern, although we neither ask nor expect a similar forbearance from its adherents. Our remarks would apply indifferently to any religious communion, holding the same relation to any other country that the English Establishment does to our's. Happily for the world there is nothing remotely like it any where. To us the thirty-nine articles are objects of aversion, only in so far as they outdo the forty thieves. Any man is free to set faith above works, who has the negative grace " to keep his hands from picking and stealing." He may abjure purgatory, but he shan't repudiate his liabilities ; he may teach, for aught we care, the transmi-gration of his soul, but we shall insist upon the transfer of our property. Nay, more, not only do we abstain from saying anything disrespectful of any form of religion, but since the truth must be told, and since it is right Mr. Miall and the English voluntaries should know us exactly as we are, we feel bound to say that our preference inclines to what in England is called the Churchman, rather than to the Dissenter. There is more consanguinity, more family likeness however faint, between Catholic and Anglican than between Catholic and Dissenter. The very pretensions of Churchmen though we ridicule them; their usurpation of our name and orders, extravagant as it is; their efforts to graft themselves upon our stock; their clumsy affectation of our air and carriage; these things alone have a spice of incense in them, not displeasing to our pride. But if, in addition to this, it be taken into account that the whole circle of Catholic doctrine is to be found in the works of English divines; that the Establishment in England is for us a nursery of clergy more accomplished than any we can afford to educate at home; that while Oxford is spared we can laugh at the disendowment of Maynooth; that the Prayer-book flows from the Missal, and that many of its students act upon the aphorism of Lord Coke, "Melius esse petere fontes quam sectari rivulos:" if all this be taken into account it will easily be seen that our hostility is not to the Anglican religion, nor even to the Anglican Establishment in England; but solely to that same Establishment in Ireland. Although agreeing with Mr. Miall as to the superior merit of the voluntary system, especially in an Empire such as ours, we are not such abstracts of virtue as to anticipate with any degree of pleasure the fall of the Establishment in England; and if it be a consequence of the fall of the Irish iniquity, we shall rather regret it, notwithstanding our determination that the latter must fall at any risk and at any cost. On the contrary, we rather hope that the extinction of the Establishment in Ireland will conduce to the prosperity of the Establishment in England, by the removal of a scandal which connects her name with an institution more incurably vicious than any which is known to civilization. Assuredly we have no particular hostility to Anglican Protestants. In England all that we consider hopelessly gangrened is sloughing off into the Salt Lake, the Agape-mone and the Surrey Gardens; while we have on the other hand positive evidence that the Romeward movement called Puseyism is not on the decline. We do not like the Anglican Establishment the less, that it is plainly dying, that its only signs of life are symptoms of dissolution, and that if it be but allowed to die naturally, our interest in the succession will greatly increase.

We have been perfectly candid with Mr. Miall. We are satisfied to work with him for the extinction of the Establishment in Ireland, not because it may involve that of the same institution in England, but even with some regret that it should. We admit that we are altogether selfish, completely Irish, downright provincial in our views. A nation never can be disinterested. The interests of the English voluntaries and ours are identical, but our motives of action very different. Mr. Miall and those who work with him act in the furtherance of a principle—they are propagandists, apostles; we are nothing more than people endeavouring to get rid of a tyranny, and purge ourselves of a shame. Ours is an instinct, a purpose, a determination which we have inherited, not acquired; which we hold from intuition, not instruction; from conception, not inoculation; which we have neither invented, nor learned, nor even studied, but have pressed forth, caught up and drunk in, from the breasts of nature and of right. Under this feeling we accept the aid of Mr. Miall, the more readily of course that we have faith in his principle, although we are not satisfied with his plan of operations. We cannot approve his general policy in every particular, and we have no respect for an alliance with Mr. Spooner, in the movement against Maynooth, on the mere ground that the withdrawal of the grant would influence the public mind in Ireland against the Established Church to that degree, that its existence could not be prolonged. We consider it immoral for any man of liberal opinions to co-operate with Mr. Spooner; and we believe it to be injudicious, because if the grant be withdrawn from Maynooth, it will not be in consequence of the sound opinions diffused by Mr. Miall, but of the bad passions inflamed by Mr. Spooner. We cannot advocate the policy that would say, "If I cannot subvert the Establishment by strictly legitimate means, I will consider any means legitimate; if I cannot secure the triumph of my principle by its virtue or my own, I will recruit amongst the worst passions that can unsettle the judgment or corrupt the hearts of men. I will commit an injustice that I may have the satisfaction of repairing it, and perpetuate confusion through the love of order." But this is merely the moral aspect of the question, and we think there is a logical application of our views that will not fail to recommend itself to Mr. Miall.

If Maynooth be suppressed, Mr. Miall well knows, in the first place, that for the time being at least, it will be the triumph of fanaticism, and can only be compassed through the intervention of that fury. His principle will never be able to effect it, and will most positively not be allowed to profit by the event. It is not by stimulating English hatred that you will succeed in abolishing the Irish Establishment. The people of England will not discriminate between the various opponents of Maynooth, for the English as a body are not sufficiently educated in politics to care for Mr. Miall's principle although they are coming to understand it; but they can be influenced by fanaticism to do any wrong at any risk if religion be the pretext and Ireland the victim. On the other hand, Ireland is not what she was; the slouch is wearing out of the gait of Irish Catholics, and along with the slouch they are beginning to forget the swagger in which they sometimes indulged, and not harmlessly. They have for years been in the enjoyment of rights that cannot be kept back; they have been increasing in wealth, intelligence and power. Their ambition will never slacken while the State withholds from them one privilege enjoyed by any class of their countrymen. The dignity of citizenship has had its effect in sobering and giving stability to their character. They threaten less, but they are intuitively more reliant. Their capacity for public duty and their integrity in public trust are no longer matters of speculation. They begin to take promotion as of course, and if they have an accurate remembrance of their wrongs they have a still more distinct apprehension of their rights. Should Maynooth be suppressed the body of the people will not vapour—some foolish oratory will naturally have vent, a given but moderate number of defiances will be hurled, and strong resolutions will be carried by acclamation, but the mischief will not lie there; national animosity will be envenomed to a degree of which Mr. Miall has a faint conception. Seminaries will be established in Naples, in France, in Vienna, in fine, wherever hatred of the English name and institutions can be propagated or imbibed—the work of the last fifty years will be undone; the web so toilsomely and so tediously woven will be unravelled in a night, and England will find the drivelling of Spooner a draught more bitter than any from the sixth phial, and Irish disaffection a more formidable weapon than the little horn. We would press it upon Mr. Miall and the English voluntaries not to touch what has been offered to idols, to refrain their hands from meats that have been dragged through the claws, and fouled by the obscenities of Irish Orangeism; we should entreat them not to have the appearance of waiting upon "Protestant Associations," as Russian serfs are said to get drunk upon the voided swill of their master's debauch; we should ask them not to work with their enemies against their friends; we would finally recommend them to weigh the advice of one to whom they will naturally listen with more deference than they can to us.

"I will pass to other matters" (says Mr. Roebuck in the speech lately made to his constituents in Sheffield,) "in which myself and my honourable colleague differ, and in which, as you may suppose, he is in error. He says he is an enemy to state endowments of religion. So am I. We are agreed upon that, but we are not agreed upon the next application of the principle. Let us direct our minds at this moment to Ireland,—There are three sorts of sects—There is that well endowed body which my friend Mr. Grote, the Historian of Greece, calls the greatest ecclesiastical enormity in the world, the Established Church of Ireland. Then there come the many millions of Roman Catholics and the small number of Dissenters. They are all three endowed; but how? Why the very small body of the Established Church of Ireland is about the richest Church in Europe for its numbers: the many millions of Catholics have something like £30,000 a year. The Dissenters have the Regium Donum. I don't know what that is, but it is a very small sum (£40,000.) Carrying out the view of my Hon. colleague, he, if Mr Spooner makes a motion, as he annually does, against the Maynooth grant, goes into the same lobby with Mr. Spooner, but let my honourable colleague make a motion each day against the Established Church of Ireland, then we shall see how holy is the alliance. I would go into same lobby with him, because I begin with the strong. I always like to meet my strong foe, and not to wreak my vengeance on the weak. I should be in the same lobby with my honourable colleague on that question, but where would Mr. Spooner be? (cheers) So by this unholy alliance between my honourable colleague and Mr. Spooner you put down the support of £30,000 a year, that goes to the Roman Catholics, but you do not put down the immense ecclesiastical enormity, I mean the Established Church. * * * Therefore if we cannot put down the Irish Church, I am not for putting down Maynooth."

We commend the wisdom of this speech to the consideration of Mr. Miall. The destruction of the Church Establishment involves the suppression of Maynooth, but the converse of the proposition would be far from true, for the reasons we have already assigned. As for Maynooth, Mr. Miall may be well assured that if Irish Catholics could be made to believe that its suppression would lead to the results claimed for it, none would be more forward in the work of destruction than themselves. But they have no such hope, or rather their conviction is the other way. They cannot believe that after three or four years of savage controversy, in which they should have to act purely on the defensive, during which they should be yearly branded with the mark of the beast, paraded as Guys, baited by the most brutal portion of the English people, and finally disarmed and defeated, any one would dream of doing an act of justice, even of admitted justice, to them. As well send Miss Nightingale to a wounded rattlesnake, or give Pocock's cough lozenges to an asthmatic hyena—the hope is preposterous; it is entertained by Mr. Miall in perfect good faith, but argues a simplicity not uncommon in men of the acutest minds. We at all events cannot give it a thought; we are ready to abandon Maynooth, on terms certainly, but not without asking an equivalent. We invite the Society to regard the grant as a mere pledge retained in our hands, as a recognizance from the Society itself to prosecute the Church Establishment, not to conviction, for that has been done already, but to judgment; and we gladly undertake to hand back the recognizance the moment the sentence of opinion shall have been ratified and consummated by the action of the law.

And meanwhile it may not be inopportune to state here, the relations in which this Journal is desirous of standing towards the great liberal party in England. It cannot pretend an authority to speak in the name of any but its own writers. It wishes, however, to be regarded as an organ of liberal opinion, and as such in Ireland, it is of necessity Catholic. We ask the attention of Mr. Miall, and of the liberal party in England to this undeniable fact, that for all practical purposes there is no liberal party in Ireland, not Catholic, and no liberal opinion to speak of, outside the Catholic body. The race of liberal Protestants, never numerous or prolific in Ireland, appears to have died out completely. There are not at the Irish bar two liberal Protestants qualified for high judicial station. Men of the same class as Brady, Moore, and Perrin are quite extinct, and the Irish government, laudably anxious as it is to distribute its patronage with fairness, is perfectly unable to find a Protestant Whig or Protestant Liberal of any shade for promotion. The liberal Protestant members from Ireland represent constituencies exclusively Catholic; the entire liberal press, with one or two exceptions, is Catholic, and the entire press in the interest of the establishment, is without any exception what is called Conservative. There is not one measure of liberal or beneficial tendency which has not united against it the whole force of the Protestant interest in Ireland; which has not had the undivided and what is better the effectual and crowning support of the Catholic population. Municipal and corporate reform were opposed by the entire body of the Establishment, and as unanimously supported by Catholics. The National system of education, the only English institution that ever flourished in Ireland, still encounters the most determined opposition from the Establishment; it received at first, a decided, and subsequently an unanimous support from Catholics. The repeal of the Corn Laws was resisted by the whole strength of the Church Protestants, and achieved by the co-operation of the entire Catholic people. These are the facts which it shall be the duty of this Journal to keep before the eyes of English liberals, in the endeavour to teach them not to forget so readily, as they are disposed to do, the services and the deserts of the Irish Catholic, the sole representative of liberal doctrines in one member of the British confederacy. We shall aim at persuading them, that it is not only bad policy but bad faith, to make Irish Catholics answerable for the vagaries or the necessities of foreign States belonging to their communion. We shall study to show that an alliance with Gavazzi or Kossuth, is less natural and less profitable, than the friendship of those whose co-operation was never wanting to them, in the advancement of their common principles. It will not be difficult, we think, for us to prove that our strength and weakness will produce corresponding results on their own body, and that putting aside all causes of estrangement, they should condescend as the easy price of our support, to take and act upon our own opinion, in our own concerns. True to our profession in policy, as well as in religion, we shall have no setting of faith above works. We shall not require of our Protestant brethren in reform, to believe any thing of us, upon our word, that we cannot confirm by proof; but looking at Ireland as it was, and as it is since Irish Catholics have been in the enjoyment of such rights as they do enjoy; we call upon them to affirm and to act upon these two propositions, first, that Irish Catholics are almost universally liberals, and secondly, that they are the only liberals in Ireland.

We fear the Presbyterian body cannot for any practical purpose be reckoned as liberals. They include a large number of speculative, and some working liberals, but public spirit as a community, they have none or at least shew none. It may be right, for Mr. Miall to know that when a Belfast Presbyterian, for instance, has made his fortune, he almost invariably passes over to the Establishment and that he has, consequently, a species of reversionary interest in that institution, which considerably weakens his enmity to State endowments. This is a well-known fact, and brings us to what we are disposed to look upon as the real strength of the Establishment in Ireland, and indeed in England; namely, the interest which every individual of the establishment, lay or clerical, has in that institution, as a state provision for some member of his family. There lies the secret of the attachment of the most devoted friends of the Establishment. The bare fact of its being an institution and an Establishment, gives it strength by the creation of vested abuses. Slavery is defended in America with a fervour of the purest patriotism, and Thuggee would have been upheld in British India with the soundest reasons, had reason been its assailant. We should have heard of the right divine to strangle, we should have been told with alarm that the purses of travellers now sought to be retained for the use of the owners, had become the subject of family settlement, and that hundreds of meritorious Thuggs had vested interests in the wardrobe of the passer by. It would be urged by eloquent advocates that compression of the stranger's wind-pipe was an incident inseparable from the Thugg tenure; that it was in fact nothing more or less than their peculiar livery of seisin; and that as a solemnity indicating the transmission of property, it had the merit not always attaching to similar forms, of effectually preventing controversy and litigation. We should probably have been reminded that an important branch of domestic industry, rope-making to wit, would suffer to its tenderest fibre; that the enormous amount of capital invested in that manufacture would be thrown upon the market, and the progress of education arrested by the closing of every strangling gymnasium in the land. Nay, strangling as a condition precedent to plunder, would be defended on principles of mercy and humanity, for the passenger (it would be argued) was in this way placed beyond the reach of pain or suffering, previous to being stripped, and not thrown, as in England or Arabia, naked, shivering, and in despair, to the world, and the north-east wind. It would be supported on principles of political economy as imposing a gentle and wholesome restraint upon our population, while the civilizing influences of a number of educated gentlemen, (for the Thuggs were kept in thorough training), and religious too (for they acted in the discharge of a solemn duty,) would have been feelingly dwelt upon; influences the more valuable as they were not stationary or moving in confined orbits, like those of resident gentry; but from the locomotive habits of the Thugg visiting and vivifying every corner of the country.

Again, as this comparison might lead to misapprehension, we must protest against being supposed to say one word in praise or disparagement of any religious Communion whatever, and we authorise every Churchman, high or low, to read Papist for Anglican in every paragraph, if he can find a Catholic institution representing even faintly the enormity of this establishment. But returning to our inquiry as to what constitutes the real strength of the Establishment, let us take, for instance, the family of Trench, or Knox, or Beresford—First then compare the amount of revenue enjoyed by the clerical members of each family directly, as members or dignitaries of the Established Church; secondly, calculate the provision they are enabled to make for every member of their families, male and female, presenting Charles to this living and marrying Charlotte to that; and thirdly, endeavour to estimate the amount of influence growing out of these circumstances, when it is considered that the dispensers of Church patronage are also the lords of the soil, understanding the application of every form of pressure to the refractory or of seduction to the reluctant, and we shall have some idea of the task which has to be accomplished in the suppression of this establishment. The religious question is the least troublesome ingredient in the difficulty. The Church is a profession like any other, but the practice is secured to the Anglicans by patent, and we should not be altogether averse to buying up the patent—a peerage would silence many an opponent, and if we gave money compensation to West-Indian Shareholders, why not to the Irish Patrons? The thing has to be done, and it is our part to consider the safest, the most quiet, and most expeditious way of doing it. We should be most anxious to live in peace with all our fellow subjects, and provided our object can be attained, we are not much concerned in the means, if honorable, or the expense, however great.

There has been a general lull in politics for some years as every one knows, produced, in a great measure we believe, by the confusion of party relations, consequent on the repeal of the Corn Laws, and to some extent also by the absorbing interest of the late war. Hence the absence of excitement or agitation from Ireland is not the eventful phenomenon that was supposed; and a narrow observer will see that at no period has there been anything like an acquiescence in the present ecclesiastical arrangement, and that the conviction of its instability has grown upon those most adverse to agitation, at the precise time when there seemed least prospect of a movement, in that or in any other direction. This feeling found expression in a publication remarkable for the calmness of its temper, and the moderation of its views—a publication rarely venturing into politics, and handling the most exciting topics with a sobriety and measure that find few imitators at the press. Taken therefore as the representative of Catholic feeling in those whose habits and associations are all friendly to repose, and whose moderation is in our opinion by no means the most servicable of their many good qualities, the “Dublin Review,” when it deals in language of unusual warmth and recommends measures of unusual strength, may be considered to speak under influences more searching, and more controlling than would be necessary to move the depths of a less composed and even temper. The passage we are about to transcribe would probably not be regarded as too quiet, even for our own pages, but with reference to the source from which it is taken, and to the time at which it was written, we claim for it a distinct and very emphatic significance, as shewing that the determination to do away with the Establishment is not confined to one class of men, to one tribe of writers, to periods of fever, or the reign of the dog-star, but that it is the settled determination of quiet men, whose heads are cool, and whose pulse keeps time, to work for the uprooting of the English Establishment in Ireland. Alluding to the ineffectual protest of Sir Theobald Butler, at the bar of the Irish House of Commons against the violation of the Treaty of Limerick as described by Sheil whose life was under notice, the writer in the “Dublin Review” goes on to say:—

It is with the solemnity of a deep conviction, verging on the melancholy of as deep a foreboding, that we say there are millions of our fellow subjects as pitiless, as remorseless, as inaccessible to reason, as obdurate to prayer as the parliament that heard those words and passed that law. In the obscurest walks of our own professional toil (for like the subject of our Memoir, the duties of Theobald Butler have been committed to us, though unworthy) we see that righteous Nemesis, the Incumbered Estates Commission, drive its ploughshare through the boundaries of ill-gotten estates, turning up at every step memorials of that impious statute, against which Butler invoked the name of God, the faith of treaties, and the bowels of humanity is vain; as in vain perhaps he would invoke the same to-day before a similar assembly in another place. Assuredly, it is not wise for Mr. Napier, when he sanctions meetings where they tell us our religion was fabricated in hell, to put us upon bringing to mind the introduction of his own. He must be ashamed of it himself. The child of irregular love is made to blush when his parents are but named, and the right-minded Protestant in Ireland must blush at the origin of his establishment. In Scotland, the Reformation as a movement was hearty, popular, and almost universal. In England, if we scruple to allow the Protestant Establishment the title of a National Church, we cannot deny it the proportions, and magnificent ones, too, of a national Apostasy. It has been tried, if not purified by adversity and persecution; and what is most important, politically speaking, it has its reason of existence in belonging to an entire people. But here, the offspring of violence, it still lives by rapine; the hymn of its nativity was pealed in every sound of human woe; its progress might be traced, not in the blood of the evangelizers, but of the evangelized; its gospel devoted our heads to destruction; and if the destruction has been stayed, to God alone be the glory, for our apostles did their worst. Ask individual Protestants how their ancestors came to profess the reformed religion, and you may learn from one how his father took the sacrament in the college chapel, and a scholarship in the college theatre at short intervals. Another will tell you, his progenitor, in the undoubted exercise of private judgment, interpreted literally the text of Scripture that exhorts you to hate your father for God's sake, and by recanting his error antedated his succession—a large class would inform you that the Protestant founders of their houses belonged to no family in particular, and were converted to the pure reformed faith whatever that be, in the foundling hospital: while the ancestors of all not included in these categories established themselves in a way less disgraceful, but not more evangelical. They were sincere Protestants who owed their land to their convictions and not their convictions to their land, they dispossessed the original owners less by process of law than process of arms, and availed themselves largely, as their descendants would to-day, of the missionary labours of dragoons and hangmen. These in their turn have given way to missionaries of a different stamp, to men who establish corner houses of spiritual infamy; who lie in wait to crimp unwary souls, and to assail the virtue of the hungry with bread; who always begin conversion by corruption, season manna with onions, and think they have secured a valuable auxiliary when they take the devil into the pay of the Almighty. It certainly is not our fault if these things are put forward thus broadly for the first time after a lapse of more than a quarter of a century, and even now if a word has escaped us offensive to any variety of Protestants, as a religious body, we can only say it was perfectly unintentional. If Mr. Spooner and Mr. Chambers on the other side of the Channel, and Mr. Napier with Mr. Whiteside on this, have determined to precipitate a crisis, the blame be on their heads. Before Emancipation and since, we have had Catholic meetings of all complexions and dimensions, from the knot of idlers in a chapel yard to the million at Tara. Some have been professedly Catholic, others political in purpose but Catholic in constitution ; and we think it can be said on the part of the country, that, neither in placard nor in speech, though both may have been inflammatory and ill-advised, was there placed deliberately, or perhaps at all, a single insulting phrase, a solitary denunciation, or a random sneer, against the confessional peculiarities of Protestants. On the other hand, we could no more calculate the amount of filth that has been showered upon us daily, that is to say upon our faith and doctrine, even as apart from ourselves, than we could investigate off-hand any of those problems so interesting to newspaper statisticians, such as the area which the national debt would cover in penny-pieces. Not content with the injury and dishonour which attach to the bare presence of the Establishment amongst us, the patrons of that institution assail our most sacred mysteries in language that, to say the least of it, can serve no other purpose than that of exasperation. As to the Rotunda oratory, we shall only say that it is almost too rank for the digestion of Exeter Hall. The placards that flare upon the walls, the hand-bills that are fluttered in our faces, the advertisements that figure between the miracles of Holloway and the poetry of Hyam, exhausting the varieties of indecency to create new varieties of insult, cannot but have some effect. It will not be to no purpose that Mr. Justice Crampton thinks it becoming to patronise Gavazzi, Mr. Napier to associate with Fleury, and Mr. Disraeli to acknowledge Gregg. Whatever may come of the intolerant temper of England, we ought not to regret the attitude assumed by Irish Protestantism on the question of Maynooth and every other ; it should not give us pain to hear the treble pipe of Irish malignity above the surly roar of English bigotry. The thing is not without its significance and its use, for on the one hand it bespeaks the dotage and foretokens the downfall of a tyranny the most crooked and decrepit that exists, while on the other, it shows us that the only way to redress the mendacious grievances of the Establishment in Ireland is to finish with its audacious existence. Its proceedings are strongly suggestive of the throwing down the coat, that form of challenge now happily obsolete, but once not unfamiliar to the citizens of every Irish town. The coat in question has already suffered in the service, and it would have been no superfluous tenderness to spare it the treatment such a defiance is likely to provoke, for we are greatly mistaken and shall be greatly disappointed if the Irish nation do not accept the challenge and trample down the coat till they stain it with the variation of every soil on every highway on the Island.

Again, upon the evidence quoted, may we not appeal to England and Ireland, to angels and to men, whether the Church establishment is to be endured amongst us longer ? Anti-national, it is a loathing to the people whose name it usurps ; anti-social, it alone is every day killing amongst us the charities of life ; anti-Christian, it effaces in us all the distinctive marks set by the Redeemer on His followers, that of loving one another. It is not easy to speak with temper upon such a subject, but the contempt in which every Irishman must hold himself for having endured so long the presence of the Establishment ought to forbid any feeling of his to reach the dignity of indignation. There it stands, mocking at us from behind the skirts of the Queen, whose name it dishonours, trusting forth its impudent forehead and lolling out its obscene tongue before the insulted country. It is not less insatiable or thankless in its greed or more full for feasting now, than it was three-hundred years ago. Our substance is drawn off for its luxury not for its nourishment, the blood it circulated was always tainted, and meat serves only to pamper its distemper. Certainly, a tenderness less resolute than that of its nursing fathers would have abandoned the infirm nursing long ago, but they appear to have acted on the excellent advice of Horace, to regard the natural defects or moral vices of one's friend as amiable weaknesses, and qualify them with terms of endearment. They looked upon the rickets of their infant Church as pretty helplessness, and for then she snuffed with a grace peculiarly her own; when she cried for the moon she was appeased with substantial acres of the earth; when her cravings were too irregular, ingenuity was tortured to amuse their extravagance; she clamoured for a peculiar mutilation of our priests, and a penal law scarce less stimulating with difficulty found acceptance; if she swallow Maynooth she has stomach for Emancipation.

It is well for us who can afford to be merry upon such a subject, but, merry or sad, we must put the question to ourselves, are we to remain for centuries longer in presence with a corporation, the inheritor of such traditions, and the child of such a nurture? Can the same island contain the Catholic nation and the Protestant Establishment, or have we strength enough to say to that institution as Philip of Macedon said to the Olynthians, either you or we must quit? If we say this, and mean it, the worst part of the alternative will not fall to the nation. We must first set it before ourselves, and then it will be apparent to others that we will not allow the present state of things to last; [allow must be the word],—that our Protestant countrymen have as good a right to their country and to room for their Church in it as we, but that the clerical infamy known as the Establishment we will no longer tolerate. It is ignoble to stand on the defensive, but it is bad strategy besides. Nothing is more wearisome, more trying to the energies, or more exhausting to the spirits, than constant resistance. If we are satisfied with such a system—ville assiégée ville prise—Maynooth will fall first, as the most exposed outwork—our liberties will be taken in detail—and a very few years will see us utterly vanquished by the sheer tedium of resistance, and the conquests of O'Connell and Sheil a memory and a myth. To illustrate the fatuity of such a course we have a comparison at hand that ought to come home to the English mind, as being at once classical and national. "The policy of those," says Demosthenes, "who do not take proper measures for attack differs in nothing from a barbarian's style of pugilism. The barbarian, instead of meeting his antagonist with a careful fence and planting vigorous touches of offence when occasion offers, no sooner feels a blow than he claps his hand on the bruise until he is roused by another application of the glove to repeat the manoeuvre in another place."—Surely we cannot afford to do this—if we hold back or stumble now we are lost.

A few years ago, the Establishment fleshed its fasting tooth in the titles of Irish bishops, though no one alleged they had offended in the matter, and now, like an animal of savage nature, having once tasted blood it becomes irreclaimable.—Its jealousy was then aroused by a papal rescript—at present Maynooth is the national sin,—next day, by the sequence of an inevitable logic, the national guilt will be transferred to our mummifying ceremonies—cut them down, and the impiety of our Mariolatry will draw judgment upon the land—but how horrible the prevarication to permit the public exercise of a worship which the sovereign solemnly swears to be damnable and idolatrous. This is what the Establishment will effect if we give it the advantage by our supineness, but if we grapple with it the danger is infinitely diminished. It has no real strength, because its power is from without, whereas “all the glory of the king’s daughter is from within.” Whether scoffing like Satan in his pride, or hissing like Satan in his humiliation, whether it strut a swaggering Briareus with a hundred hands, or crawl an angry insect upon a hundred legs—it is weak withal, for the giant is stuffed and you may set your foot upon the insect.—No doubt endurance is sometimes less grievous than resistance, and to suffer more profitable than to strive—but here we are quiescent at our peril—the object of the enemy is at least avowed—there is to be no peace with Rome until devotion to Mary is forgotten like the worship of Astarte, and a Catholic as unusual a phenomenon as a Gheber,—they strike the shepherds that the sheep may be dispersed, and they will not forbear till the country is thoroughly purified from that kind of animal ὅπως ἡ χώρα τοῦ τούτου λαοῦ καθαρεύηται το παρὰπαν. And we eat and drink and are glad, and we marry and give in marriage, while this is being carried out around us, amongst us, and by us, for inaction when action may avail is equivalent to co-operation. Resignation to other grievances is often advisable and occasionally virtuous, but this one of the Establishment being even more a dishonour than a wrong, to endure it patiently is not longanimity but cretinism, and when we take into account the active and effective hostility of the Establishment to our dearest interests, spiritual and civil, the stupidity of our own endurance is the most startling anomaly where everything is anomalous.

All this is known to the fanatics in England, and they can hardly be wrong in supposing that a nation which is passive under such a wrong will submit to any other. They know as well as we that in the diocese of London alone there are more Protestants of the Established confession than in all Ireland. They know, furthermore, that in the lately created diocese of Manchester, the Anglicans are within 50,000 of our entire Protestant population. They know, too, that the population of the city of New York is as numerous, and that of Paris twice as numerous as the communicants of the Establishment in Ireland, and yet they see us allow that sprinkling, the ministration of twelve bishops, thirty-three deans, twenty-six precentors, twenty-two chancellors, twenty-one treasurers thirty-four archdeacons, one hundred and seventy-eight prebends, nine canons, and working clergy in proportion, as far as any of them can be said to work. Not to speak of London at all, the Bishop of Manchester does the entire work of the Irish staff for so small a consideration as £4,500, without at all satisfying people that they have value for their money. Let the English Establishment be regulated on the Irish scale, and it will require forty archbishops and two hundred bishops; for taking the English Protestants to be twenty times as numerous as the Irish, they ought to have twenty times as many bishops, that is to say, two hundred and forty, of whom forty metropolitans, making in all nine times and a fraction their actual amount of bishops. The inferior clergy being proportionably increased, the church revenues should rise to the modest figure of thirty-two millions sterling, or rather better than nine times the present amount, which, according to the lowest estimate, that of Mr. Johnston, in his "England as it is," reaches £3,500,000. Or suppose we invert the proportions, as was done by the Edinburgh Review in 1839, the Irish ought to have, not as that periodical proposed, one archbishop and three bishops, but one bishop and a decimal. To what purpose, however, is it that men know all this if we suffer them to believe it gives us no concern? It has already been said, and with great show of reason, that we are satisfied because we do not complain, nor is it for us to complain now, but to show our determination to right all our wrongs, and this one first of all as foremost in our abhorrence, as most injurious and most degrading. If we are resolute, the path is smoother than men supposed for the adjustment of our differences. What was pleasantly called the Irish Church is acknowledged upon all hands to have no existence, but there is talk of a certain Irish branch of a certain united Church of England and Ireland, pursuant to the statute in that case made and provided. This being so, it can be no ground of complaint that we recommend or even enforce, a stricter union between the branch and the trunk. Railways and steam-packets exist for the Establishment as well as for everything else, and even should the tubular bridge not facilitate so much as was expected the flight of the viceroyalty, we hope to see the day when the Establishment at least will vanish along its galleries, and bear away with it the evil passions, the sanguinary recollections, and sordid interests upon which it lived. There can be nothing to prevent Dr. Sumner, the Patriarch of the British Island, as we remember to have heard him called by the University, from withdrawing his Irish vicars as soon as we insist upon it. Let him share the Metropolitans jurisdiction with York if he think fit, and give the suffragans to whom he likes in England. This would be to cement the union in very deed. The Irish branch would then be something; not a sickly slip starving under an inclement sky, and struggling to break an obdurate soil, but grafted on a majestic trunk, refreshed with vigorous sap, and clothed with flowers and fruit in season.

These are the convictions that force themselves upon our minds, and this is the lesson we should wish to see conveyed by the books under review, which give a full and faithful picture not only of Shel's own labours and triumphs, but of the passions, the struggles, and the characters amongst which he lived. Had the Establishment been satisfied to accept with more or less of an ill grace the changes brought to pass by O'Connell and Sheil, some of them unfortunately too favourable for itself, had it even confined itself to moderate and legitimate hostility, our course might have been different, but when a determination is shewn to strip us of rights, the prize of weary labours, and sacrifices beyond reckoning; when we are driven to that point that we must advance or fall, we cannot choose but advance—Survam corda, therefore. The Catholics of Ireland have only to remember, that they are the nation, and they will be sure to act in this matter with the dignity, the gravity, and the decision of a nation. They are appealed to in the name of every motive that can sanctify a struggle, that can make resentment virtuous, and quietude a crime. As they cherish the memory of the dead, as they prize the triumphs of the living, as they tender the hopes of those that are to come, they are adjured to remember the wrongs of their fathers, to hold fast the rights that have been won, to bequeath to their children the remembrance of the one and the possession of the other. We have pointed to their confiscated lands, to their invaded temples, to their massacred priests, to broken treaties, and parrioidal laws, not to inflame animosity or stimulate retaliation, but as an admonition that the Church, which has survived all this, must not be suffered to lie at the feet of petty persecutors; that she who has not suffered the lion to destroy her, must not stand to be devoured by the wolf. Victorious over Cromwell, it cannot be her fate to yield to Spooner. If, on the other hand, we content ourselves with a timid, apologetic, unconnected, fretful resistance to attacks that are deadly, because they are linked and systematic, the world will despise us, but not so much as we shall despise ourselves; posterity will execrate us, but not so bitterly as we shall curse ourselves, and in presence of a nation degraded, divided, and oppressed; a Church mutilated manacled, and useless, or worse; with every chain new-riveted, every wrong become immortal, every vice ingrained; we shall be afflicted by the damning consciousness that all has been the work not more of hostile fanaticism than of domestic corruption.

To us, indeed, it appears an abuse of language to speak of the Irish institution as a Church Establishment. It is an established fiction, an established tax, an established scandal, an established provocation, established discord, conquest in permanence, provincialism in perpetuum, but not an Established Church. It is an abstraction of the law; it pushes us from our seats like the plaintiff "Thrust-out" in the old action of ejectment. It is supposed to be present in the island as "the Queen herself in person" is supposed to reside perpetually in her Court of Queen's Bench, with this difference, that justice is dispensed in the imaginary presence of the Queen, and plunder committed in the imaginary presence of the Church. Take the whole thing alleged to constitute the Church established—stone, clay, stubble, men, money, and bayonets—it does not bear the same relation to a real Church that the unicorn and the lion on the judgment-seat do the Queen herself in person. The latter are the acknowledged emblem of a real authority, the former the rejected badge of an odious usurpation. Before an institution can be called the Established Church of a country, it must be, in some sense, the Church of the people of that country, or of a considerable majority. However, when Lord Palmerston insinuates into discussions upon this subject the abstract question of established churches, he raises a distinct and irrelevant issue. The Established Church of a country stands to that country in the two-fold relation, first, of a Church, and, secondly, of an Establishment. It must, in practice, perform the duties of a Church more or less well, or more or less ill, to the country generally, not to a city, or province, or race, or regiment, or garrison, but to the country; and then, being so related to the country, it must also contract those relations with the state which are popularly considered to constitute it an establishment. It may be a question whether what is already the Church of a country should also exist as an Establishment, and that is the real meaning of the issue tendered by Lord Palmerston when he says, "are we to have an Established Church or not?" an issue, too, which the members of Mr. Miall's association may readily accept as far as England is concerned. But that is not the question to be dealt with as relates to Ireland. It is our case that it is impossible to have an Established Church in Ireland, and that if the attempt to establish any form of religion in that country were now to be made for the first time, no man would undertake the task. We do not say to Parliament, abolish the Established Church—we maintain, on the contrary, there is no Established Church, and can be none in Ireland. We call upon it to abolish the pretence of an Established Church which can neither confer the same benefits, nor be subject to the same infirmities, as an Established Church, properly understood; and, consequently, cannot be assailed or defended by the same arguments. To us it is a phantom, and no more, but a phantom which must be conquered; a phantom more tyrannous and noxious than the substance of any Established Church, Roman, Russian, Lutheran, Mormon, or Mussulman. England, indeed, has lately been styled by the Times "the first Mussulman power in the world." We never suspected it, and the news is many degrees too good to be true. Had it been so, our position should have been very different. St. Patrick's and

Christ's Church would have been converted into mosques, but every one knows their actual appropriation is quite as offensive to the right owners; and it is certain our worship never should have been made a felony, or a Catholic congregation have fallen through the loft of an old house, and been crushed into paste by the ruins, while serving God against the peace of Our Sovereign Lord the King, and contrary to the provisions of the statutes (gracious Heaven! what statutes!) in that case made and provided. Most positively, the muftis never would have claimed to be the rightful successors of our priests, and to hold our church property by any other than the distinct and well understood law of conquest. Nay more, so far from a price being set upon the heads or mutilation voted for a different extremity of our bishops and priests, their position would have been recognised and protected by Ottoman England. Justice in a technical sense would have been administered much as it has been, under either system; but, from the comparative mildness of the Ottoman government, and its deficiency in the refinement of wickedness that marked the penal laws, we should have gradually monopolized the industry and wealth of the empire, gradually become its bankers and its pay-masters, gradually have bound its kings in bonds under seal, and its nobles in fetters of piastres. There should have been no law to set aside the fourth Commandment and to foster parricide by bounties. Instead of being first tempted to enlist, and then whipped to go to Mosque, we should have been exempted from military service altogether. Finally, it would have been our destiny to attract the interest and protection of some imperial co-religionist, whose ambassador, after a brief visit to Windsor, in jack-boots, and smacking his horsewhip in the face of the Sultan,—there could be no lady in the case as at present,—would take an outlying county of Scotland by way of material guarantee for the security of our privileges. A great Greek and a great Protestant power would, of course, grow jealous of our protector, and Catholic, Greek, Protestant and Turk rush madly into war about us, blessed and interesting Rayahs. Meanwhile, our comparatively gentle tyrant, impoverished, demoralized, and brought into contempt by himself, the enemy, and the allies, would finally have consented to bestow all imaginable benefits upon the Rayahs, from his own spontaneous and inexhaustible benignity. All the belligerents would have shaken hands. Palmerston Pasha would have drafted a hatti-sheiff of the balmiest description,—the Sultan would have signed it with the most paternal eagerness, and the Sheik-ul-Islam himself have proclaimed it in the great mosque of Canterbury, though not without scruples of conscience, and, most likely, under protest. England is not the first Mussulman power, but, in this vile Irish business, something unimaginably worse.

It is not in the way of argument that we think it right to notice the line of defence usually taken by the supporters of the Establishment. We believe that the parties principally concerned have reached a convenient and intelligible understanding that enables them to dispense with anything like argument or its abuse. The Establishment is determined to hold its ground, and we are equally determined to get rid of it when we can. The arguments of many a former debate upon this subject have been embalmed, mummy-clothed and consigned to Hansard; duplicate arguments will undergo a similar process; triplicates will appear and disappear in course of time; but although disclaiming the intention of dealing with these specimens as arguments of any kind, and although there is a tacit agreement upon all hands to treat them as purely conventional, we think it will not be found useless to examine one or two, - not as things to be refuted, but merely as features of the Establishment, as things partaking of its truth, its virtue, its reality. The present church property, it is said, belongs of right to the Establishment because the Irish were originally sound Protestants a thousand years before the confession of Augsburg, because the endowments created in that recent period were, it is well ascertained, Protestant endowments; and because they have simply reverted to the real owners. For about four hundred years of this period the Irish people, lay and clerical, are admitted on all hands to have been steadfast and zealous Romanists, when at length the bishops, under considerable pressure to be sure, suddenly fell back upon Protestantism; holding fast however by the endowments, and persecuting their flocks who objected to the change, with fire, rack, pincers, sword, screw-boots, thumb-press, scavenger's daughter, little ease, fines, confiscations, and a variety of Apostolic agencies unknown to primitive rudeness. Under these circumstances the Protestant clergy, the legitimate successors of the Catholics, are clearly entitled in possession to any amount of endowments without the cure of souls.

A good deal of the historical part of the argument will of course be denied, but we are willing for peace sake to make any supposition that will be required of us. We have not the slightest objection, for instance, to admit that St. Patrick was a gentleman, in that strict sense of the word which implies gentle descent. Sinking our private opinion as to his parentage and place of birth, we grant at once and without reference to the herald's office, that his paternal ancestors are to be found in the noble family of Lismore, and his maternal in that of our excellent Lord Chancellor. His birth place we freely allow to have been the loyal town of Enniskillen, and accept, less readily perhaps, the tradition which connects the name of one of his parents with the retail spirit trade ; consoled as we are by the reflection that a less reputable bar than that of a Shebeen house is not uncommon in heraldry. Furthermore we are prepared to grant that he was an uncompromising Protestant, and converted the whole island to the Protestant faith or faiths unknown sometime about the year five hundred. We shall pass over the evidence of communion between the Protestant Church of Ireland, and the Roman Church of those periods, supplied by the writers of the time, who, we shall suppose were all in a conspiracy against the known truth, and against posterity as represented by Messrs. Napier and Hamilton. It will then stand thus. A wild and independent nation split up into petty sovereignties, and in no respect wilder or more independent of all law or restraint, than in its religion, is invaded by a foreign power. That power does not complete its conquest, for more than four hundred years. During that interval, the most implacable hatred, and the most barbarous hostilities, characterize the intercourse of the two nations, and yet we are required to admit, and for the purposes of this paper are ready to admit, that although the invaded resisted the temporal sovereignty of the invaders, during four centuries, they accepted in less than four months without struggle or remonstrance a new and foreign religion at the hands of those same invaders, whose very commission to invade them was from the head of that new and strange religion. Not one of the native bishops or clergy who thus came, per saltum from Protestantism to Romanism spoke one word of English or French ; and although in the course of time the invaders appointed bishops who could not speak Irish, yet as late as the Reformation, not a dozen of the second order of the clergy converted in this mysterious way could speak the invader's language. It is not suggested by what supernal or infernal agency the revolution was effected. There is nothing like it in history or romance. We may with less improbability suppose the Emperor of the French to land an army in England, under a commission from Pius IX, [that would be a papal aggression,] defeat the Queen's troops in a pitched battle, establish himself in one or two counties, and convert the entire island, Bishops, Ministers and Laity to Catholicism, without disarming the hostility of the country to himself or his nation in the slightest degree. Nevertheless we admit that Henry II. did all this and more. What then? There certainly never was agreement more spontaneous, unanimous or cordial, than that between the native clergy and people for this acceptance of the Roman religion. It was ratified by a perpetual accord for four hundred years, when at the end of that period, the foreign King thought proper to decree a change of religion, and the Bishops, some of them at all events, thought proper to obey him—say they all did so. Grant that every man of the clergy, which is more than is asked of us, conformed to Henryism or Edwardism, or Elizabethism,—will it therefore appear, that while the entire laity resisted and protested, the clergy could be justified in retaining the property committed to them upon trusts, still insisted upon by those for and by whom the trusts had been created?

We do not attempt an answer to this question, but we put a similar case, and suppose for one moment that the Jesuit who fills the see of Oxford should by some means known and available to the order alone, procure an appointment as tutor to the Prince of Wales, and succeed in tainting the mind of the heir-apparent first with Puseyism and next with Romanism. It only carries us a step further to imagine that the heir-apparent having at length come to the throne and being in due time affiliated to the same order as his teacher, undertakes to subvert the Protestant religion as by law established. He is a better tactician than James; he continues a professing Protestant, and gradually fills every vacant benefice in the gift of the Crown, including of course all the Bishoprics, with Jesuits in disguise, promoting perhaps Mr. Miall to the See of Canterbury. Meanwhile he uses court influence to advance open conversion amongst the gentry, although perhaps affecting to discourage it, and finally procures a vote of both Houses, repealing so much of the act of settlement as is oppressive to the royal conscience. To provide against all contingencies, he quietly negotiates a considerable loan with some of the Catholic powers to make him independent of Parliament for a few years to come, and at length, without the slightest appearance of illegality, restores to Convocation entire liberty of action, knowing before-hand that the first vote of that body will be a return to the Roman faith. His Majesty receives the vote most graciously; assents to it; hears Mass himself in his private chapel ; in the course of a few days, re-establishes the Roman worship in every Church in the kingdom ; and procures a ratification of the whole procedure by a resolution of the Houses of Parliament. Meanwhile the people are more thoroughly Protestant than ever. Westminster Abbey on Sundays is given up to half-a-dozen of papists, who really go to worship, and half-a-dozen of idlers who go to hear the music, the Protestants being obliged to build churches at enormous expense, not half so spacious or convenient as those of which they have been dispossessed. The Protestant charities administered by the clergy while Protestant, are held by the clergy become Romanist, and the people are still obliged to keep up that apostate clergy, as well as to support the Protestant clergy that came to supply their place ; to maintain the confiscated charities, and to establish new charities ; to build new schools, alms houses, orphan houses, and hospitals in the stead of those retained by the perverts ; and all this simply because the property in question was the property of the Church, that is to say, of the ecclesiastics, and because the people had nothing to say to it. How long would English Protestants submit to this logic ? Would they deal with it by argument ? Would they be baffled by technicalities ? Would they listen to little lawyers, little rhetoricians or little statesmen ? Again, we offer no answer—the case is an imaginary, an impossible one perhaps, but neither so fanciful in its conception nor so impossible in execution as the supposed conversion of the Irish to Catholicism, by Henry II. in the course of a day ; nor would the right of the new Catholics of England to the present church property be one atom less substantial than that of the Anglican Establishment in Ireland, to the Church property claimed and enjoyed by it at the present time. Need we say that St. Patrick's, and Christ's Church, in Dublin, St. Canice's in Kilkenny, St. Nicholas' in Galway, and dozens of Churches that we could name in the centre of exclusively Catholic districts, are not caricatured by the picture we have drawn of Westminster Abbey in our imaginary case ? Need we say it is a scandal that the public money should be expended in building and repairing those cosey boxes with their rakish little steeples and smug stove-chimneys that we see scattered over the country for the accommodation of about twenty people, upon a liberal average, in parishes of twenty thousand souls, that are obliged to build their own churches and support their own clergy, not out of their abundance, but out of their misery ?

Again, we forbear to suggest an answer, submitting it merely to our English friends, whether the people who rely upon such arguments really expect or deserve any answer, other than being pushed aside the moment we have strength enough for the task.

In our last article we touched upon the question of the oath taken by Catholics, with respect to the Established Church, an oath on which its supporters appear to rely so strongly, and with the violation of which Catholics who forward the present or any similar movement are sure to be taxed. We feel somewhat penitent for having dealt so seriously with the amiable people who speak so reverently of their own oaths and so charitably of ours. We should be sorry to charge any one with a wilful violation of his oath, but were we in the same temper of mind, that we observe in others, and guided by the same rules of morality that govern the conduct of many, we should not hesitate to venture a free opinion of the man who affirms upon oath, that the Pope has no spiritual or ecclesiastical authority within the realm; knowing as he does all the while and often complaining in good set terms, that the Pope does exercise a real, substantial, visible, and tangible authority in every corner of the kingdom. What can be thought of the man who, after taking this oath, indignantly proclaims that the Pope reigns over the consciences of millions of British subjects; that he withdraws them from their natural allegiance; that he says to one, come here, and he cometh, and to another, do this, and he doth it; that he gives license to sin according to a sliding scale, and has a tariff of iniquity in his spiritual custom-houses; that upon payment of the proper fee you can have a dispensation for anything, from blowing up an opponent in metaphor to blowing up the Houses of Parliament in fact; and that so far from the Pope having no temporal power in the Kingdom, he issues his writs from under the fishermen's ring for the election of members of the House of Commons? One nobleman in the entire Empire, a Protestant of no doubtful hue, but honest and of tender conscience, was sensible for a time, of the absurdity and impiety of this oath. His scruples, however, have been calmed, by what process it is impossible to say, and Lord Clancarty takes the oaths and his seat with as little remorse as Lord Campbell or any other Scot that knows when he is well off. We are far indeed from insinuating that his doubts have not been set at rest, or that his conscience is uneasy, but surely it would not become him, for instance, to complain that another man had adopted a construction of an oath. For our own part, it is nothing in the nature of things, no excuse we can ourselves frame, no explanation we have heard suggested by others, but charity merely that keeps us from imputing moral guilt to those who take the oath in question. The more exaggerated the Protestantism of the party, the greater is the seeming delinquency. We have an intimate conviction that the large majority of Protestants who take this oath are as free from perjury as we hope we are ourselves, but we have no reason to allege beyond that naked conviction; it is the faith that is within us, and no more—Upon external evidence there is no distinction, or perhaps a very unfortunate one, between the man who takes this oath for a seat in Parliament, and the man who swears an alibi for a shilling or a pint.

But we have to deal with another aspect of the oath, under which we are bound not to use our privileges for the subversion or destruction of the Established Church. Those who maintain that by voting for its disendowment the Catholic violates his oath, assert by a necessary implication that the disendowment of their religion is equivalent to its destruction, that rent-charge and Church are convertible terms, that religion without glebe is shadow without substance, that minister without minister's money is an abstraction and a myth, that parson and tithe-pig are one and indivisible. "Two scholars were fellow travellers from Pennafiel to Salamanca," says Lesage. "Finding themselves tired and thirsty, they halted near a fountain on the road side. While resting for a few moments, after having quenched their thirst, they chanced to notice upon a stone level with the earth some words, already a little effaced by time and by the feet of the flocks which came to water at the spring. Having washed the stone, they read the following Spanish inscription:—A qui està encerrada el Alma del licenciado Pedro Garcias—here lieth buried the soul of the licentiate Pedro Garcias. The younger of the scholars being abrupt and thoughtless, no sooner read the inscription than he laughed outright—'What a quiz!' he said, 'here lieth buried the soul—I should like to see the genius that wrote this comical epitaph:' and with that he went his way. His more thoughtful companion, however, said to himself, 'there must be some mystery here, I shall remain to clear it up.' Accordingly he allowed his companion to go, and then without loss of time set to work with his knife all round the stone, until he succeeded in removing it. He found underneath a leathern purse which he opened. It contained one hundred ducats * * * * * and the scholar, delighted at his discovery, replaced the stone, and took to the Salamanca road again with the soul of the licentiate."

No Irish member of the Establishment, we think, will apply the moral to his own Church, or say that its temporalities are its soul, that without them it has no principle of life, and consequently cannot live apart from them. He will not admit that his Church is bound to the soil like the Tyrian Hercules by a golden chain, and that she cannot choose but fly if it be severed. He will not liken her to the Venus in Brocade and Diamonds whom the artist painted rich because he could not make her beautiful. He could do nothing of all this: and if so, what becomes of the Catholic Oath? Where are the perjury and subornation of perjury? Does he really believe the uncommon nonsense he has been writing, talking, and flinging into the face of history, daily experience and common sense? Does he deserve to be answered? Is he to be dignified with refutation? is he worth rebuke? Is he penetrable to conviction? Is he of account at all?

We do not pretend to notice all the questions raised by Mr. Miall's agitation, and still less to count up all the disadvantages which though properly considered accidents of the position of the Establishment in Ireland, are not the less real or serious on that account. We have preferred dealing in the present instance with its essential enormity, with its necessary immorality, and with its abstract injustice. These are sufficient to bring it within the reach of the voluntary principle, and to attract the operations of the society which has taken upon itself to teach and to enforce the application of that principle. The interest of the Empire in the settlement of this Irish question is scarcely less considerable than that of Ireland whose individual concern it is. The Establishment is the one remaining cause of estrangement between the countries, it is the one worst and most exasperating wrong during the continuance of which no past injustice of England can be expiated, and upon whose cessation Ireland, that is, all Ireland will feel for the first time that she is a portion of the United Kingdom or even a favoured Colony. Let people say what they please, it cannot be sound policy to perpetuate a wrong, redress of which from any quarter must inevitably be welcome to the people at large. Judges in esse, or in posse; placemen, great and small, actual or expectant; the landed and mercantile interests; those who judge for themselves, and those who understand the miseries of war, will not look out with longing for what has been called Ireland's opportunity: but when the opportunity comes none will fail to take advantage of it, and who can tell how near it may be at hand? Our relations with France are amicable but precarious; our good understanding with America depends upon circumstances which no forbearance and perhaps no meanness upon our part can shape to our wishes. The preservation of the Union will ever be the paramount care of an American statesman, as the preservation of internal tranquillity must be that of a French ruler. Much of what has been ascribed to the personal ambition of Napoleon I. may be traced to the necessity under which he found himself of strengthening the hands of the Executive for the repression of disorder at home, by having at his disposal an army not the mere creature of discipline but the darling of victory. The same necessity may soon exist again in both countries, a necessity completely overriding every interest of commerce, every danger to general prosperity, and every inclination of the ruling powers to remain at peace with England. To prevent the disruption of the American Union, the Executive will one day require an army such as we have described, an army fully under the control of the executive power, an army practised in a great war, and of imposing strength. Such an army never could be levied for the purpose of civil war or under pretence of filibustering in Cuba or Mexico.

The war that would place such an army at the command of the Executive in America, should be not merely a popular but a great war; in other words a war with England. Into such a war the most temperate American statesman, the most sensitive of cotton patriots, the largest ship-owner or corn-merchant in the States, would find himself irresistibly drawn. We cannot therefore be persuaded that it would not be worth while to remove the one political wrong that estranges Ireland from England, and to remove it now, not under hostile pressure as heretofore, but by negotiation and arrangement, antedating by some years, gracefully and beneficially, what must be done at a later period, and looking forward to a war with America, not as a contingency but as a certainty more or less remote—or at least as a probability, that should never be omitted from our calculations. One of two events would seem to be inevitable in America, and either of them to be fatal to the maintenance of peace. Either the institution of Slavery will propagate its boundaries, until they include the entire territory of the Republic, but without threatening a severance of the Union ; or else, as is more probable, the integrity of the Union will be endangered by the contest between North and South. In the former case no dependency of an European power, and no independent state in the Western hemisphere will be secure from the lawlessness of American invasion ; in the latter, it can hardly be doubted that any American statesman will look to the preservation of the Union through a war with England. We shall not enter into all the circumstances that would give to such a conflict the character of civil war ; we shall not enlarge upon the relations in which Ireland would stand to both the combatants ; we shall not say how many natural born subjects of the British Crown would find themselves as American citizens in arms against their brethren, and how hard it would be for the Irish mechanic or peasant to look upon them as hostile or ill-intentioned ; it is not our desire to exaggerate any danger or probability of danger ; we are far from saying that the utmost power of America could enable her to land a thousand men upon the island ; but we think, nevertheless, that it is unsound policy to maintain in the country an institution to which in the minds of the majority of the people any alternative would be preferable, and to keep open a sore which cannot fester for ever, which cannot eat upwards and downwards and all round without one day coming to a vital part.

For our own part, we are fully persuaded that nothing but the discreet and vigorous application of political power from Ireland can effect the removal of the Church Establishment. Reason will be yawned at, enthusiasm will be laughed at, vehemence will be stared at, oratory will be perhaps applauded, anger will be called to order, supplication will be despised, but power, and there is a good deal of it in Ireland yet, will be respected and obeyed. That power resides in every one of us, and if each one in the measure of his opportunities were to labour for the subversion of the Establishment, the sum of our efforts individually trifling would be very great. "If every one," somewhere says Demosthenes, "had stood his ground in the battle, the victory would have been ours." To us it is a marvel that any one of the five Catholic journals in Dublin, or any one of the liberal papers in the country, should issue a single number without some attempt upon the Establishment. If the man of studious leisure were to write its history for the enlightenment of opinion at home and abroad—if those who have the gift of speech were to lecture, not to harangue upon its wickedness—if the press, as we have said, were to make it the subject of daily and weekly reprobation—if the clergyman, not as a part of his professional duty, nor in the holy place, but merely as an influential member of society, if fathers of families in their houses, and workmen amongst their comrades, were barely to discuss the subject as a matter of speculative interest, this harmonious diversity of efforts, this large aggregate of individual operations, all tending towards the same direction, although without plan or concert, could not fail to bring about a state of opinion in which the Establishment could find it impossible to live. We do not of course mean an opinion hostile to the establishment—that exists already to a degree quite sufficient for our purpose, but an opinion calling so firmly and so distinctly for action as to make action inevitable. At present we fear that no other course of proceeding than that suggested is open to us in Ireland, and that nothing in the nature of concert or organization is likely to be useful. Would it were otherwise; but we cannot divest ourselves of the fear that an Irish society for any political purpose would take up the antics of its predecessors. We have no doubt it soon would resort to the favourite amusements of drawing swords, flinging away scabbards, nailing colours to the mast, proposing ultimatums, tying itself hand and foot by pledges, and making itself useless in every imaginable way. These things, of course the last excepted, would not be inappropriate in a people of dogged resolution, like the English; or in Ireland, if there were another O'Connell, to exercise the salutary despotism we have mentioned over the Society; but for the present, we hold the thing to be simply impossible, and consequently far better not attempted. On the other hand, however, there can be no objection to the independent action of counties, corporations, parishes, or liberal clubs. The one thing necessary is that the attention of the country should once more be riveted upon this vital question, and that a determination of the very quietest description should grow up in us, to get rid of the Establishment the earliest moment we can, but without fixing the date; and to exert ourselves in an earnest business-like way for the attainment of our object, without any waste of strength or sweat until they are likely to be of some avail.

The final question comes—how are we to deal with Mr. Miall and his society? He offers himself as an able and zealous ally. He represents a society which we think we have accurately described. He represents a principle which is being rapidly diffused and taking deep root ; it is in his power to do us most important service, and his inclination seems to correspond with his power. The party at the head of which he stands in the agitation of the question, is at once the most energetic and the most cool-headed in Parliament. All these advantages he brings with him to the Irish Alliance, and it is a serious duty for those to whom they are offered to take every precaution to estimate them duly. As might be expected there is considerable diversity of opinion. Some not only believe that we should co-operate with Mr. Miall, but recommend that we should enter completely into the spirit of his agitation, adopting all his principles and following his policy implicitly. It is through English opinion alone, they say, that we can hope to reach the Establishment. It must fall by English hands ; help will visit us from beyond the sea, and the liberation we have so unprofitably struggled for at home will come to us. "Graiid minime quod remur ab urbe." Others again having confidence like ourselves in the good intentions, and generally correct views of Mr. Miall, and being anxious to avail themselves of his good offices, are unwilling nevertheless to pass over into his camp and lose their independence of action and their identity, in his party. Some, it must be admitted, but we believe they are not numerous, have no confidence whatever in Mr. Miall and the Non-Conformists, and very many while accepting the voluntary principle, as good in the abstract and suitable to themselves in particular, are not only indifferent to its extension in England, but believe that its enforcement in Ireland is obtainable by the Irish themselves and by them alone. There may of course be other shades of opinion which we are unable to catch, and it is equally of course that some men have such varying complexions of opinion that their changes cannot easily be registered, but on the whole we think our division sufficiently exhaustive, or in other words that it includes every section of politicians proper to be taken into account, those only excepted with whom Mr. Miall and we have nothing in common.

Neither those who adopt Mr. Miall's views exclusively, nor these who refuse him any confidence whatever, are, as far as we can discover, influential from numbers or energy, but with reference to the other sections whose opinions we share, although we have no commission to speak for them, we believe we are right in saying that if Mr. Miall set any value on their support, or have any hope of inducing them to come to a definite understanding with him on the subject of the Anglican Establishment in Ireland, he will abandon his present line of action upon the Maynooth question, and also as regards the Regium Donum. We have already stated and will now for clearness briefly repeat our own objection to the alliance between Mr. Miall and Mr. Spooner. The former knows and will admit he knows, or we are mistaken in our ideas both of his ability and of his honesty, that if the withdrawal of the Maynooth grant be accomplished, it will be owing not in the slightest degree to the respectable principle he advocates and in which we all concur, but to the detestable bigotry lying so profusely under the beautiful surface of the English character, as Milton describes the materials of Satan's artillery to have lain beneath the soil of Heaven. This is sought out and torn up by black and grimy fanatics; it is compounded by demoniacs of a lower order still, by bishop-burning mobs, profane parodists of the catechism, intensely controversial pickpockets, night-walkers of burning Protestantism. It is retailed for the profit of more exalted sinners by obscure and disowned agents, by W. B. and others of the trade who in this way at least have emerged from their obscurity and been damned to everlasting fame; it is exploded by men whose more especial duty is supposed to be the diffusion of charity and peace; it is, we repeat, the sole moving power in the anti-Maynooth campaign; to it alone the victory must be due; and if Mr. Miall continue to defile himself by contact with the men who are engaged in this abominable traffic, he cannot fail to create disgust amongst those to whom he is looking for support. The Irish Catholic cares less for the Maynooth endowment than Mr. Miall can at all imagine; but rightly interpreting the anti-Maynooth agitation as an outrage, a defiance, a declaration of war, an actual war, as in fact all that it is intended to be; he not only resists it as he is bound to do in honour and in conscience, but he must identify with its authors all those who persevere in co-operating with them: and if he be compelled to acknowledge the purity of their motives, he cannot but question the soundness of their understanding. As to the Irish Presbyterians, we shall suffer them to speak for themselves by their clever organ the "Northern Whig." They give expression to some opinions upon this subject, our dissent from which we shall take occasion to explain presently, but Mr. Miall will see that his course does not meet their approval, and is not considered as entitling him to their assistance in the way he could wish.

It is quite clear that the Anglican Church ought not to be established in Ireland. But who can show us the way to get rid of it. There it is on the surface—a nuisance and a stupidity; but no one can discover the art of annihilating it. It is the modern Round Tower. It is a conundrum. It is a freak. No one can understand its purpose. It has ceased to be a curiosity. But there it is. You may come to the conclusion that the Pyramids were pyres for Cheops, and you may guess that the Sphinx is a superb practical joke—a statue put in the midst of an arid desert, to grin at the traveller who ventures that far. But you can make nothing of the “Church of Ireland.” It is the Casper Hauser of Institutions. It is without origin and without purpose. Everyone is weary of it. The Tories of intensest insanity forego the hope that it will convert the Roman Catholics. Archbishop Whately jokes at it; and every Minister under it would prefer compensation to the absurdity of ministering to a myth. All the great Statesmen of the day admit the effete-ness and facetiousness of the thing; but a few, like Lord Derby and Lord Palmerston, say, as a housemaid does of her wart, it is inevitable, there it is and we can’t get rid of it, just as every Chancellor of the Exchequer, from time immemorial, has said so of every Pasha of Egypt—“We are much obliged for that Cleopatra’s Obelisk which lies, a present to us, in the mud of the port of Alexandria, but we really do not see how we are to fetch it away.” The Church of Ireland is the taunt of England, all over the world. It is the anomaly of the nineteenth century. Most Bishops know that they are failures, as compared with the Apostolic standard; but an Anglican Bishop, in Ireland, sometimes blushes, thinking of the impudence of the thing—winking, so to speak, at the Ministers of other religions. The Church of Ireland, in short, is a joke. It is an Ecclesiastical simulacrum, or parody, or burlesque. The point is—that we have to pay for it.

The London Nonconformists, undaunted by the failure of the English Whigs, the Irish Catholics, and British desire of fair play and common sense, are going to try their hands at an attempt to get rid of the Church Establishment in Ireland. Mr. Miall is the chief in the agitation, and the discovery he has made is—that we are to get rid of the Anglican Church by getting rid of all other state endowments in Ireland at the same time. He does not, as to be consistent he ought to say, that we are to get rid of the Queen’s Colleges, or of the National Schools, the Lord Lieutenant’s salary, and so on. But he goes against all the endowments of religion. It is a difficult thing to destroy the Church Establishment. It is a difficult thing to deprive Maynooth of the government grant. It is a difficult thing to get a majority against the Regium Donum. But attack all at once, advises Mr. Miall, and you will succeed. Well, we have, in this journal, recommended that conjoint assault, and we ought to support Mr. Miall and his Nonconformist friends. The Roman Catholies are sick of the miserably small Maynooth Grant, which they are becoming rich enough to dispense with. There is in the Regium Donum nothing of the eleemosynary; it was a fair bargain with the State for what the Presbyterian clergymen sacrificed; but the Presbyterian body, free as they are from State control, do not enjoy State patronage; while it is certain, the Ministers would be far bolder Liberals once enfranchised from the receipt of salaries paid by strangers. Both Roman Catholics and Presbyterians would like to see the artificial Anglican Church swept away. Mr. Miall, proposing this sweeping abolition to parliament, secures the votes of all the English Dissenters and Radicals, and of the Irish Roman Catholic Members, with the stray Whigs who have not forgotten the day of the Appropriation Clause. Still, however, simple as is Mr. Miall's plan, it does not succeed. He was beaten last session, and he will be beaten next session.

There is yet a simpler plan, Mr. Miall will be astonished to learn. It is to leave the matter in Irish hands. Mr. Miall agitates from the sectarian point of view. Now the Irish point of view is better. Mr. Miall desires to destroy the English Church in England; and, clever general, wishes to turn the position in Ireland. The House of Commons understands these small tactics, and puts Mr. Miall in a ludicrously small lobby. We in Ireland, comprehend the motive, and withhold our confidence. We decline to be made subsidiary to English Dissenters' politics. We have no Dissenters among us. There is the South Roman Catholic and the North Presbyterian; two emphatic churches—two distinct races: and we both agree to stand on an equality, with reference to religious endowments. We attack the Church of England as an impudent intrusion on both, as an alien to both, as an insult to both. When we can organise common action against this factitious establishment, that is as little likely to advance among us as the Cockney accent is likely to influence our speech, Mr. Miall may rely upon it that we shall, on each side, make sacrifices—one sacrificing Maynooth and the other the Regium Donum.

We cannot say that we entirely concur in this expression of opinion, or that the Dissenting body in England is not too lightly perhaps too slightly, spoken of. We for our own part have the utmost respect for the Irish Presbyterians, and we admire the justifiable pride with which they disclaim for themselves the character of Dissenters, but at the same time we feel bound to say that the English Non-Conformists are entitled to treat with Irish Catholics as high contracting parties, seeing that we both of us are political powers which unfortunately the Irish Presbyterians are not. The English Non-Conformists do not possess in England half the relative importance which the Irish Presbyterians might command in Ireland if they had the public spirit of the English Dissenters. The Irish Presbyterians, an emphatic Church as they very properly call themselves, a match in number for the people of the Establishment, somewhat inferior in cultivation but quite equal to them in intelligence, almost as wealthy, and far more enterprising, are represented by just one member of Parliament. Their dealing with Catholics in election matters in Down, Belfast and Monaghan, has not it is said been marked by the candour and liberality that might have been expected from them, and certainly they are not regarded with confidence either by Anglican or Catholic. We do not ourselves pretend to say how this comes to pass, but this we do say, that if the Presbyterians of Ireland were made of the same stuff as the English Non-Conformists, instead of one member of Parliament they could have a dozen, and then indeed the Presbyterians would have help to offer us, and a right not only to tender advice, but to make terms. They have as yet rendered the liberal cause no service whatever; and if it depended upon them the Test and Corporation Acts would still be unrepealed; Emancipation would have been still an open question never to be closed; the Reform-bill never should have been passed; Free trade never have been won: yet in all these things the Irish Catholics, and the English Non-Conformists have borne their part. We do not intend this as a reproach to the Presbyterians; doubtless they have reasons to offer, and we sincerely pray those reasons may soon have ceased to exist, but meanwhile, should the Presbyterian body induce us to decline the proffered assistance of the Non-Conformists what equivalent will it give us, or is any thing to be expected from the Irish Presbyterians but good wishes and bad votes? Assuredly the serious cooperation of the Presbyterians our countrymen, would be more valuable in our eyes, and Mr. Miall will pardon us for saying so, than all the countenance and aid we could receive from English associations, but we cannot count upon a political alliance where there is no political power and apparently no great anxiety to acquire it.

The English dissenters, on the contrary, have political power and love it, and cherish it, and increase it by every means within their reach. Their assistance is worth having if they tender it in a fair and generous spirit, and in the present instance, it has been our wish to meet their offer in the best way that occurred to us, namely, with perfect unreserve, with entire freedom of thought and absolute freedom of speech, exhibiting our likings and dislikings, and placing in the fore-ground our national interests, to which we avowedly postpone the imperial projects of the society. We have not hesitated to mark what we considered blame-worthy in Mr. Miall's plaus, and it will be for him and his society to say if there be anything worth having or adopting in our observations. One thing however he may take for certain upon the joint authority of ourselves and of the Presbyterian journal, that both we and the Presbyterians are quite ready, the one to give up Maynooth, and the other to sacrifice the Regium Donum, the moment it becomes possible to do away with the Church Establishment. But not meaning any disrespect, we say of Mr. Miall's policy, with reference to the Maynooth question, what Chief Justice Bushe said of Paine's Rights of Man :—" It is a system of false metaphysics and bad politics ; any attempt to carry it into effect must be destructive of peace, and there is nothing practical in it but its mischief. It holds out inducements to disturbance on the promise of improvement, and softens the prospect of immediate disorder in the cant of the empiric, you must be ' worse before you can be better.' " Holding, therefore, these views in common with our Presbyterian brethren, views in which it is possible we may both be in the wrong, Mr. Miall cannot be taken by surprise, if we say that his present course provokes suspicion, and will soon beget disgust. This may be very unreasonable, very injudicious, very unfortunate, but it is not the less natural, not the less inevitable, or the less to be taken into account by a practical man who wishes to effect his object, and is obliged to calculate his resources. The Irish people, whether Catholic or Presbyterian, cannot see Mr. Miall in league with their enemies and believe him their friend—they will not put their trust in a man that serves two masters—they will hold by their old fashioned, distinction between God and Baal ; they will continue to detest monstrous friendships and kissing extremes. Let them have an unmistakeable bull, a thoroughbred horse, or a downright man ; but they loathe your Minotaurs as pagan indecencies, and they will prove Lapithæ to your Centaurs. Mr. Miall may plead the privilege of all boat-men to look one way and row another, but he will be answered that what is good in aquatics, may be bad in morality, and that at all events, people are against it, and will have nothing to do with it. It is a painful thing that it should be in the power of a man like Mr. Spooner to revive and envenom hatred, to perpetuate disunion, and to poison conciliation in a country such as ours, but it is more painful still that honourable men should be found to aid him in so bad an enterprise ; and we further say it is painful that Mr. Miall should not have already seen, that a consummation which cannot be the triumph of virtuous means, cannot be virtuous or profitable in itself.

In speaking thus of Mr. Miall, we have assumed a privilege which belongs to real friendship, sincere esteem, and community of object. That privilege is candour. Perhaps indeed we are wrong in styling that a privilege, which is more properly a duty on the one side, and a right upon the other. We are not of those who undervalue the assistance of Mr. Miall and his party, but we cannot be grateful for it in its present shape. For his sake and for our own we hope it may be tendered in a more acceptable form, but we must confess, that let assistance come from what quarter it may, in the Establishment itself are found our most effective helps. From the time of the Papal Aggression, downwards, its attitude has given us unmingled satisfaction, and allayed the dismay with which we witnessed the adjustment of the Tithe question by Lord Stanley. Our fears never overcame our reason to the extent of making us believe that any real vitality was imparted to a thing so vicious, so hollow, and so unsound as the Establishment; but we foresaw a tedious prolongation of its odious life. Many a man of feeble constitution, secures a long life by abstemiousness and care, while the vigorous and robust are spendthrifts of their health, and we feared lest the Establishment, rescued from death by the Stanley operation, but not beyond the danger of relapse, might after all, by avoiding exposure, by screening out the air, by keeping at home, by moderating its appetite, and especially by abstaining from riotous and heated assemblies, secure to itself a long, even if not a prosperous old age. But we saw with pleasure that it would not submit to nursing, confinement, and regimen. Its early, persistent, and delightfully stupid resistance to the system of National Education, gave a shock to its enfeebled system that we saw and registered with happiness. We could have embraced its Greggs, its Thompsons and its Fleury's, for poisoning the atmosphere all round their tender parent. It consoled us to think that ministers' money at least had not been changed into a rent-charge, and that the inflammation to which it gave rise, though small, was spiteful, and beautifully gangrenous; but what gave us the most unmixed pleasure, was the attitude of the Establishment during the Papal-Aggression fever. Before the excitement had spread to Ireland, it was a matter of anxious speculation whether the constitutional ardour of the Irish character would overbear all considerations of prudence in the Establishment. It was perfectly natural for the English Establishment to cry out against the wolf, for it had flocks, but no one could or did allege so amusing a pretext for the alarm of the Irish Anglicans, or anticipate it on any supposition implying the coarsest good sense or most ordinary judgment in the men. The measure of our joy was therefore large when we heard the "treble pipe of Irish malignity," like the squeak of the Homeric ghosts, above the surging roar of English fanaticism. Our hearts failed us when the English Bishops appeared to set the proper value and no more, upon the sympathy of their Irish brethren, and met their brotherly advances with decent reserve, intimating with sufficient distinctness, that the Papal Aggression was no affair of theirs; but we were speedily comforted and reassured by the extension of the notorious Titles Bill to Ireland, the most fatal present ever made to the Establishment. The last new Reformation with its thrice conjured ghosts of old impostures, was another blessed symptom of incurableness, showing that no matter what others might do for the Establishment, she was most effectually doing for herself. When the Churches rang with defamation, ribaldry, and what Catholics deem blasphemy; when handbills of the most disgusting description were thrust into our hands; when we were specially and affectionately invited to hear ourselves blaguarded in places supposed to be reserved for the inculcation of morality and peace; when we found Bishop and Parson gambling with our money in Church Missions, Priests-Protection-Societies, and controversial classes; we loved to think that the people should see the Establishment supported at their cost, not to minister to the spiritual wants of Protestants, a grievance intolerable enough, but to overrun them the Catholics with an army of trained tormentors, who should ambush in their path, set traps for their children, put contention between them and their landlords, estrange them from their Protestant equals, and who having the venom of asps upon their tongues, should shed it most profusely on the day of rest and peace. Our satisfaction was naturally extreme when the Protestant Association that meets somewhere in Dublin, and of course opens its meetings with prayer, declared the present Commission of Inquiry into Endowed Schools to be composed of "luke-warm Protestants, Papists and Socinian Infidels, like every previous board of the description,"—but our joy overflowed when we learned that the same Association, after intoning a doxology, pronounced the murder of the late Mr. Little, a consequence of the protection extended to Popery.

We should fill more pages than we have inclination or leisure to fill, were we to enumerate the freaks of the Establishment or its patrons. Within the last week we have a gentleman of property establishing a school at Inniskeen in the County of Monaghan, where the consciences of children are to be vexed and depraved by the enforced acceptance of instruction which they regard as deadly sin. That they may attend this school their parents are commanded to withdraw them from the excellent national school of the village, which, strange to say, enjoys the shelter of the same roof with a school exclusively Protestant. Colonel Lewis is reported to have said, in reply to the remonstrance of the tenantry, that he will not allow "priest or parson or devil to visit his school," a form of expression indicating sufficiently the scriptural character of the patron, if not of the school. Already the landlord and the tenantry are at war in virtue of the Gospel of peace, and a state of things has been brought about of which people in England have no conception. Should this gentleman succeed in forcing the consciences of those about him, and in winning what he considers a triumph over the priest; he will only have done something to perpetuate and ingrain the peculiar vices which this species of religious oppression and social tyranny has rendered for the present habitual, if not positively national amongst us. Sycophancy and dissimulation are those vices, the more to be dreaded that in the Irish character they cover no ordinary depth and energy of hatred. Everyone knows they have been bred out of the perverse relations which the Establishment has created between the peasant and his superior; and surely Mr. Lewis ought to know that his own temporal interest is concerned in their eradication. There will be small hope of improvement for the Irish peasant if in this attempt to cut down his sacraments to two, the articles of his religion be reduced to the well known two which are found in the Gospel not of Christ but of Cataline—Simulare et Dissimulare.

According as the underworkings of the system of which Mr. Lewis is a part, come to be known, we get at practical results, which enable us to calculate what might be the effect of the system, if per impossibile it could prevail. We see children sent to unlearn at school, the faith they are taught to hold at home; we see them brought up in contempt of their own pastors without learning respect for any other; we see men trampling upon the Cross under protest, and blaspheming God with a mental reservation; we find the Irish taught self-reliance by living at the cost of a conformity, which their conscience abhors or their indifference makes light of; in fine, we see the man conscious of having denied Christ, argue in favour of selling his soul as dearly as he can; and deny himself none of the luxuries of sin, after having tasted all its bitterness. Will any one say that this is the work of any church either established or missionary? Will any one say that it is not a defiance to mankind, that it invites anything but repression and extinction? Will any one assert after this that it is possible to honour or to dishonour such an institution, to conceal its shame or heighten its deformity, to make it better liked, or more detestable, to do anything with it, in fine, but to abolish, and if in our power, to forget it?

We care little what is done with the reversion of what is called the Church property. The right owners will place no obstacle in the way of any legitimate application of the land or money. The consolidated fund will have no objection to be relieved by the rent charge, and the glebe lands. We say with all deference that the support of the national schools would be a more fitting and more economical application of the fund, than that proposed by Mr. Miall, and we cannot see why the remainder of the rent charge might not be placed at the disposal of the respective grand juries, for county purposes, an allocation equally beneficial to landlord and to tenant. Various it is said, are the uses of adversity, but still more various are the uses of money, and more various still the unsupplied, and ever clamouring wants of a nation. We may rely upon it excellent use will be found for the property falling to the Country, but no use and no abuse could be so pernicious as the present. We do not maintain that the church property drops into the treasury as of right, we do not recognise the measure as one of confiscation, legitimate or otherwise. We consider the present occupants as overholding by violence, and that it is in virtue of the relinquishment to which Catholics consent, that the State has a right to lay hands upon the fund. That, however, is matter of opinion, and to us it is indifferent under what pretence the State does its duty and our will, provided only it be done. We have not thought it necessary to notice the trash that is written, and spoken about the coronation oath; as if the oath in question meant anything more than that the prince is obliged to uphold whatever legal arrangement may exist at any time. It was also rendered unnecessary for us to discuss objections raised from the terms of the Act of Union, as they had been disposed of quite as effectually as was needful in the last number of this Journal; and we have contented ourselves with mentioning that the Irish Establishment must be abolished, any thing in any oath, declaration, affirmation, article, agreement, statute, custom, privilege or prerogative in any wise to the contrary notwithstanding.

It cannot it is true be denied, that even were our power as effective and available as it is substantially great, we should be obliged notwithstanding to go through the weary repetition of arguments which every one of our opponents in his own heart knew to be irresistible twenty years ago. The slave trade subsisted for thirty years after every pulpit in the Empire had continued to thunder against it, and statesmen, with the exception of Wyndham differing in every thing else, had grown unanimous in its condemnation. It fell when it could hold out no longer, but the old arguments were in at the death and marched in procession at the triumph. Within the last few days an old argument was very forcibly put from an unusual quarter by the Lord Justice Clerk in Scotland. Certain friends of civil and religious liberty, behind the scenes as was intimated by the learned Judge, thought proper to excite other friends whose zeal was not according to prudence and still less according to knowledge, to fire and destroy the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kelso, the property of Mr. Hope Scott. In vindication of this beautiful principle so well understood and so accurately applied in Scotland, the less educated rioters obeyed the instructions of their prompters; they burned down the chapel, were apprehended, imprisoned, tried, and sentenced in due course of law. The learned Judge in passing sentence, took occasion to throw out an extrajudicial intimation to Mr. Scott, that it might be worth his while to reflect, whether there was any need of a chapel in a town where the priest did not reside, and which consequently must have been built for the sole purpose of proselytism. As a matter of private opinion, we may say, the remark would seem to have been rather out of place, and perhaps rather suggestive to friends of civil and religious liberty like those in the dock, but the value of the moral it contains is so great as to redeem its impropriety. If a distinguished judge in Scotland considers a Catholic Chapel unnecessary in a town containing three hundred Irish Catholics, who without a chapel will be three hundred Irish nuisances, which chapel has been built and maintained at the expense of the congregation merely; what is to be said of Protestant places of worship built at the expense of a Catholic people, and what of Protestant clergymen and their wives and families, and parish clerks, and sextons, and beadles maintained at the expense of the same Catholic people in parishes not containing a dozen of Protestants, and these, rich, educated and generous, able to build their own chapel and support their own minister, but preferring to cast the burthen upon their Catholic neighbours? The answer is complete, the remedy obvious, and it will have to be applied.

Other practical illustrations of the working of the Establishment are in constant supply. It is well to note them when they occur and to have them at hand. We have purposely forborne the suggestion of any particular mode of carrying out our views, or even of co-operating with Mr. Miall if it should be found expedient to do so. We have ventured however to state what we considered impracticable, and that is, we regret to say, any large or comprehensive organisation. Entire freedom, absolute unrestraint, or enlightened despotism in the guidance of any popular movement, are in our opinion the alternatives presented to the Irish people. Could the despot be found to rule the popular movement, we believe its action would be prompter and more effective for that control; but in the absence of such we believe we should do wrong to flatter ourselves, and we do not think we should serve the country by endeavouring to nurse the belief that in the conduct of a great political society, we could look homewards for anything distantly resembling the good faith, patience, mutual forbearance, practical methods and self-government of the English societies. We hope we may be wrong; we know we may give offence; but we feel it a duty to express this conviction, unfounded perhaps, but not ill considered. We have really no tub to mount, we have no elixir to churn, and consequently cannot proclaim its wonderful and instantaneous efficacy. If we did, we doubt not it would beto an unbelieving generation. Not a single specific have we secured by patent; and should perchance a suggestion moderately useful have escaped us, we shall be only too happy if any one can act upon and improve it, nor shall we ever be heard to murmur at the untrades-man-like practice of saying, "this is the same thing or something like it." We shall in this Journal at least endeavour to obtain what we want as we can, Salvo Honore, and as occasions offer; meeting with readiness and warmth every kindly advance, but relying more upon the power of interest or necessity than upon that of justice or friendship. We believe that self-respect is not incompatible with a knowledge of our faults, and that in order to reach this knowledge we must have the courage to hear them told. Our enemies will do it for us in their own way. It is the peculiar sin of tyrants and slave owners, says Lord Brougham with great truth, to reproach their victims with the infirmities and vices which they the tyrants and slave-owners have engendered. Our enemies may say hard things of us, but the vices they censure will not be ours the less because our enemies have planted and cherished them. We must endeavour to realize our proper strength and natural virtues before we can know what we have to rely upon or what we have to respect. We must be far from thinking meanly of the country or of ourselves, but the opinion that we are the first or finest people on the face of the earth is false in fact and dangerous in practice. We have been and are a much suffering much slandered, greatly tempted people; we have preserved many fine qualities, we have actually acquired some others; but we have retained many defects and contracted from oppression by far the greater number of our failings. Many of the latter are wearing out with time, and unless in rare instances can be removed by time alone, but we can purify ourselves of many, and our success in dealing with the Establishment will depend much on our success in dealing with ourselves. We shall require an unexaggerated idea of our rights as well as of our strength, the measure of one being often the measure of both. We shall need in certain conjunctures to temper the warmth of our feelings and to sober the extravagance of our imaginations by an admixture of English forbearance, good sense, and self possession; but above all things it would seem to the erring judgment of ourselves, that the most pressing want of the present time is not so much acute feeling as cold determination, not quickness of perception but quiet reflection, not readiness to act but patience to deliberate. The Establishment must yield in any event, but those who wish to help its fall will have to qualify themselves in the way we have mentioned, unless some happy event should interpose to bring it to the ground without their aid.

We have thought it no more than our duty to all parties, and especially to Mr. Miall and the Society for the Disendowment of Religion, to be thus unreserved. According to our view it could serve no good purpose, that people, having a wish to work together, should be ignorant of the character of their intended work-mates. Admitting the possibility of much incorrectness in our impressions as to Mr. Miall and his general policy, we know that we have been tolerably accurate in the enumeration of our own failings and weaknesses, nor do we think we have exaggerated any merit or any capability for which we have taken credit. Many will be found to say, we have under-estimated the political power of Ireland, and judged quite too unfavorably of our own fitness for organized agitation. It will doubtless be maintained that we are susceptible of the highest degree of discipline; and men, to whose opinion the utmost deference is due, will hold to the belief that without organization and direction, without the old machinery of Councils and Committees, no great political change can be effected. Looking upon this organization as impossible, or extremely difficult and precarious at the present time, we are happy in the belief that it is not as necessary as it is desirable. Men, we hope, will always be found to devote themselves independently and constantly to the service of the country, not from any transcendental patriotism, but from motives as unselfish as the infirmity of our nature will allow. But these are not sufficient of themselves to constitute an organization, or even to guide one, unless their endowments happen to be of the peculiar order of those which, to some extent, were shared with O'Connell by the founders of the Catholic Association. Should the formation of any such Society be unsuccessfully attempted, or should its success be only partial, it would be matter of grave concern, and to our mind full of disaster, or, at best, of delay. It would falsely be taken to represent the entire strength of the country, and its defeat accepted by many as a settlement of the question. If it continued to live a spoon-fed life in Dublin, a weakly infant subject to occasional convulsions, it would die the death of ridicule after having communicated that most dangerous of all infections to the cause it had been born to support. Men, disposed to act under other circumstances, would be deterred from action, if any step of theirs could be thought to connect them with the abortive Society or its proceedings. Moreover, a political Society requires a certain state of the political atmosphere in which to live and thrive, even though we admit the existence of every other condition favorable to its growth. Raise the temperature, not, however, by the explosive agencies of Spoonerism, drain the swamps, clear the woods, work upon the climate, and the plant will appear of its own accord. The labour is sometimes, though not always, hard, obscure, and unpaid, but it is, in most instances, the necessary condition of ultimate success. Although ready to acknowledge the superiority—as who does not—of combined and sustained action; we think it wrong to despise action of any kind, however irregular and intermittent, if every act represent the determination of an individual, and particularly if the individuals be numerous. We should be glad to make sure of one blow at the Establishment from every passer by, even though we had no hope of its being repeated. For the present we care not where a man's road may lie, provided only the Establishment cross it, and he may have need to break a fence or force a gate. Better of course that he should sit down with us, work the guns, or delve in the mines, but we shall not be unthankful if he only lend a hand and pass upon his way.—One swing with the sledge, one push with the crow-bar, one stone loosened, one defence turned, one advantage pointed out, will entitle the man to gratitude though we never see his face again. Let this feeling of ours come to be recognised, for it exists already without acknowledgment, and the wished-for unity will speedily ensue. The will and inclination of men will become more pliant when it is not sought to be forced and twisted and tied down ; public opinion will make herself heard when her identity ceases to be questioned, and the conspiring wishes and purposes of the entire Catholic community will either beget organization or triumph without it.

One duty now remains for us, and it is one we approach with pleasure. In dealing with the subject upon which we have been engaged, we have written as we felt, with considerable, but not unnecessary severity. Aware of the natural and excusable error which might lead some of our readers to think we had included religions or individuals in the censure applied to the Establishment, we took an early opportunity to disclaim any such intention. We now desire to renew that disclaimer with the view of placing it in a more emphatic form, if necessary, before the public. With regard to the earlier protestations to which we allude, there might have lurked an apparent bitterness in the commentary, of a nature to injure the effect of the text ; but having now said of the Establishment all that we thought right, and no particle of which we are disposed to hear questioned or to modify, we do not think we can close this paper more appropriately than by denying with the utmost sincerity any intention to speak disrespectfully of the doctrines or morality of what is called the Established Church. Without pretending to be at all more liberal than others in matters of religion ; free, we trust, from any suspicion of indifference ; having, on the contrary, opinions as hard and as angular as may be ; we have, nevertheless, at all times admired and adopted the beautiful doctrine of Bishop Berkeley, "that the different roads men take upon the way to Heaven, need never prevent them from following the same road upon earth." This was not the cant of conciliation ; this was not the liberality of a discontented Papist, languishing to tread the same road, to call the same flowers, and to reach the same heights to which the Protestant had once exclusive access. It is the expression of a Protestant bishop, one of the few of his order in Ireland that could almost dignify the bad eminence of his place ; and it is treble valuable for having been conceived and written at a period when liberality and toleration were unknown outside the author's own breast. Acting, therefore, upon these sentiments which we accept and embrace, and entertain, and hope never to part with, we declare that when the Anglican Church shall have undergone the process we are preparing for her, when we shall have made her independent of outdoor relief, and she shall appear in Ireland in her proper and legitimate character as a Voluntary Church like that of the Scottish Episcopalians, we shall be willing to forget the past and bid her freely welcome. It would be affectation in us to say that we do not regard the presence of any other religion than our own as an evil. The Anglican, the Presbyterian, and every sincere man of whatever religion, divides this feeling with us ; but in a country like Ireland the evil admitted upon all hands is also allowed to have an admixture of good. To a certain extent the jealousy and vigilance of rival religions, kept within proper bounds, does, we believe, exercise a purifying influence over all the rivals. To this extent, therefore, we shall be prepared to welcome the Anglican Church as soon as its existence shall have been made at all compatible with charity and sisterhood. The English Church, says Lord Brougham, somewhere, is a mild mistress and an unobtrusive neighbour. How she rules her family we do not care to know, but we desire nothing more earnestly than good neighbourhood and are labouring our utmost to promote it. We have already said, and with all respect for Mr. Miall, we say again, that, ceteris paribus, man for man, voluntary for voluntary, religion for religion, we prefer the Anglican to the Presbyterian ; we have already assigned reasons for the preference, which we have, no doubt, Mr. Miall will find excellent. We find the "Churchman" in general more genial, better educated and more natural, in a word more to our taste than the Dissenter ; a reason, perhaps, as unanswerable as any other we have given. But in this we are by no means singular. Our great Bishop of Kildare, Dr. Doyle, had the same tastes and opinions as ourselves ; looking upon the Anglican body as approaching more closely to the Catholic standard of doctrine and practice than any other of the Separated communities. If, therefore, we have spoken strongly of the Establishment as distinguished from the Religion, it is a distinction which the friends of the Establishment themselves should be able to understand and prepared to accept, unless they wish to make the Church identical with the Establishment. We have hardly used a stronger expression than may be found in Peter Plymley, and what we have said, would that we had said as well. May heaven avert a Sydney Smith from Ireland. He would be worth a hundred years of life to the Establishment without reforming it in the least. Dr. Griffin, Dr. Higgins, and Dr. Knox are exceedingly inconvenient to us as it is. Their charity, sense, and tact are as a mantle to the nakedness of the Establishment. It is, however, reassuring to reflect that they are rather more detested by their brethren than Dr. Mac Hale, or the Delegate Apostolic. Dr. Whately was once a little in our way, but now we cordially wish him to remain. Let us have more Fleurys, an additional Whiteside, an extra Gregg, Thompsons ad nauseam, Scripture readers ad infinitum. A military chaplaincy for Gavazzi, a cure of souls and bodies for Achilli, the professorship of Italian for a conforming "figurista," "signori di ambo i sessi" contributors to the Church Missions—this or the half of this, and our work is smooth and light. Make the placards more inflammatory, the handbills more poisonous, the "special invitations to Roman Catholics" more tender. Let religion turn herself into fairings for the girls, tobacco for the old men, and tea for the old women. Let conversion come like Jupiter to the lap of Nora in a shower of half-pence, or lurk in a bale of corduroys and flannel petticoats. In mercy's name let us have more Scripture riots, additional constabulary and additional rates. Let us have, if possible, two Aprils every year, for we must appease our English readers, if they will allow us a native figure of speech, that Irish May meetings are held in April. A double allowance of bad breath, bad passions, and bad oratory. What more? More ministers and more bishops. From our souls we regret that the number ever was diminished. But we fear we shall be thought unreasonable, seeing how actively the Establishment is working for us without our asking. We on our side, and Mr. Miallon his, are engaged in a work of mercy for the English Church in Ireland. We in particular, should have studied the reformatory movement to little purpose, if we shut out from our care the most unreformed, though, by no means, the most youthful offender in the empire. After having lived under our mild but vigorous discipline, the convict will be restored to society; not so much punished as reclaimed; deprived of her unlawful store, but trained to honest industry; stripped of her purple and fine linen, but soberly and decently attired; an object neither of dread, nor pity, nor aversion, but free, self-balancing and independent; with rights in full, without a solitary privilege; a citizen, not a free-booter; a Religion, not an Establishment.

ART. VIII.—METTRAY; ITS RISE AND PROGRESS.

Rapports Annuels des Directeurs de la Colonie Agricole et Penitentielle de Mettray. 1840 to 1856 inclusive. Tours: Imprimerie Ladeveze.

Numerous notices of the Reformatory Institution at Mettray in France, have, within the last few years, been published in this kingdom, and several of these have even been reproduced in our own pages;* thus some explanation may be deemed necessary of our reasons for again bringing the subject under the attention of our readers.

It will be recollected that the accounts which have yet reached us of Mettray have been written by strangers, who, attracted to it by rumors of its marvellous success, have gone thither to examine it for themselves, sometimes, perhaps, fearing that a close inspection would reveal defects and shortcomings which distance had rendered invisible.

Such a consequence, however, has never resulted from a visit to the Institution, and the desire which has been felt after seeing it to diffuse the valuable information gained there, has led to the publication of the various pamphlets to which we have alluded. But these convey to us the impression which the Colony has produced on individuals who have each viewed it under one phase only of its existence, and, so to speak, from without. They have photographed for our contemplation, the admirable results which have been obtained. For the amateur philanthropist this may suffice, but the earnest student of reformatory science seeks much more instruction than the finished picture can convey. He must learn how such a work has been accomplished, in what manner it was begun, what difficulties impeded its progress, and how they were surmounted—knowledge which can be gained only by a patient study of its gradual development. No history of Mettray such as can supply this need has yet been written, but the annual reports afford much of the desired information, and the whole series (the earlier numbers of which are become very scarce,) having been placed in our hands, we have thought to render some service to the cause of criminal reformation by laying before our readers extracts from them as copious as our limits will permit—occasionally abridging the narrative for the sake of brevity.

---

* Among them we may mention Mr. Hall's two invaluable Lectures, another by Mr. Wheatley, and a Charge by the Recorder of Birmingham.

The Reports are addressed to the members of the Société Paternelle, a small association originated by M. Demetz as the first step towards founding Mettray. It consists of the chief promoters of the enterprise, having for its President the Count de Gasparin, for Vice President M. Demetz, and for Secretary-General the Count de Flavigny; but it has never interfered in the management of the institution, which has always rested solely in the hands of the Directors. It is consequently to their genius and self-devotion, that the system and the success of Mettray are alike owing, and strongly impressed as we had before been with their merits, we must confess it was not until after an attentive perusal of the seventeen annual reports which have now appeared, that we became fully aware of the exalted benevolence and the profound philosophy, which through M. M. Demetz and de Courteilles, have wrought such benefit to mankind—a benevolence, which neither the most arduous labors, nor the closest personal intercourse with the miserable beings it sought to reclaim, could weary or disgust—a philosophy, which while successfully solving the most difficult of social problems, did not disdain to occupy itself with the minutest details of domestic economy.

To the second and succeeding reports, up to the period of M. de Courteilles' death, the names of both Directors are appended, but the first which was read to the Société Paternelle, at their first annual meeting on the 7th of June, 1840, is signed by M. Demetz alone. Referring to it in his opening address, the President, M. de Gasparin, says:—

The modesty of its author will not succeed in concealing from you the sacrifices and self-devotion on the part of M. Demetz and M. de Breteignères de Courteilles, by which alone we could have reached the position we already occupy. Abandoning the career in which they were engaged, and the habits of a whole life-time, they gave themselves up with pious zeal to the cause of criminal reformation. Personal and pecuniary sacrifices they estimated as nothing; their philanthropy overcame every obstacle, and they find their reward in the approbation of their own consciences, and of all good men.

It is known to our readers that by the 66th article of the Code Napoléon children in France, under 16 years of age, who are found guilty of an offence, may be acquitted as having acted sans discernement, in which case they are liable to detention in prison for a certain number of years, according to the sentence of the magistrate before whom they are tried. He has, however, the option of treating them as adult offenders, in which case they undergo conviction. This, however, happens comparatively rarely, but until the establishment of Reformatory Schools, the child derived little or no benefit from his privilege of acquittal. He was still exposed, for a period often of many years, to the injurious influences of a prison where he was frequently associated with hardened felons. It was to give life and action then to this dead letter that M. Demetz resolved to establish the agricultural colony of Mettray.

We will now turn to the first Report, only premising with reference to our translation, that for convenience sake we have retained the terms colony, colon, chef de famille, sous chef, and contre-maitre, as our language possesses no words precisely equivalent to them. The two first are self-explaining; the chef de famille is the officer placed at the head of each family, to which he discharges the duties of a father, concerning himself more particularly with the moral supervision and bodily health of his wards. He has invariably been trained in the École Préparatoire, as has also the sous chef, a youth who acts under the chef de famille, and in time rises to a similar post. Contre-maitre may be translated "industrial master," and during the early existence of the Colony it was not indispensable that he should have been educated in the École Préparatoire, though it is so now. If formerly, however, he had been so educated he was permitted to take a share in the moral training of the colons, by filling the office of sous chef.

In June, 1839, the Société Paternelle, issued its prospectus, and selected the village of Mettray as the site of the Colony it had resolved to found. M. Bretignères de Courteilles had offered a tract of land there, peculiarly suited to the purpose; and from that moment, we became associated in the enterprise to which henceforth our lives are devoted. We now appealed to public charity in favor of an institution eminently calculated to benefit society, and we met with a warm response.

Five hundred subscribers gave in their names within the first year, including the king and the rest of the royal family, his ministers, many members of the Chamber of Peers, and of Deputies, judicial and educational bodies in various parts of the country, and more especially the inhabitants of the department in which the Colony was established.

Our aim was to rescue young offenders from the influence of a prison life, and to replace the walls with which they had been surrounded, by liberty and labor in the open air.

We proposed by persuasive influence, by justice and kindness accompanied by strict discipline, to reclaim lads, who, from their infancy upwards had never received any moral training, and had been subjected to no other restraint than that of brute force ; we proposed, in short, to turn ignorant and dangerous vagrant lads, into good, industrious, and useful members of society. Such a problem could not be solved by ordinary means.

In order to succeed in detaining our first colons among us, and in attaching them to our institution, we began by founding a school for teachers, which should supply us with devoted and efficient officers, and we strove to imbue them with the spirit by which we were animated, that they might in their turn communicate it to the rest, and afford them a good example.

It was absolutely necessary that we should be able to show to those who were apprehensive of evil effects resulting to themselves from the assemblage of so many criminal lads in their vicinity, that even such a band might be well disciplined and harmless, and we have succeeded in dissipating all alarm and ill will, and in gaining the confidence of our neighbours.

On the 28th of July, 1839, we opened our Ecole Préparatoire with 23 pupils,* from among whom we have already selected several individuals now actively employed as officers in our institution.

While occupied in establishing this school, we were also engaged in erecting not far from it, the dwellings destined to receive our colons, the plan of which we will explain.

The houses are all detached ; each is 12 metres [39 feet] long, by 6 metres, 66 centimetres [21 feet] wide, and consists of a ground

---

* It will be noticed that wherever the word pupil (élève) is used, it is applied to the students in this school, never to the colons. Admission to the Ecole Préparatoire, is gratuitous ; thus the Directors have the power of selecting as pupils, those individuals who appear most likely to suit their purpose.

They are invariably chosen from respectable families, but often from such as have met with reverses in fortune, and to whom, consequently, the education and maintenance thus obtained is a great boon. If a pupil is found to be unfitted for the vocation of teacher, he is dismissed, endeavours, however, being made if his conduct is not in fault to provide for him elsewhere. Some leave of their own accord, and no attempt is ever made to detain either pupil or officer, after they have expressed a wish to depart. As the Colony can afford to a few officers only salaries sufficient for the support of a family, a large proportion of them do leave after a few years service ; but owing to the excellent education they have received, and the high character they bear, they seldom fail to obtain good situations elsewhere.

floor, and over that a first and second floor. The ground floor, where the colons are employed when not occupied out of doors, is divided into four workshops by a partition, sufficiently low to enable the superintendant, placed in the middle, to overlook every compartment, without, however, it being possible for the boys in one to communicate with those in another, or indeed to see each other when seated; while the upper part of the room being left free, the temperature of the whole remains the same, however unequal in number may be the lads at work in the different divisions.

On the first floor is a dormitory for twenty children; the hammocks in which they sleep are so arranged that surveillance at night is easy, while in the day time they are hung up against the wall, and the room is available for other purposes. They are suspended at night parallel with each other but so that the heads and feet of the occupants shall come alternately side by side, by which means conversation, even in a whisper, is prevented, and it is made possible to place them very near together without any evil consequence.

Planks fixed on to posts by means of hinges, and which can be lowered at pleasure, form a table extending the whole length of the room, which may thus be used as a refectory, and when the tables are raised parallel with the posts, and the hammocks are hung up against the wall, a large clear space is obtained where in rainy weather the boys can be employed in various occupations and at the same time be continually overlooked. A little room is partitioned off from the larger apartment, and having the side which commands a view of the latter furnished with venetian blinds, the occupant can see without being seen; in this post of observation, the Chef de famille has his bed, and as no one knows whether he is asleep or not, there is not a moment when the boys can feel sure his eye is not upon them.

The second floor is arranged on the same plan, and is also adapted to receive twenty colons.

Two contre-maitres keep watch at night in each dormitory, taking the duty alternately till morning.

Each house thus accommodates 40 children, divided into two sections forming one family presided over by a chef de famille aided by two contre-maitres. In addition to these a colon is chosen monthly in each section, who with the title of Elder Brother assists the superintendents in the management of the household.

Each of these houses containing 43 persons, cost, internal fittings included, 8300 francs [£332] that is 193 francs [£7. 14] for each inmate or 9 francs 65 centimes annually.

Four houses are already finished, they stand 10 metres [33 feet] apart, sheds filling up the intervening space.

The ground floor of the first house is occupied by tailors, shoemakers, coopers, and plaiters of straw, and there is a rope walk in the adjoining shed. In the second house is a carpenter's shop, the wood required being stored in the shed next beyond. In the third house we are this year cultivating silkworms, from which seven ounces of silk were obtained, and the third shed forms a covered court.

The fourth house contained six cells, (the punishment quarter not being yet erected), and various apartments for the nee of the officers. A forge and blacksmith's shop occupied the fourth shed; the fifth house which was to be the chaplain's residence, was nearly finished. M. de Courteilles lived at his mansion at a short distance from the institution, but M. Demetz, the Sisters of Charity, and the officers inhabited adjacent buildings, which included also the chapel, infirmary, baths, and several other departments of the establishment, among which were the general kitchen, and various domestic offices.

The first house intended for the colons being ready by January, 1840, on the 22nd of that month both the Directors repaired to the prison of Fontevault, where they selected nine youths, with whose antecedents they, had made themselves thoroughly acquainted, to return with them to Mettray. A very interesting account of this journey is quoted by M. Paul Huot* from the narrative of one of the young officers who accompanied M.M. Demetz and de Courteilles, which we regret we have not space to give.

All these nine colons behaved perfectly well from the time they reached Mettray, the change in their treatment appearing to produce an almost marvellous alteration in their conduct.

Towards the end of February M. de Courteilles brought four colons from Normandy, and early in March M. Demetz added six more who accompanied him from Paris, and their numbers were gradually increased from month to month by children coming from all parts of France; indeed in sending them the departments farthest away considered the distance which separated them from us as a decided advantage; they knew that the boy would adopt with greater readiness the new course we pointed out if entirely cut off from old companions and associations so as to feel almost as if he were transported into a new world; and further important advantages must accrue from thus associating together children differing as widely in the place of their birth as in their national characteristics, and who will in course of time carry back with them to their homes the fruit of practical training and moral and religious culture.

Upon this latter point, the most important of all, we may say that M. Brault, our excellent and venerable chaplain, is thoroughly satisfied with the attention our lads give to his instructions, and with the zealous manner in which they perform their religious duties.

In the course of ten months then, we have provided houseroom for 120 children, of whom 84 with the proportionate number of officers are already settled among us. We have exerted our utmost efforts to win the confidence and affection of these lads, and hitherto they have yielded to the influences we have brought to bear, in a manner to afford us the liveliest hope for their future welfare."

---

* Trois Jours a Mettray, par Paul Huot. Paris; 1848.

The lads were at first chiefly employed in making a carriage road to the colony, in laying out gardens, in levelling the open courts, and in building more houses. The prejudice at first felt against them in the neighbourhood had been already overcome by their good behaviour, and some vinedressers had even asked permission to hire them, which had been granted, when the applicants were respectable men, and lived sufficiently near the colony to render strict supervision of the young laborers, by their own masters, practicable.

Most of the lads having been employed while in prison in weaving, their health originally defective had been much injured by bending over the looms, and consequently many of them reached Mettray in a deplorable state of weakness and disease. The open air life there, however, produced a rapid improvement, and was so beneficial that it became a rule to select sickly lads from the prisons in the hope that their health would be restored by the change, a fact which sufficiently accounts for the delicate appearance of many of the boys, and for the deaths amounting to two per cent. of their number.

The colons spend only two hours and a half per day in the school-room, a period which is as necessary for bodily rest as for mental instruction. They are taught reading writing and arithmetic, the authorized system of weights and measures, linear drawing, and singing, which latter is very efficacious in promoting discipline and moral improvement, and whose favorable influence on very degraded natures we have already had opportunities for observing.

The events of each day will be found recorded almost hour by hour, in the journal kept by the upper contre-maitre in each family. Everything which occurs is entered with the utmost exactness and detail in this register of which we send a copy once in three months to your Committee. It contains the whole history of the colony.

The punishments inflicted and rewards given, are summed up at the end of each month ; the number and the nature of the offences committed and the names of the culprits, as also those of the lads who have not incurred blame, are all recorded, so that the conduct of each lad during any one month may be compared with his behaviour at a former similar period, and his progress thus ascertained.

Our regulations are severe and strictly observed. In food, clothing and bedding, our lads have only what is absolutely necessary ; obedience and punctuality in the performance of their duties are rigidly enforced, and the smallest offence is punished. With all this, we have no walls, and yet not one of our boys has ever thought of escaping, not even on coming out of the cell, where many of them have undergone confinement for ten or fifteen days on bread and water diet. . . . It is by convincing them that we are guided in all things by a sense of justice, that we acquire so powerful a hold upon our lads.

To afford them a proof of this and to furnish ourselves with an additional safeguard, we cause all lesser offenders to be tried before a tribunal, consisting of colons selected by us from among those whose names are upon the Tablet of Honor—reserving to ourselves only the right of mitigating such sentences as we consider too severe.

At the second annual meeting of the Société Paternelle the Count de Gasparin thus addressed them—:

The agricultural colony of Mettray is no longer a project, it has become a reality, its success is no longer disputed, it is acknowledged by the whole neighborhood, and attested by the crowds of visitors who come to see the institution; and many of you whom I address have had the opportunity of convincing yourselves with your own eyes, that your undertaking is firmly established, and that it fulfils the promises it held forth.

Yes, Gentlemen, we have seen our lads, who came to us from prison overcome with bodily ailments, recover their health under the influence of the laborious and hardy system to which they are subjected at Mettray; we have seen their hypocritical expressions of countenance change to one of modest self-possession which testified to their moral regeneration, tranquil conscience, and their resolution to keep henceforth in the right path; we have seen dissimulation give place to candor, hatred of their fellow creatures to kindness, the schemes of a criminal course, to the hope of regaining a respectable position in society. Those who have once rejoiced in such a spectacle can never forget it, and it becomes their duty to make their experience widely known, that such results may not be confined to one spot in France, but may be multiplied on an extended scale. [This indeed had already to some extent taken place.] The institution has already borne fruit.

It has been imitated in many parts of the kingdom by pious and benevolent men; an improved system is rapidly extending, and must ere long become general, for the contrast between the lot of children who enjoy its advantages, and that of those who are excluded from them, will be too painful to be long endured.

You will learn, gentlemen, from the report about to be read to you the progress of the institution during the past year and that which may be hoped for in the next. We could not have obtained such results even with the aid afforded us by the Ministers of the Interior, of Agriculture, and of Public Instruction, but for the generous offering of a man whose help every benevolent enterprize is sure to receive. The Count d'Ourches in bestowing upon us the sum of 140,000 francs (£5,600) has anticipated by many years the time at which Mettray would have arrived at its full development. With his assistance we are now able to finish the buildings whose completion we had been obliged to defer, and shall thus have it in our power to receive the full number of youths to which for the present we have felt obliged to limit ourselves.

The class of children admitted to the Institution at Mettray are thus described in the annual report for 1841 :—

We learn from the information we have been able to procure, and from the answers of the children themselves to the questions we address to them on their entrance, that a large proportion have been accustomed to live by begging ; that they have been badly clothed, ill fed, and have received no care from their parents, who made a profit out of the wretched appearance of their children, and often employed them as instruments of theft.

Though declaring that those children have acted sans discernement, the law has nevertheless treated them with great severity, for it may justly be said that they acted compulsorily, since they did but yield to the imperious commands of hunger.

We must admit, however that there are among them some who are most precociously wicked, and who if not dealt with in time would infallibly become deeply criminal.

Our first care on the arrival of each is to study his character, in order to ascertain the treatment most suitable to him.

If we would operate successfully on the individual we must convince him that he has been sent to the colony not only for his present good, but for his future welfare. He must be made to understand that if the work to which he is set here is more laborious than that in which he was employed in prison, its purpose is to develop his physical powers while promoting his moral improvement. Finally, it is necessary to awaken in his heart those principles of religion and virtue without which no reformation is possible.

The wretched state of health in which most of the children came to the colony, together with the laborious life there imposed upon them rendered a larger quantity of animal food necessary than they had received in prison.

It has been said that experience, which teaches us the importance of good conduct, teaches us also the importance of good health—certain it is, that the one exercises a great influence over the other, and we therefore neglect no means which can help to strengthen the constitutions of our lads. Thus, throughout the winter, excepting a very few days when the cold was unusually intense, they have worked in a quarry near the colony, clothed in coarse cloth, and their feet having no other covering than their sabots.

The uniform they wear is extremely simple, and so made as to leave their limbs the greatest freedom of action, and thus promote their healthful development. Without being very remarkable it is sufficiently peculiar to attract attention to the lads in case they should run away, for it must never be forgotten that they enjoy perfect liberty; we desired in avoiding every precaution which might recal the prison to their minds, to impress deeply upon them the conviction that at the colony they begin a new life, where force is replaced by persuasion.

Field labor, besides its importance in a pecuniary point of view, affords healthful exercise to the body, while it sufficiently occupies the mind to banish the evil thoughts which idleness is sure to induce; it affords another advantage in making rest absolutely necessary to the peasant at the very hour that his brethren who dwell in towns are entering into those amusements and dissipations which tend to enervate and demoralize the partaker.

To effect a complete reformation it was required to restore to this neglected class the habits and affections of the family circle, so dear to man, and which supply the firmest bands by which society is held together: This has been accomplished by dividing the colony into sections of forty boys, in each of which superintendents, called respectively the Chef de famille and the Elder Brother, exercise an authority maintained by kindness and good counsel.

By placing the members of each of these sections or families in a position to provide for all their wants themselves, to build partly with their own hands their common dwelling, and to cultivate the field and the garden belonging to it, we created for them the associations of home, and a love for their own fireside, and familiarised them with the feelings and the duties which arise there.

It was we believe impossible to discover a better means for raising these unhappy beings—the offspring of vice—in the eyes of the world, and in their own, and of converting them into useful members of society.

Thanks to the spot we have chosen, we may hope that the Colony will eventually produce everything it requires for its own consumption.

Vegetables being the chief article of the boys' diet, and having to be provided in proportion to their increasing numbers, twenty hectares (about 50 acres) of land round about the houses, and in the neighbourhood of water, will be planted with vegetables of all descriptions; the land at a distance will be sown with cereal crops.*

An agricultural master superintends the cultivation of the soil besides giving a course of lessons on this subject suited to the capacity of the lads. Each agricultural division consists of twelve colons and a sub agricultural master, who is either a good gardener, vine-dresser, field laborer, or hedger and ditcher, and who teaches the lads under his care the best methods of performing their work, and handling their tools. When the weather is bad the colons plait straw

---

* It has been said that the lads have a sickly appearance, and that their food is insufficient, consisting, as it does, largely of bread and vegetables. It must be recollected, however, that this is the ordinary fare of the French peasantry, who rarely taste meat, and that the duty of not placing individuals who have incurred the penalty of the law in a position of greater material comfort than their honest neighbours, is never forgotten at Mettray.

for making their hats ; and in future, when our sheds are finished, the boys will under their shelter break stones for the roads, our intention being to make road-menders and even stone masons of some of them.

A great number are employed during the season in picking mulberry-leaves for the support of silkworms ; we are rapidly increasing this branch of industry, to which our circumstances promise high success. M. de Ohavannes, Inspector of silkworm establishments, having been sent by Government into the Department of Indre-et-Loire, has been kind enough to give a weekly public lecture on the culture of the mulberry, and the management of silkworms. Last year we gained a gold medal at the Exhibition for silk, the product of our colons' labor.

It is a source of constant congratulation to ourselves that the Colony was established on land unencumbered by buildings, and that thus we have been spared the necessity of modifying our system to suit pre-existing circumstances. It has been often said with unhappily too much truth, in reference to our old prisons whose unsuitable construction exercises so injurious an influence, that stones made their law.

We have now (May 1841) six houses completed, and the new buildings under construction are the school-room, the place of punishment, and the chapel. It was at first thought that the former would also serve for the chapel, and that it might be used alternately for divine service, and for the purposes of a school. We consulted several persons whose opinion deserved to have great weight with us, and many instances of schools in which this plan is pursued were mentioned. But what may be very suitable for children who have early been trained to religious habits, cannot be applied in the case of individuals utterly different from them.

There is no task so delicate and so difficult as that of leading back into the right path those whose early education has been completely neglected, and it is necessary everything should tend, even in the smallest details, to promote the object we would attain. The words of the Chaplain, the associations of the place, the solemnity of the service, the harmony of the chanting, should all operate together on the child's heart, reaching it through his ears and eyes.

The munificence of Count d'Ourches, by enabling us to build both a school-room and a chapel, has put an end to our difficulty. Count Leon d'Ourches, after having on a former occasion given us 10,000 francs (£400) has recently presented us with a donation of 130,000 francs (£5,200).

We know not how adequately to thank our generous benefactor, and are glad thus publicly to pay him the just tribute of our gratitude.

We have already succeeded in destroying, or at least in weakening to a great degree, the spirit of combination which our colons had acquired in prison. Now any one who does wrong is blamed by his companions, and incurs their displeasure. We feel assured that we have reached the point when the good operate on the bad, and that our lads are the first to repress the wrong acts committed among them. Lately they obliged a comrade who had behaved ill to return a book which he had received as a reward. On a former occasion they demanded the expulsion of one of their number, saying that they did not like to retain among them an individual who disgraced them all.

Another time one of them told us of some misconduct which had occurred in the infirmary; it was endeavored in vain to ascertain who had informed us, when the lad stood up in the middle of his companions, and said in a loud voice, "It was I, and I am not afraid to own it."

At the last election of Elder Brothers they at once selected a colon, who, having vainly urged one of his companions who had been guilty of some fault to own it, came openly, and informed us of it himself. Sometimes the culprits themselves tell us of their offence, but, it must be confessed, such an event is very rare.

Six months ago the abbé Fiasiaux, who is now at the head of the Agricultural Colony at Marseilles, having come to visit us, asked the lads to point out to him the three best boys amongst them. Their eyes turned instantly towards three colons, whose irreproachable conduct placed them far above the rest. He then applied a more delicate test, and one which rather alarmed us, not knowing what might be the result. He asked which was the worst boy. We expected that a certain lad would be pointed out by his companions, for there was no doubt on whom the choice should fall. All, however, remained motionless, until, at length, one came forward with a pitiful air, and said, in a very low tone, "It is me." The worthy abbé embraced him affectionately, and said, "What you have just done convinces me that you are mistaken, and I do not believe you on your word." From that time the child has behaved tolerably well, which is a great improvement on his former conduct.*

Another fact proving the good spirit which exists among our boys, and the happy influence exercised over them at the Colony, is that when a serious offence has been committed by any of them, that very instant their games stop, they become silent on the play-ground, and for many days afterwards not the slightest fault calls for punishment.

We endeavor to foster a spirit of charity in our lads, for any one who has had an opportunity of practically comparing the anguish of mind consequent upon a bad action, with the sweet and holy pleasure which a good one leaves behind, can scarcely relapse into evil ways.

We read to our colons an account of the disasters caused by the inundation of the Rhone, and several of them who had relatives at Lyons proposed, in order to send some help to those who had suffered from the floods, to give a portion of the savings they had brought with them from prison. The others wished to follow their example, and only regretted our attempt to moderate their eagerness—they wanted to give away all they possessed. Besides the sum we permitted them to bestow, we proposed to them to go without a portion of their food one day, and to add the money thus saved to the amount already subscribed—to perform, namely, by enduring this fast, an act of what has been rightly called corporate charity. This suggestion was received with delight by all but one, who murmured at the plan: his companions punished him for his conduct by condemning him to eat his full share seated alone at table, and he was so severely reproached for his selfishness that we think he is thoroughly cured of it. Perhaps this incident may induce the belief that the lads were carried away by general feeling, or that they yielded to external impulse. The following fact will prove the contrary. Very lately one of them, having adopted the evil counsel of a workman who happened to have been employed at the Colony, was put into the cell; on coming out he was told that the workman, who had a family to support, had been sent away, and that, perhaps, he and his children were without bread to eat, when the boy, deeply moved, exclaimed, "Let them give him everything I have."

---

* We learn, from Mr. Hall's Lecture on Mettray, that he is now "bon militaire."

Our colons work in the kitchen garden where the trees are covered with fruit, without ever touching it. This is a fact which visitors have had opportunities of verifying, and which has caused them much surprise. We have, however, been able to teach our lads that their antecedents make that a serious offence in them which if committed by others would be but a trifling fault.

In general they are humane and compassionate * * * a melancholy incident which we must not pass over in silence, will convince you of their sensibility. For the first time since the foundation of the Colony into which a hundred and forty three children have been admitted we have a death to record. * * * This loss was a very deep affliction to us, rendered the more severe by the gentleness and pious resignation of the poor child who died. Seized before he departed from Clairvaux (the prison from which he came) with a fatal disorder, he never left the Infirmary during the fortnight he remained with us. A few minutes before his death, he said, "It is sad indeed to leave the Colony so soon." His strength no longer permitting him to raise himself in bed, he begged the chef of the family to which he belonged, and who had watched all night beside him, to bend down, and kissing him, thanked him for all his kindness. His last words expressed repentance and gratitude. * * * His companions attended his funeral and we made the ceremony deeply impressive. The words pronounced at the edge of the grave produced a great effect on our lads; all wept, and no doubt they will retain a solemn remembrance of a scene witnessed by them for the first time. You well know, gentlemen, how these things are managed in our prisons.

We have obtained land for our little cemetery near at hand, and its situation is calculated to affect the mind deeply. The Elder Brother of the family to which the poor boy who died belonged has it in charge to take care of the turf on his grave. * * *

We have found means of employing a part of Sunday, a day so difficult to get through in penitentiaries and prisons, in such a manner that, while resting from labor, our lads are saved from idleness.

Two hours of the day are spent in gymnastic exercises. Children possess an exuberance of animal spirits which they must have the means of getting rid of no matter how, and often this necessity has more to do with the blows they give each other than any malicious feeling. Every thing which tends to fatigue them helps to keep away evil thoughts, and we take care therefore that their games shall necessitate violent exercise that they may be tired by their play as well as by their work ; thus at night they fall asleep the moment they lie down, and their slumber is unbroken till it is time to rise.*

As attempts to escape might destroy the usefulness of our Institution, we have classed them among the offences which are punished by relegation to prison, but meanwhile we have sought, and it would appear successfully, to make our lads feel that having been set at liberty as it were on parole, it would be dishonorable on their part to run away from the asylum which has received them.

The words " God sees you " are written on almost every wall, that our colons may be constantly reminded that if they can escape the vigilance of man, there is no hiding place from the eye of God.

Among our lads there is one about fifteen years of age who has a most peculiar and troublesome idiosyncrasy, he has a passion for appropriating everything he can lay hands upon, for which it is impossible to account. It is an instinct with him, as it is with some of the lower animals ; thus though he does not know how to read he steals every book he can reach ; he has not made his first communion and his religious sense has scarcely dawned, nevertheless he possesses himself of the various objects used in religious worship, hiding all these things in his hammock, or in some hole. His faculties, it is true, are very imperfectly developed, but he is by no means an idiot.

He has been consigned to the cell eleven times, and as soon as he comes out he begins his thievish practices over again, and even in the cell he finds means to gratify this unfortunate passion ; he hides within his wooden shoes the straw that has been given him to plait, and he has been found with strips torn from his counterpane twisted round his body under his clothes.

What will be the future lot of such a being ? It is painful indeed to contemplate his probable fate. Still we will not give up the hope that our mode of treatment may be successful with him as it has been with so many of his companions, though it must be owned none of them ever exhibited such unaccountable perversity.

The punishments inflicted in our institution are

Erasure from the Tablet of Honor, Detention within doors,
Compulsory labor,
Bread and water diet,
Imprisonment in a light cell,
Imprisonment in a dark cell.

Before inflicting any of these punishments we have invariably recourse to a preliminary measure of which the advantage is so great that we cannot pass it unmentioned.

If punishment is to produce a salutary effect it is imperative that its object should submit himself to it unresistingly, and indeed that he should be the first to feel that he has deserved it. To impress this conviction on the culprit's mind it is in the first place necessary that the penalty should be inflicted in a calm and gentle spirit, and dictated by the strictest justice—that power of reason which convinces while it commands, as one of our excellent magistrates has so well said; secondly, that both he who inflicts and he who receives chastisement should be perfectly cool.

---

* The boys rise at five, a.m., the whole year round.

It is impossible that these conditions should exist at the moment when a serious offence naturally exciting indignation, has been committed; and therefore our masters are desired when they have a complaint to make against any boy to send him to the waiting room, (parloir). This is in fact our salle de dépôt, but we avoid the use of every term which would recall the prison to the minds of our lads. Being sent to the waiting room never prejudices the boy's case, and consequently he goes there willingly. Directly this step has been taken we are informed of it, and we have then plenty of time to refer to his antecedents, and institute an inquiry if we deem it necessary.

During this delay the culprit begins to reflect on what he has done, the master becomes cool, we have time to consider the circumstances of the case, to consult together, and when at length we decide the matter, in perfect calmness and thoroughly acquainted with the whole affair, we are sure that justice is administered in a paternal spirit.

Of all the punishments which unhappily we are under the necessity of inflicting, we must confess that the cell alone exercises a moral influence; all the rest, such as dry bread, being kept in on Sunday, &c., have a useful effect only on children under nine years of age, and always irritate older lads. Our officers have been struck with the change that seclusion in the cell has produced in the most obstinate dispositions. Indeed, our colonels themselves have expressed their opinion of it in very plain terms, and their authority in such a case is not to be despised. "As for us," they say, "we would rather have a whipping, but the cell does us more good."

Some persons have thought that separate confinement, as it has been well defined by one of our most distinguished writers, and which has hitherto been very absurdly confounded with solitary confinement, should be thrown aside now that such success has been attained at Mettray, where the lads are associated together. But this is a very serious error which it is our duty to correct.

Separate confinement, instead of being opposed to our system is in perfect harmony with it, and is, in our opinion, its indispensable complement. . . . In the United States children, before being received into institutions analogous to ours, are subjected to a shorter or longer term of separate confinement; they lay aside in the cell the turbulent spirit they displayed outside, and silence and reflection prepare them for moral and religious instruction, and for the adoption of a new course of life.

Independently, however, of this wholesome influence, separate confinement is necessary also as a means of restraint. The course of treatment pursued at an agricultural colony does not admit of sufficient severity to intimidate undisciplined dispositions, some of which retain their vicious propensities, unless the fear of being sent back to prison can be made to exercise a wholesome influence over them. And again, the deprivation of liberty, which is part of the punitive power of imprisonment, cannot exist with the kind of employment pursued at a reformatory school.

If, then, it is desired that the operation of the law should not be illusory, and that those likely to fall within her grasp should not hope to escape with impunity; if, above all, our threat of relegation to prison is not to be an empty one, it is indispensable that the colons before they come to us, should have experienced confinement there in all its harshness and severity.

Many of the boys who have come to us direct from ordinary gaols, where there is no regular labor, and where the prisoners, especially if children, do almost what they please, ask to be sent back. In very cold weather some of them have even regretted the House of Correction, where, instead of working out of doors, exposed to the inclemency of the season, they were placed in well warmed workshops with just a shuttle in their hands.

It must be evident how embarrassing such requests are to us who wish admission to Mettray to be considered as a favor and a reward; though, on the other hand, they cannot fail to remove the apprehensions of those individuals who fear that our system is not sufficiently severe.

But to return. We never should attain our end unless the treatment in prison were harsh enough to create a dread of being sent back there, or, in one word, if separate confinement were not invariably the probation through which every colon must pass before coming to us.

For the rest, as regards this system, the effect produced by a less or greater period of detention is the only point about which there remains any difference of opinion; and the establishment of reformatory farm schools affords the means of conciliating all parties, by rendering it easy to abridge that period as much as may be thought desirable, without incurring the evils which would otherwise arise from too speedy liberation.

The value of the above remarks cannot be over estimated, especially when we know that fifteen years' additional experience has not altered the opinion of the surviving Director of Mettray upon the absolute necessity of subjecting the lad sent to a Reformatory School, to such previous treatment as shall make him feel the change to be a boon, and upon the expediency of this the first stage in reformatory discipline, consisting of separate confinement in a well ordered prison or analogous institution. The warm discussion which arose on the question of imprisonment prior to admission to the reformatory school, at the conference of the National Reformatory Union held at Bristol in August last, evinced the importance of the subject, and the great difference of opinion which yet prevails regarding it.* We therefore have been desirous, though at the expense of some space, to make known the sentiments of those to whom the practical knowledge of many years has given great authority.

The report dated 1842, was read at a much earlier period of the year than usual, namely in January, and consequently narrates the history of the colony during only eight months, the previous one having been read in May 1841. We are informed that,

Not a single colon failed at the musters during the year 1841. Their conduct has been good, better even than could have been hoped. In the course of January half our lads incurred no punishment; in February, March, April, and May, two-thirds; in June, July, August September, and October, three quarters; and in November and December, four-fifths, were exempt from its infliction.

These statements are not only highly favorable, but very remarkable, when it is considered that the least infraction of the rules of the Institution is visited with a penalty. Extreme severity of discipline is, however, accompanied by great personal kindness, and many gentle influences beside the affectionate demeanor of the officers, are brought to bear upon the colons.

Every child, and every man too, has a good side to his character by which he may be approached, and through which his feelings may be touched and softened; and if only this be carefully studied, and means earnestly sought by which the master may gain an influence over him, assuredly they will be found if the appeal be made from heart to heart.

However depraved and neglected may have been the early life of our lads, there is always some recollection and association connected with the village they came from, with its church spire (their landmark), or some attachment to their native place which may be profitably awakened.

Very few mothers are wholly bad. In the course of a miserable and disorderly life some brighter days have occurred when the father or the mother has bestowed a caress and given some good advice to their child. In cases where sickness or poverty has been the first cause of wrong doing, often before yielding to its pressure, before entering the path of crime, the child has hesitated, sometimes resisted the temptation, and many times, even while giving way to sin, he has not stifled the voice of conscience.

In the course of 1841, an important change was made in the method of conveying mental instruction.

---

* Authorized Report of the first Provincial Meeting of the National Reformatory Union. Arrowsmith, Clare-street, Bristol 1856. Price Two Shillings. See also ante, p.p. 782 to 791.—Ed.

Originally all the lessons were given by the schoolmaster himself with the assistance of monitors. It was found however to be impossible, with such large numbers, for him to address himself individually to his pupils, the monitors were in fact the teachers, and the master did little more than keep order. By the new arrangement the chefs and sous-chefs give the lessons to the members of their own family while the schoolmaster passing from class to class animates, directs, and superintends the whole. The chefs, themselves well educated men, make excellent teachers, and their presence preventing the infraction of rules, which otherwise so large an assemblage of boys would have opportunities of committing, the number of offences has been reduced to a startling extent. While there had been twenty-four instances of punishment during six months, under the old arrangement, a similar period after this change, afforded only two.

Nine colons had completed their sentences since the foundation of the colony, and had been placed out. All were behaving well, though some had been among the most troublesome at Mettray.

This circumstance is so remarkable and so gratifying, that we shall be excused for giving you the particulars of the conduct of two in whom we had the least confidence. M — J. a Jew born at Paris in 1826, was at ten years of age apprehended there for a theft committed in company with other young vagabonds. The Vie de Cartouche (an immoral book) was found in his pocket.

Acquitted, but sentenced to be detained five years in a House of Correction, he passed three and a half at la Roquette and twenty months at Mettray. His father is dead, his mother in prison at Clermont, his brother has been several times convicted, and his sister is a most abandoned character. Obligated to live in the streets of Paris, "my companions were bad," he told us, "and I lived like them, that is to say by theft and by begging." Gifted with remarkable intelligence, and acquiring with wonderful facility whatever it was attempted to teach him, he nevertheless exhibited the most perverse disposition; insolent, violent, and vindictive, he resisted every order of his masters, and poured forth abuse and threats of vengeance against any of his companions who he thought had used him ill, mistakenly declaring that his law authorised him in demanding an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth.

He was consigned to the cell seven times during his stay at the Colony, his seclusion amounting in all to a period of five months. Shortly before his liberation he seemed to delight in annoying the contre-maitres, and at last, just as he was about to leave, infringed the rules, thereby incurring punishment which he refused to submit to, saying he was going to be set at liberty. We replied, that no one was at liberty to do wrong, and that we should send him to the cell on bread and water diet, and keep him there until he was reformed. For two months we kept this lad thus under our care, seeing him every day and striving to convince him that his true interest made it imperative on him to amend his conduct, and to perfect himself in his trade as a Shoemaker, that we might be able to apprentice him when he was fit to be at liberty.

This short but severe struggle resulted in our gaining the victory.

M——'s intelligence enabled him to perceive that efforts so persevering must be disinterested; overcome by us, he begged as a favor that he might be permitted to remain in the cell until he should so far have learnt his trade, as to have such a pair of shoes of his own making to shew to the shoemakers of Tours, as would secure him a good master.

We granted his request on condition that he would not leave the cell, and would work there industriously at his trade, telling him at the same time that he was free, and that his own wish alone detained him. The key of the cell was given to M——, he passed three weeks there, faithful to his word, working so diligently and with such right feeling, that we had at length the pleasure of placing him with one of the best shoemakers in Tours, where for six months his conduct has been irreproachable. His neighbours rejoice to see him in the shop of the excellent man who has received him into his house, he comes to pass almost every Sunday he can be spared at the Colony, and is improving rapidly in his calling, indeed there is every reason to hope that his reformation is permanent.

T——de l'Isere, twenty years of age who came to us from the Penitentiary at Lyons in May 1840, and left in October 1841, gave us great trouble. A Brazier by trade, he excelled in his calling; beside being unusually intelligent, he was active and industrious, and had brought with him from Lyons savings, amounting to 600 Francs (£24). He exercised considerable influence over his companions. Violent in temper, but professing great attachment to us, he appeared to restrain himself in order to prove his devotion to us. We hoped much from him, and secured him an excellent place with one of the best Braziers in Tours, who was to give him, as soon as he left the Colony, board, lodging, and a Franc and a half a day. A fortnight before his time was up, several pieces of money were stolen from the dormitory occupied by the pupils of the Ecole Préparatoire, by one of the colonists who cleaned the room, R—— by name, the worst boy in the Colony, and whom we immediately sent back to the Penitentiary at Lyons. . . . The wretched lad had no sooner committed the theft than not knowing what to do with the money, nor where to hide it, he gave it to T. who was weak enough to take care of, or rather to conceal it, for several days. From that moment T——'s whole appearance changed, his conscience allowed him no rest; always uneasy, he constantly hovered about the place where he had hidden the purse containing the stolen money. For two days, as he afterwards told us, he was continually on the point of giving it up to us, but the delay was fatal; he feared, after having postponed it so long, that his repentance would appear tardy and insincere; he remained silent, but his uneasiness had not escaped our notice, and we were inquiring the cause of it, when an Elder Brother informed us of the theft which R. had committed, and of T——'s complicity. We took the latter to the spot where he had hidden the booty, and made him give it up, then having had him brought into the presence of his assembled comrades, we tore in pieces his indentures, and made him confess his fault to the master who was about to have received him.

Thus all his companions saw every chance destroyed of his entering that path which, but for his offence, promised to lead him to prosperity.

We ordered him to the cell, and kept him there until we were convinced of his sincere repentance, when one of those excellent men who never despair of reclaiming a fellow creature, took him under his care, although we concealed nothing from him of what had occurred; and now T—— fills a confidential situation and is unexceptionable in his conduct. Excuse these details, gentlemen—you will appreciate their importance as we do; our officers were constantly saying, "If the Directors reform M— and T— they cannot but reform all the rest."

The time during which these two lads were under our care was much less than it should have been, for they were little more than a year with us, and nevertheless we feel we may reckon on their future good conduct."

This Report records that M. Giraud, (whom we learn from another pamphlet,* having come to Mettray for one day, never left it till his death, performing meanwhile gratuitously the duties of accountant to the institution,) had resolved to build, out of the savings of a life of honourable industry, a house for the reception of a family of colons, which the Directors intended to call by his name. Another house too was about to be erected at the expense of Madame Hebert, of Rouen, in memory of a beloved daughter whom she had lost.

We learn from the next Report, dated March 1843, that 241 boys had been received at the colony by the end of 1842, of whom 45 had been placed out, and, under watchful patronage the excellent effects of which are constantly brought before us, all, excepting three, were conducting themselves well. One of them—

"D—, naturally of a violent ungovernable disposition, who alluding to the circumstances of his birth, said, "I have no name now, but only give me a sword, and I shall know how to earn myself one," has been admitted as a volunteer into the 8th regiment of Hussars quartered at Tours. He has already won the esteem of his superior officers and of his comrades, and indeed belongs to the best set in his regiment; he has not been punished once though it is a year since he joined the army, and we are expecting that he will soon be made a * Notice Sur Mettray, par A. Cochin. Tours.

brigadier M—, the Jew whose history we quoted from the preceding Report, is fulfilling our most favourable expectations.

Another lad, T—, gave up his place in order to join his mother who was in the greatest destitution, and whom he wished to support by his labor. On leaving the Colony to return to his relatives he found on the road to le Mans, between six and seven miles from Tours, a parcel containing property to the amount of 75 francs, which belonged to the Vice-president of the Tribunal Civil at Tours. T— retraced his steps and faithfully delivered into our keeping the bundle he had picked up, and then resumed his journey homewards, where he well knew nothing but poverty awaited him.

Unhappily his virtue was not strong enough to resist the temptations of the position, in which with the best motives, he had placed himself, and he fell again into the hands of the police.

One of the three who relapsed robbed his master of two francs and a bottle of wine, to the great indignation of his former companions at the colony.

Our lads always feel the ill-conduct of one who has been among them as a disgrace to themselves, and do not fail to express their disapproval whenever an opportunity occurs. We take care to keep them informed of the behaviour of their comrades who have gone to service. For this purpose a table elaborately drawn up is hung against the wall in the schoolroom. It contains the names of the colons who have been apprenticed, together with those of their names patrons, their place of abode, and the information which is sent us every three months, respecting their industry and moral conduct. These tables are read to the assembled Colony whenever any new facts have been entered. The fear and the hope of having their names thus quoted with evil or with good tidings, exercises a powerful influence over the youths, and this publicity produces an equally good effect on strangers. Patrons who come to the Colony see the information which they have themselves transmitted respecting their wards copied word for word on the wall of the schoolroom, and thus they can convince themselves of the truthfulness of our mode of proceeding.

Experience continued to demonstrate the wisdom of abolishing all physical means of detention at the colony, the effect of which is to make the lads feel they are on their honor not to attempt to escape.

This is so true that a chef happening one day to ask one of them who had tried twice over at the risk of his life to escape from prison, why he never thought of running away from the Colony where he had to work much harder, he answered, "It is because there are no walls at Mettray."

The Duc Decazes paid a visit to the Institution this year, and in speaking to the colons of the advantage and happiness which should flow from domestic life, quoted as an example of what this should be, the royal family, who had recently sustained a loss in which the whole nation shares.*

His remarks produced such an impression that when he had left, our lads asked to subscribe the proceeds of a day's labor to the monument that France and the army are raising to the memory of a Prince so deservedly esteemed and regretted, and whose name was one of the first inscribed in the list of our founders.

The tablet of honor at this time presented a very favorable aspect. Out of 172 colons, the names of 89 or more than half, were inscribed there.

The beneficial effect of the Tablet is very apparent, and we have also every reason to be satisfied with the employment of Elder Brothers, elected, as they are, every month by their companions. The individuals chosen are generally well fitted for the post. Our chefs acknowledge that their co-operation is most useful in the management of the families, and upon the lads themselves the office has a powerful effect for good.

Every one who exercises authority over others feels it to be necessary to make his example conform to his precept, and thus we have seen lads who had acquired this distinction correct faults in which they had before indulged. Through them, too, we know every thing that occurs in play time, and indeed at all hours of the day, the Elder Brothers being on the same level with their companions; moreover, we acquire this knowledge without recourse to that system of espionage which degrades alike those who execute and those who employ it. The Elder Brother, wearing a badge upon his arm, feels that he is invested with authority, but though it is his duty to prevent causes of punishment, he has not the power to inflict it; he reports all infractions of the rules, and as in so doing he is only fulfilling the duties of an office in which his brethren have placed him, they submit without a murmur to the consequences.

The choice which the lads make in their elections indicates the spirit and tone of the family; because if an insubordinate feeling prevailed, or if any hostility were entertained towards the chefs of the family, the boys would select to fill the office of Elder Brother one who would be likely to aid their evil designs.

Of the 28 lads who, up to this date, had gained the honorable distinction of being elected Elder brother, 13 had come from one prison, that of Fontevrault, and indeed almost all the colons received thence at Mettray were remarkable for their excellent behaviour. This circumstance is explained by the course pursued by the Governor who then presided over that establishment. He held out the hope of removal to Mettray, as an inducement to behave well, and felt himself recompensed for the loss of his best boys, by the strong motive to good conduct with which he was thus able to inspire all under his care. His successor in office being unwilling to spare the lads who do him most credit, prefers to retain them in his own institution; the boys now sent from that prison are no longer distinguished among their companions at Mettray for good conduct, while Fontevault suffers from the absence in the lads of that potent incentive to right behaviour, the hope of thereby bettering their condition.

---

* The death of the Duke of Orleans is here alluded to.

The labor of the colons had yet brought but little profit, but the Directors having every reason to believe that the great object of their undertaking, namely, the reformation of their wards, was being realized, they could wait patiently till time and experience should make it successful also as a commercial enterprise. This would have been more rapidly achieved had they been willing to exchange agricultural for mechanical occupation, but convinced of the importance of the former to the moral and physical regeneration of their boys, they regarded every other consideration as secondary.

The lads were delighted with harvest work, and thoroughly enjoyed getting it in. "Just look here," exclaimed one of them, one day when he was raising a huge sheaf of corn on his shoulders, having never before doubtless gathered more than a few scattered ears, "Oh! if my mother had this!"

Children should be employed on fertile soil where they can soon behold the effect of their labor. Their interest in their occupation can only be awakened by speedy results, for even the morrow seems to their minds, afar off. They witness with delight the young corn sprout from the seed they have themselves sown, and the vegetables which they have planted growing higher from day to day, while the spectacle of an abundant harvest attaches them to the soil they cultivate.

Some of them are placed in the flower and kitchen gardens, where, besides the cultivation of flowers and vegetables, they are taught how to bud and graft fruit-trees, an art which is practised near our large towns and in the gardens of wealthy individuals, but generally much neglected in the country.

To stimulate the enterprising and active spirits of our young laborers, we allow them to compete in each class, among themselves, the trial, however, being made on the soil instead of on paper. Every month the boys assign their respective places to each, under the superintendence of their master, and once in three months these places are announced in the presence of the whole colony, when three rewards are granted to the three best workers in each class—namely, one franc, ( $9\frac{1}{4}d$ ) 75 centimes, ( $7\frac{1}{4}d$ ) and 50 centimes, ( $4\frac{3}{4}d$ ).

With regard to instruction in music.

We find that very great advantages are attached to this pursuit. The singing of our boys promotes good order, prevents conversation among them while moving from place to place, fixes good thoughts and good words in their memory, and attaches them to the institution where they have first felt these happy influences.

A knowledge of instrumental music, ensures them good pay and the prospect of advancement in the army; and practice in chanting gives them opportunities of being useful in whatever district we may find them employment, and brings them into advantageous communication with the clergy and other respectable inhabitants of the parish; of this we have already had satisfactory proof.

Every individual who has acquired the power of doing any one useful thing thoroughly well, will find opportunities for turning it to account. An instance of this occurred in the case of one of our lads whom we had placed in service at a little town in this department. He was amusing himself one Sunday by performing gymnastic feats in the market-hall, where he was seen by some respectable boys belonging to the town, who begged him to teach them the exercises. Thus he became their instructor, and they, out of gratitude, struck up a friendship with him which helped to keep him in the path of virtue.

Success of some kind, and the sympathy of our fellow creatures, are necessary to all of us. How many alas! unable to win the approbation of the good, have been driven to seek the applause of the wicked. We cannot make too great an effort to supply useful and noble objects of ambition.

Proofs of the increasing desire for instruction in the provinces, which we lately alluded to, have reached us in an interesting fact respecting the last colon who left us, and who is in service with a farmer of la Sologne.

This youth, D—, remained only a short time at the Colony, and departed before he had received more than a very moderate amount of instruction. Nevertheless, he wrote to us lately to ask for some elementary books, for he said, among the rustic population in which he was placed, some respectable laborers who could neither read nor write, had begged him to teach them all he knew, promising to pay him a franc and a half a month; and he has now seven pupils.

His letter being read to our lads gave them substantial proof of the advantages of knowledge, and his excellent conduct will ensure us situations for thirty of his comrades in this department.

The Chapel, for the building of which the liberality of Count d'Ourches had provided the funds, was now, with the exception of a few internal fittings, completed.

The Chapel in the midst of our little settlement, and its steeple, are familiar objects to which our lads become strongly attached. It gives Mettray a home-like aspect to their eyes, and it is with pain that they part from it. When those who are in service come to see us, they express in the warmest manner the delight with which they recognize the Church spire of the Colony.*

---

* We asked one of them if he enjoyed coming back among us; he replied with a most naïve expression of pleasure, "Monsieur Demetz (for our lads rarely use the title of Director), when I catch sight of the steeple of the Colony, I can't walk any longer; I am forced to run." Letter from M. Demetz to the Journal des Economistes. January 4, 1856.

All the outward signs of religious worship affect the childish imagination, and nothing should be omitted which can deepen its impression on their hearts. We generally find them well disposed in this respect. The Bretons especially, all retain something of the religious customs of their country, and of the creed of their parents.

When in summer they practise the art of swimming, which is alike useful in developing their physical powers, and affording them the means of aiding their fellow creatures, our Breton lads never plunge into the water without first making the sign of the Cross, and they always wear an image of the Blessed Virgin round their necks. Their companions never ridicule these outward signs of a devotional spirit, which secures respect because it is sincere, and besides we have so effectively brought every purifying influence to bear, that any such unworthy expression would find no echo among our lads.

The founders of Mettray did not escape the censure which has been lavished upon the promoters of similar undertakings in our own country, by those who imagine they detect injustice to the innocent in the attempt to reclaim the guilty. Is then their reformation a boon conferred on the guilty alone? Is it no benefit to the innocent man, be he rich or poor, but more especially the latter, since it is his class which suffers most from the deeds, whether of violence or dishonesty, of our criminal population, to be relieved from at least some portion of the risk to which he is exposed from their brutal and thievish propensities? May we not esteem as a very real benefit to all who share it, the consciousness that some effort is being made to rescue our fellow creatures, sunk, often by no fault of theirs, in misery and crime, and by teaching them to use to the advantage instead of the injury of mankind, the powers with which they have been gifted by our common Father, to make them useful members of the great human family? Again, is it no blessing to the honest and meritorious parents of the humbler classes who cannot watch over their offspring as the more wealthy are able to do, to have their children saved from the contamination of evil companions by the removal of these from among them? That it is so regarded by them we happen to have convincing proof in the fact related by Mr. Thomson of Banchory, that an Industrial School at Aberdeen, established for the reception of the most degraded children in the town, was warmly supported by the working classes, who, during the first year of its existence, while the wealthier inhabitants contributed £150, subscribed themselves £250 towards its funds, assigning as a reason for this liberality, that their children had been greatly benefited by the clearance from the streets of the young vagrants who formerly infested them, corrupting whoever they came in contact with.*

We maintain that great as is the boon conferred upon every individual reclaimed from a life of crime, the advantage to society is of no less magnitude; and when such reformation is effected by a system like that in operation at Mettray, and at many other institutions at home and abroad, where the material condition of the inmates is so regulated as to afford no temptation to the criminal, or cause of envy to the honest poor, we do not hesitate to assert that it is attended with no more incidental evil than is inseparable from every thing human. To dispute in which of the great works for the improvement of mankind, we ought to engage, is a melancholy waste of that energy for all of which ample employment may be found. Let us earnestly apply ourselves to the task lying nearest our hands, and rest assured that so we are best promoting the interests of our fellow creatures; but on this point we cannot do better than quote the words of the Directors of Mettray.

It has often been said, "before you improve the lot of criminals, and try to reclaim them from their sins, you should ameliorate the condition of the poor, and reform the vices of society." This is telling us to relinquish our endeavour to remove the causes and repair the effects of the evil round about us, in order to snatch hastily at the good which all desire to attain. Undoubtedly the sores which cover the social body, are numerous, and we ought to study the cause of the evil, and seek to dry up its source; but while the accomplishment of this great work is yet unfulfilled, and while the best means to attain it are being developed, let each apply himself to one sore, and heal it if he can; he will deserve the gratitude of all around him, and meanwhile each separate cure will hasten the restoration of the whole body to perfect health.

The Report for 1844 was read on the 12th of May, of that year, M. Duchatel, Minister of the Interior, presiding on the occasion. In the course of his address he said:—

Since the foundation of Mettray, not only the duties of my office, but my deep and personal sympathy in the undertaking, have led me to watch its progress closely. During a recent visit I have been able to observe with my own eyes how fully, under the guidance of the capable and excellent men who devote their lives to this noble work, the results obtained respond to the hopes of the founders and friends of the Colony. It is a grand and touching spectacle to behold those lads trained to order and to labor, strengthened and purified by the culture of the soil, and by the spiritual care they receive, and yet restrained by a discipline strict though beneficent, in accordance with the origin and the aim of the institution.

* Social Evils, their Causes and their Cure. Nisbett and Co., London. 1852.

Morally lost while yet in childhood, through the neglect of their parents and the contaminating example of vice, our prisons in the old state of things would have left the greater part of them sunk in crime to the end of their lives. But you convert them into honest and industrious laborers, and through your exertions society no longer regards them as enemies to be pursued and punished, but as instruments useful to the welfare of all. When I examined the colony in its minutest details, and made myself acquainted with its daily course of events, I felt what a rich reward for their devotion and their labor, must the results attained and the hopes engendered, afford day by day to its two Directors M. M. Demetz and de Brétignères de Courteilles, whose very names I love to pronounce.

In this Report we find the following passage :—

Deeply convinced of the importance of first impressions, we make it a point to fetch our lads ourselves from prison. The intimacy which a journey produces, and the confidence resulting thence will be at once understood. Three days of travelling will make you better acquainted with the character of your companion, than a whole year of the intercourse of ordinary life, and we cannot too soon gain a knowledge of the disposition of our lads, so as to know what methods we can most successfully employ for their reformation ; possibly it is for want of studying the moral constitution of man as carefully as the physical, that hitherto so little comparatively has been accomplished by education.

During the journey we converse with the lads, and more especially we allow them to talk among themselves in our presence, by which we discover much of the tendency of their minds, and of the secret motives which guide them ; thus, too, from the very first, we have opportunities of observing whether they are soberly or intemperately inclined, whether neat or slovenly, lively or dull, all which characteristics inevitably reveal themselves in the familiarity which travelling permits.

When engagements deprive us of the pleasure of going ourselves to fetch our new colons, and of witnessing the first hope of liberty kindle in their hearts, we depute benevolent individuals whom we can entirely trust to supply our place.

On reaching the Colony our first care is to distribute these new recruits among our families that, being widely dispersed, any unfavorable influence they might exercise shall be concentrated as little as possible, and so also that the old colons may, by their example and advice, predispose the new ones to obey our wishes.

Inscribed on the front of one of our houses are the words, " Let us love one another ; for charity comes from God." This precept, which has penetrated deep into the hearts of our lads, exercises a potent influence on their habits.

We can affirm, strange and almost incredible as it may appear, that among our boys, who have hitherto lived among companions indulging the grossest propensities, and who have had none but the most brutal examples before them, nothing is more rare than a rude or coarse action, and that, on the contrary, there never occurs an opportunity of helping and comforting each other of which they do not eagerly avail themselves. Thus, if one of their comrades is dangerously ill, the struggle is for permission to watch at his bed-side; and their eagerness in this respect is carried to such an extent that we find it necessary to treat the privilege to discharge this irksome duty as a reward.

The organ in our chapel is played by a blind youth, whose infirmity has excited the compassion of all our boys; one of them said, "I would gladly give two of my fingers to get him back his two eyes."

Some persons, though approving in many respects the system pursued at Mettray, have not concealed from us their opinion that we employ too large a staff of officers.

Doubtless they would be right if ours were simply an industrial institution, and our object were solely to instruct each lad in some trade.

In a factory a single superintendant may overlook fifty pupils in a workshop. But morality cannot be taught like a trade, and very different care and treatment are required to reform the character of a child from what will suffice to train his fingers.

Without referring to the difficulty of superintendence in the case of field work and farming operations, where the laborers are necessarily much dispersed, to replace evil by good aspirations is a task which can never be accomplished but by often repeated efforts, and the employment of, we might almost say, a superintendant to each individual child we have to watch over.

Although in our choice of occupation for them we always consider the natural tastes of our young laborers, we do not thereby escape requests for permission to change from one to another; but this arises from the natural tendency which exists in the child, and in the man too, to imagine that the worst of all positions is the one he happens to occupy.

We have, therefore, made it a rule that, before such permission can be granted, the applicant must have risen to be one of the three highest lads in the workshop where he was first placed, and that his

---

* News that a fire had burst forth in a factory near us arrived one day, and in seven minutes and a half our lads had started at full speed for the scene of the disaster, with their fire engine and all the necessary apparatus.

We were already half way there when we were informed that the fire had been got under. Though rejoiced that the evil had been put an end to, the boys were sadly disappointed in losing this opportunity for attesting their courage, and it is impossible to express the mortification and regret evinced by those of our colons who were under punishment at the time, and who, in accordance with our rules, were not permitted the gratification of risking their lives in the endeavor to serve their fellow creatures.

name shall be found on the tablet of honor. Thus, not being discouraged by a decided refusal, and feeling that compliance with his wish is only delayed, he returns to work with redoubled energy, and soon attains the rank which had been made the condition of change. But having by this time overcome the more important difficulties of his trade, and pleased with his success, gratified, too, by the little reward granted in such cases, and with the praise he receives, he becomes the most desirous of all concerned to persevere in the calling from which he has already reaped so many advantages.

Thus we overcome in our lads that love of change which induces men to take up one vocation after another, and often renders them incompetent to succeed in any one ; and it is the more important to do this, because our boys seldom stay more than three years with us, a period absolutely necessary for acquiring any trade.

The Tablet of Honor continued to present very encouraging results.

Out of more than three hundred colons, several of whom had arrived so recently that it was impossible for them to have yet attained the distinction, the names of 133 were there inscribed, and it is further mentioned that during the last three months of 1843, only nine names were erased out of 104—erasure, be it remembered, following immediately on any breach of rules.

Four colons died in 1843.

Among the lads we have lost by death, there was one whose last moments were deeply touching, and produced a great impression on his companions. This was Bassière, aged 16, whose conduct had been irreproachable ever since he came among us. Elected an Elder Brother by his family circle, he discharged the duties of his office with zeal, firmness, and entire self-devotion. There never was a calmer death-bed than his ; his countenance wore a smile, and as his end approached the expression of his features was that of the most perfect serenity ; he spoke of a future life with earnest piety, and telling them of Heaven he besought his brother colons to be obedient and grateful to their masters, who endeavored so sincerely to make them happy. He asked to die in the arms of M. de Courteilles, whom he called his father.

Of the 90 lads who had already quitted the colony, 79 were irreproachable in conduct, and four only had fallen again into the hands of the police ; one of them being the poor lad T——, of whom we heard in a former Report, whose desire to help his mother, induced him to give up a good situation at Tours, and return to his native place where the difficulties and temptations he encountered caused his ruin.

Of the 79 one who had entered a Zouave regiment with two other colons, was their guide and support, and by his good advice preserved them from going astray. Another, named Blay, had been placed as contre-maitre at a small Reformatory School in Bretagne, whence the manager wrote that he was exceedingly pleased with him, and was unable to thank the Directors of Mettray sufficiently for having sent him so excellent an officer.

Another named Boscher had been placed in a situation in la Sologne where he soon acquired his employer's confidence, and became his farm bailiff.

Sent to Paris to fetch a sum of 4,000 francs (£400), Boscher discharged his commission not only faithfully but prudently, for having heard of the temptations which a stay there would afford, he resisted the wish to see something of the metropolis, and remaining only long enough to fulfill his errand, he brought the money safely to his master. Being afterwards trusted to sell some cattle, he made an excellent bargain, and received 300 francs as their price. But Boscher's prudence failed him this time; he allowed himself to be tempted into a tavern by one of the purchasers, and very little accustomed to wine he soon became completely intoxicated. Meantime the village clock had struck ten, and Boscher was not returned; he was anxiously watched for; towards eleven the rumbling of a cart was heard; Boscher was come home, but he was dead drunk.

He was searched but no money appeared, and it was in vain they asked him what had become of it. The next day his master, who was resolved to discharge him, questioned him again, but he could recollect nothing of what had happened. Another servant, however, who had been desired to use the cart which Boscher had taken the day before, found some pieces of money among the straw, where on carefully searching farther, and by an extraordinary and most happy chance, the whole sum was discovered, not a single coin being missing. Great was the delight of the poor lad, to whom, however, his master thought it right to speak very severely. His fault was a source of deep regret to him, and he redoubled his efforts to atone for it. We have since heard that for some time past he has again enjoyed his master's entire confidence, and has never since done anything to forfeit it.

Surprise may be felt that the names of those who have been at the colony and have afterwards done well should be so freely mentioned, and many persons may imagine that the less said of such antecedents the better, if the ex-colon is to succeed in life. Far, however, from the circumstance of his having been at Mettray militating against him, it is absolutely an advantage to him to have it known. Thus,

The Comte d'Ornano, Commandant of the 9th military division, being present when our lads were passing under review, and observing in the ranks a former colon, who then wore the uniform of an hussar, he kindly said to him, "the time you have been at Mettray shall be reckoned in your favor."

It has already been determined among the colons that the first who should be able to set up a shop should put over his door as his sign [which are still much used in France] "The Colon from Mettray," and it was expected, when the Report for 1844 was published, that Hermerel, a very steady lad, who was establishing a small trade as a tailor, would gain this envied distinction. When he had completed his apprenticeship the curate of a village near Mettray, having heard him chant in the chapel there, wished him to settle in his parish, promising to become his patron. So good an offer was not to be rejected, and as there was no tailor in the neighbourhood, and consequently Hermerel could not obtain work as a journeyman, the Directors of the colony hired a little room for him, and advanced a small sum with which to purchase what was absolutely necessary to enable him to take in work on his own account. The youth used to bring his village friends on Sundays to Mettray, and show them all over the colony, explaining its details with expressions of the most intense pleasure and gratitude.

The colony was deprived this year by death of its munificent benefactor Count Leon d'Ourches, and the Société Paternelle caused his bust in bronze to be placed in the Institution in a position where the lads could see it.

In the next Report (dated June, 1845), we find the first mention of a former colon receiving a ring in virtue of which he becomes one of a little Society, formed in 1842, of which all the officers of the Institution from the Directors downwards are members. The ring (we have seen one), is of silver, and is inscribed with appropriate emblems and mottoes. It is presented to every youth who desires to receive it, two years after his departure from the colony, provided his conduct has been irreproachable, and is accompanied by a certificate of membership, which the owner often has framed and glazed and hung up as the chief ornament of his little dwelling. The object and effect of the society is to unite in a friendly bond those formerly colons who are living in respectability, and to cement the tie which yet connects them with the colony.

The colons who have settled at a distance from Mettray gladly correspond with us and with their former companions, to whom they frequently send excellent advice. This brotherly counsel coming from those already gone out into the world, verifies and adds force to our warnings to those who remain behind. "Listen to what the Directors say," wrote one of them, "you hear the truth at the Colony; but you only understand what you have lost, when you have left, and then you find how hard it is to gain your living."

We punctually answer all the letters we receive from our former colons, so that every addition to our number, imposes on us a double task. In the first place, we have to subdue and reclaim them when newly arrived, and secondly, to maintain a constant intercourse with them after they have departed. This latter duty continually increases, for it is not simple supervision that we exercise, but rather the unceasing watchfulness of a parent over his adopted child. Fortunately all our colons do not go to a distance; the greater number remain in our vicinity, and live as we may say under our eye, and within sight of the steeple of the little settlement, which has become a home to them. * * It is a source of pride to us to meet on every road round about Mettray, carts driven by lads who have been with us, whose good conduct affords a powerful stimulus to their former comrades. Many habitually spend their Sundays at the colony, where they mix with their school-fellows, join them in their occupations, eat at the same table and kneel before the same altar, the only difference between them is in their dress. * * Every meeting tends to mutual encouragement, and the good example which each affords to the other, seems to impose by tacit consent an obligation to conduct themselves well. Some of our lads are already earning 200 francs (£8) a-year, as farm servants [in addition of course to board and lodging,] and the advantages which these enjoy create a little useful emulation among the rest.

Mettray, containing as it does lads from fifty-two departments, offers many points of interest to the psychologist. During five years of experience and observation we have become convinced of the strong influence which his birthplace exercises on man, and how completely he is a type of its characteristics. The Breton is obstinate, persevering, religious and devout; he is best suited for field labor. The Norman and Alsacian are peculiarly adapted to take care of animals. We have received eighty-four Parisians at the Colony, in whom we have observed an absence of premeditated wrong-doing, and an abundance of intelligence and vivacity, accompanied, however, by a want of discipline and an amount of levity, which yielded only to the firmest rule and severest means of correction; by addressing ourselves, however, to their understanding, we have never failed to produce an impression, and have in the end subdued them, by attaching them to us. One of them said to his chef de famille, "I could very well get away from the Colony, nothing would be easier, and I have often wished to try, but thinking of the confidence our Directors put in us I could never find it in my heart to do it."

It was found necessary this year to sow a much greater breadth of land than before with corn, and it was accordingly determined to rent an additional tract. At the same time M. Augustin was engaged as Agricultural Superintendent, of whose skilful management and its important results we shall hear shortly.

Sheds, store-rooms, granary, carthouses, a building for storing agricultural implements and one for flour, stables, a dairy, a kitchen for the use of the carters, and for cooking food for the live stock, had been added to the Colony during the past year, while in the course of the next it was hoped that various other farm buildings, including sheep-pens and cow-houses, would be completed.

As had happened on former occasions, a member of the government honored the Annual Meeting of the Société Paternelle (held in May, 1846) with his presence.

It was M. de Salvandy, Minister of Public Instruction, who presided this year. He delivered an eloquent address in which, after describing the position and duties of an ordinary teacher, he proceeded to speak of Mettray;

You, Gentlemen, have set yourselves a more difficult and even a nobler task; you take under your care the corrupted child, who has plunged into vice, and from vice into crime, whose mental and moral being alike must be reformed; whose misled and depraved soul would become more and more deeply steeped in iniquity if you did not intervene to save him from himself, and to save society from his precocious wickedness.

This task you have undertaken—and more than undertaken, you have succeeded in it. You have proved that virtue is inherent in the human breast; that the good seed planted there by the hand of God, may always be found by man if only he truly endeavor to seek and to foster it; that there is no insurmountable barrier in the path from crime to virtue; that the fallen being whose evil course saddens the beholder, and terrifies society, is our fellow creature still, that we may yet discover in him the man whom God has made, and who is capable of loving and serving Him.

Thus Mettray has a character of its own, distinct among all the undertakings of public benevolence, among all the valuable institutions which are one of the glories of our age; for, Gentlemen, this age though we sometimes greatly depreciate it, is not only rendered great by all its creations of art, by all its marvels of industry, which force back the limits put to man's powers, which in every sense enlarge our universe, and double the time that hitherto Providence had allotted us; it will be prized in time to come, for the spirit of devotion in man to man, for the endeavor to ameliorate the lot of those who are themselves unequal to the task, by them whom Providence has placed in happier circumstances; finally, for all these institutions both beneficent and useful which meet our eyes on every side.

Unconsciously, Gentlemen, I have related your own history, I have traced out the course taken by the Société Paternelle, indicating the good it has effected, and what has been accomplished by the admirable institution at Mettray.

What spectacle could be more striking than that afforded by the distinguished men who surround me laboring together in this good work—men who have grown old in the great affairs of France, and who now devote the experience gained at the head of the State to an agricultural penitentiary which seeks unobtrusively to reform criminals.

But, in descending to undertake that charge, they are far from lowering themselves; on the contrary, they are raised in the estimation of others, and in their own, for they have undertaken a task at once the noblest and the most difficult—to restore children to society, citizens to the State, souls to God.

By whom was Mettray founded? By that magistrate who, after having from the seat of justice visited the culprit with chastisement, sought him and never quitted him till purified by repentance. By whom besides? By that distinguished man, by that soldier, illustrious as are all who bear his name, who having by choice spent his life in profound seclusion, has now surrounded it, involuntarily, and without seeking to do so, with a brilliant halo; in performing a good and holy work he sought, by a path which he believed to be unseen and unknown, the satisfaction of his own conscience, but he found glory, the purest of all glory, that which crowns the benefactor of mankind.

Let me indulge a personal reminiscence. The founder of Mettray and I were schoolfellows. We met again beneath our country's flag. Since then thirty years have passed away—what years they have been you well know. During these thirty years we have never met; our paths in life have been different in all respects, and we remained wholly unknown to each other; his course was voluntarily a hidden one, mine was involuntarily patent and stirring; and here by chance to-day, if such things can be said to happen by chance, we have unexpectedly met to promote the interests of Mettray which we shall each have aided, he by the devotion of his life, I simply by appearing amongst you for a moment. For even thus I do aid it, but because it is not I merely who am here—it is the State, it is popular power, it is royal authority, which, alike beneficent and watchful, I have the honor to represent before you, and in whose name I express sympathy and respect towards the good work in which you are engaged.

Just before leaving the meeting he again addressed it in the following terms:—

I am astonished to find that the Minister of Public Instruction, who must be deeply interested in the moral results obtained at Mettray, should contribute less than any other department of Government to this undertaking. I now raise the aid afforded annually by the office of Public Instruction to the amount granted by the Ministers of Agriculture and of Commerce, namely, 12,000 francs (£480), or 7,000 francs more, yearly, to spend on your noble enterprise.

I beg pardon for thus disarranging the accounts of your able financier, M. Gouin, who, after being Chancellor of the Exchequer for France, has undertaken the same honorable post at Mettray, devoting himself to it with unwearied zeal.

The more extended agricultural operations entered into the preceding year are described by M. de Gasparin in a speech which, as relating to a development of one branch of the economy of the Institution so important in its results that it may claim to be regarded as the commencement of a new era in the history of the Colony, we feel ourselves justified in quoting at length.

In calling the Institution which it had founded at Mettray an agricultural colony, the Société Paternelle incurred a very serious obligation towards the public. It found it no easy task to organize a large school of agriculture from the elements there collected. What was its staff? Some very young, feeble, and sickly children, who had been entrusted to it for far too short a time. What was its field of operations? It had only 12 hectares [30 acres] of land, including that upon which the buildings stood. What was its agricultural capital? Its resources were barely sufficient for its wants, and all extraordinary receipts had been already employed, or were tied up for years to come, in order to erect the buildings necessary to the undertaking. It was in this state of things that the Society, feeling how much its future welfare depended on the fulfilment of its obligations, and how important it was to hasten the full performance of its promises, undertook to bestow upon the country a real farm school.

Thus was realized the title it had assumed—thus will the children committed to its care be put in a respectable position in life, one favorable to their health and to their morals, one which will withdraw them from the temptations of our large towns, which will save them from relapsing into crime, and will ensure them constant employment.

To put this plan in execution the Society took upon a long lease a tract of about 203 hectares [500 acres] of tolerably good land at a rent of 11,560 francs [£466 : 8]. This land bordered the colony on one side, and there were standing upon it two farm buildings, in which two families of colons were placed, who are thus located at the extreme end of our territory.

This step happily accomplished, there remained another and far more difficult one to be taken,—that of finding a skilful agricultural superintendent who should save us from those mistakes which inexperience can never avoid, whatever be the enterprise embarked in.

We fixed upon M. Augustin, who was already known by his success in other similar undertakings, and who has justified our most sanguine expectations. He has evinced in the course of this year a perfect knowledge of his profession, the power of seeing at a glance what is right to be done, and an amount of resolution without which all other qualities are useless.

The shoal upon which agricultural undertakings are most often wrecked is the insufficiency of capital expended in cultivation; much more is thought of acquiring a vast extent of land than of retaining the funds which will be necessary to make it fruitful. We took care not to fall into this error, and knew well the large sum which we must have at our command if we would not drag on for many years in an inferior position, which would have compromised the institution, and thrown discredit upon agricultural pursuits in the eyes of our lads and of our neighbours who were very attentively watching for the result of our scheme with no lack of unfavorable predictions respecting it.

Our calculations, founded on circumstances analogous to our own, proved that we should need an amount of capital, in cattle, revenue, or else in labor, equivalent to 180 francs (£7 4s. 0) per hectare or about 36,000 francs (£1440) and the same value in labor and manure, besides implements with which fortunately we were already tolerably well supplied. A sum, however, of 60,000 francs (£2,400) we needed to have at our disposal immediately in order to begin our agricultural operations.

This amount we obtained, thanks to the credit granted us by our excellent colleague, M. Gouin. One half is secured upon our live stock the value of which has increased and continues to increase daily; the other, namely, the cost of cultivation, is provided for by the harvest we have gathered. The appearance of the crops in the month of April, when M. Augustin entered upon his duties, was far from promising any such result; on the contrary, indeed it seemed then as though it would scarcely repay the expenses of cultivation.

His knowledge and resolution, however, soon altered this state of things. Perceiving the deplorable condition of the seed corn he forthwith purchased some stable manure in Tours with which he covered it, proceeding at the same time to sow clover upon the wheat. Its condition changed rapidly, and it yielded a magnificent harvest amounting in value to more than 40,000 francs (£1,600). Meanwhile all the fallow ground had been prepared and sown with various crops, potatoes, beet root, carrots and rutabagas, which enabled us to feed 78 cows from this land which hitherto had been unproductive. In the ordinary course of affairs, with a less skilful superintendent, this improvement would have been delayed a year at least.

We might give you details of the agricultural results obtained at Mettray this year, but we have thought it better to reserve them till next season, when our position disembarrassed from the peculiar circumstances incident to the first year of such an enterprise, may be clearly and simply set forth in such a manner as to justify the highest expectations from the ability of our overseer, and the zealous care of those in authority. But the result already gained is somewhat remarkable. To have got such crops from the very first year, after paying rent, repairing the mistakes of the former tenant, and bringing the land into excellent condition,—to close our accounts with a clear profit, and from badly sown impoverished land, coming into it when the young corn was in a deplorable state, to have obtained a harvest worth, at a rough calculation, 67,000 francs, from land paying 11,560 francs rent, is, I venture to say, a feat of which it would be difficult to find another example.

An early passage in the Report for 1849 demonstrates the firm root the Institution had taken. It was no longer an experiment—it was a success.

At our early meetings, when the colony was still in its cradle, and was yet scarcely understood, when its object was hardly comprehended by the public, and the expediency of our course might appear doubtful, it was the duty of the Directors to enter into full details, and to answer objections raised by persons of weight and reflection ; it was their duty to overcome the injurious prejudice of those who recognized our lads only as culprits condemned by the law, whose reformation appeared chimerical ; thank God success has crowned our efforts, your labour is appreciated, and it is now well known that youths at Mettray come there to receive moral training, and not to undergo punishment.

Your example has not been barren ; generous hearts have been filled with a noble emulation, and numerous colonies the offspring of yours, have been founded in several departments ; we may unhesitatingly affirm that your cause is now established, and that agricultural colonies have taken their place among the charitable institutions of our country.

It is with lively satisfaction that we assure you of the continued and increasing prosperity of Mettray.

We began with ten boys, our roof now shelters four hundred and twelve ; notwithstanding this important increase in the number of our colons, order and regularity have been maintained, and the discipline is unrelaxed. To obtain such results we have had to redouble our care and vigilance ; but we have been admirably seconded by our officers, to whose worth we rejoice to have this opportunity of bearing public testimony.

Our system of discipline is maintained by severe penalties and by rewards which we endeavour to render valuable in the eyes of our lads.

In the course of the present year, we have had recourse to a mode of correction which we trust will be approved by you. Certain cases have arisen in which it appeared to us domestic correction would be insufficient ; we desired that our wards should become early aware of the severity they might encounter in that world which they must enter on leaving us, and thus imbibe a salutary dread of its just punishments. Thus, a theft having been committed by one of the colons, we thought it best upon the above considerations, not to employ our ordinary means of correction ; we informed a magistrate of the circumstance, and a policeman was sent who arrested the culprit in the midst of his comrades, just as would have been the case with a dishonest laborer at work on a farm. The accused was forthwith tried in the Court of Justice at Tours, and his sentence was read aloud to his assembled companions.

This display of public authority, and the natural operation of the law produced a deep impression, and by means of intimidation has had an excellent effect. But we are desirous to add that side by side with this inexorable severity, without which obedience could not be enforced among a youthful and restless population such as ours, we neglect no opportunity for encouraging those who respond to our efforts to benefit them, never forgetting that to punish effectively we must also reward at the right time.

After analyzing the conduct of the youths who had already left the colony, of whom the number of relapses was in 1846 only between six and seven per cent, the Report continues:—

This proportion certainly need not discourage us, and yet we can confidently affirm that it would be far less if the lads remained longer at Mettray; often the period of liberation arrives after a stay of only two or three years, and sometimes we have been obliged to discharge children of scarcely twelve years of age. In this there is a double evil which we would point out to the attention of magistrates; time has not been allowed to complete our course of training, and the lads are too young to resist the bad examples and pernicious influences to which they are about to be exposed, often even in the bosom of their own families.

On Christmas Day, as our lads were coming away from evening service, a man out of breath rushed among us crying, "They have set fire to Gaudières"! (one of the outlying farms of our institution.) In seven minutes the engines and our lads were ready to start, and all hastened to the scene of the misfortune under the guidance of M. Hubert, a gentleman who gave up an appointment in the Fire Brigade at Paris in order to come to Mettray. Thanks to his admirable direction the efforts of the young firemen and of all who had assembled to give their help, were crowned with speedy success; in two hours the fire was extinguished without causing more injury than the loss of three thousand trusses of straw; the buildings and their contents being moreover insured.

We have a pleasant duty to discharge in recording the praiseworthy conduct of M. Hubert, who had already on another occasion saved at the peril of his own life those of two workmen who had fallen down insensible at the bottom of a well which we were having cleaned. Such actions do not seek the reward of praise, but we deemed that in telling you of our lads, we ought also to say a few words respecting the right-hearted and devoted men who second us so well in the difficult task we have undertaken, and who understand how thus to enforce their lessons with the irresistible power of example.

The fire of the 25th December appears not to be attributable to ill-will. From the evidence elicited by the judicial inquest it seems that it was kindled by a little girl whom epilepsy had reduced to a state of idiocy. She has been arrested, and it is for the judge to decide whether she acted knowingly (avec discernement.)

This occurrence has obliged us to take increased means of precaution.

Until it happened, one person only remained during the night in charge of the outlying farms, the boys going thither in the morning and returning in the evening; we have since decided that henceforth forty boys shall remain there always, living and sleeping at the separate farms. This, which is now simply a prudential measure, may eventually lead to the happiest consequences as regards the multiplication of agricultural colonies in France.

In the outlying farms which are members of Mettray, our system is seen on a limited scale, which easily admits of imitation, and visitors may be convinced by their own eyes that an Agricultural Colony can exist with a very small number of colons, and yet confer immense benefit upon agriculture.

The time devoted to intellectual instruction had been lessened to ten hours per week, and was afterwards further reduced to eight.

Side by side with religious teaching and elementary instruction we place industrial education. We desire that on leaving Mettray our lads should be able, without undergoing the laborious life of an apprentice, under often a very harsh master, to support themselves, and to earn what are usually considered good wages. Two thirds of the colons are employed in agriculture, the rest are occupied in our workshops, in trades connected with agriculture, or which are required to supply the Colony.

M. Augustin, the director of our agricultural department, gives lectures on agriculture, and then setting his class to work on the land, he is able to simplify the difficulties of theory by reducing them to practice. M. Jules Petelard, formerly head Veterinary Surgeon in the 8th Regiment of Hussars, and Member of the Indre-et-Loire Agricultural Society, gives another course of lectures on the constitutions and treatment of domestic animals; these important lessons are listened to by our children with a fixed attention very unusual at their age, proving how true it is that if they are to love their labor, it must interest their understandings.

Our lads are occupied as follows :—

Agricultural laborers	...	...	...	276
Gardeners	...	...	...	31
Wheelwrights	...	...	...	18
Blacksmiths	...	...	...	12
Farriers	...	...	...	10
Makers of Wooden Shoes	...	...	...	14
Carpenters	...	...	...	12
Tailors	...	...	...	18
Shoemakers	...	...	...	12
Masons	...	...	...	6
Sailmakers	...	...	...	3

---

412

Perhaps we should offer some explanation regarding the above table. Why, it may be asked, have sailmakers in an Agricultural Institution? We offer one word, on this point. All our colons sleep in hammocks, and we require workpeople among us, who can provide and repair this sort of bedding. Further, it must not be forgotten, that we have at Mettray a large number of lads from the coast of Bretagne, who have already made coasting voyages, and are irresistibly attracted by a sea-faring life. One of our Masters, who was formerly the mate of a vessel, teaches them the manœuvres of a ship* and gives them useful instruction in a sailor's vocation, which seems to be by nature theirs.

The number of lads who had now been placed out in the world amounted to 197, of whom twelve only had relapsed into crime. Of the remainder the conduct of 173 was irreproachable; perhaps the following particulars respecting some of them may not be found uninteresting:—

Among those who have profited by our efforts in their behalf, we cannot resist the pleasure of mentioning G—, who after being one of our best colons, is now serving in the 8th Regiment of Hussars. He is a good soldier, and has won the approbation of his superior officers. His comrades, far from reproaching him with having been at our Institution, call him among themselves, and as a term of endearment, "Little Mettray."

Thus, in the army the name of the Colony, has in some degree become his; let us hope that Mettray will have brought happiness to him, and that he will do honor to Mettray.

We will also recall M—, to your kindly remembrance. M. Marion, Vice-President of the tribunal at Nantes, who has undertaken the patronage of this lad, writes us that M— makes the best use of his wages, and devotes a portion to the relief of his father, although the latter has not always recognized the duties which this relationship imposed. "This feeling of filial piety, (adds M. Marion,) which shows itself, notwithstanding the faults of the parent, is too generous, and too rare among us, to pass unnoticed."

You will not learn without interest that six of the colons from Mettray have married. One of these young heads of a family called B—, now a farmer near Loudun, came with his wife to see us, and their visit produced a very marked and touching effect upon his former companions. C—is married at Nantes; he lives near his mother and is her comfort and support. M. Marion wrote again to us lately, and speaking of C—says, "this little household is admirably conducted."

This year, as in former ones, the Conseils Generaux, the Cours Royales, and various corporate bodies, indeed all who had before given aid to Mettray, have continued their support.

We desire particularly to acknowledge the generous assistance accorded to us by M. Delalleau, Rector of the Academy at Poitiers. This distinguished man is well aware of the touching and purifying nature of assistance rendered by the young whom fate has gifted with wealth and happiness, to the wretched of their own age; he believes that to inculcate charity among the youth in our schools is a holy and salutary lesson—not that charity whose efforts are limited to alleviating individual suffering, but rather that enlightened and foreseeing charity which, like Providence, considers the future as well as the present, and which turns every opportunity of diminishing misery into a means both of relieving those immediately afflicted and of securing the well-being of society in time to come. M. Delalleau did not overestimate the kindly feeling of the different masters in the college when he besought their zealous co-operation, and the pupils, responding to the appeal of their Preceptors, sent to Mettray the money which had been given them to spend as they pleased. A similar example had been already afforded by the schools of Medicine and of Law at Poitiers, the Colleges at Amiens, Limoges, Orleans, Poitiers, Pont-Levoy, and Tours ; by the Ecole Neopédique at Paris, conducted by M. Louis Leclerc, and by the Loubens Institute. Besides these the municipal college of Bollin has lately enrolled itself among our founders. The Director of the latter college considered it his duty to pay a visit to Mettray in the course of his vacation. His approbation of our system of instruction, and his expression of sympathy, when fully acquainted with our labors, are deeply gratifying, and we gladly take this opportunity of assuring him of our lively sense of his kindness.

---

* In the principal court of Mettray are fixed the bulwarks, masts, tackle, &c., of a large ship, the gift of the Minister of Marine, upon which the boys, who are likely to become sailors, are exercised in nautical duties.

The above information gives valuable proof of the increasing interest in Mettray which, as we have gathered from former Reports, was gradually spreading among all classes of society in France, “Gentlemen,” said M. Hebert, Minister of Justice and of Worship, in the course of a most eloquent address delivered at the eighth annual meeting of the Société Paternelle, “you have recognized the fact that the same labor which renders the earth fruitful, purifies and strengthens the human heart. Our country’s soil inspires a love for it in those who cultivate as much as in those who defend it; and in the midst of the fertile plains of Touraine, in that model farm which has arisen and now prospers under the hands of the reclaimed outcast, your young laborers do not learn only how to drive the plough, they learn how in becoming more useful, to become also more worthy members of society.”

The sympathy and approbation of one high in power could never have been more acceptable, judging by the opening passage of the Report by the Directors :—

Since the foundation of the Colony, we have never yet passed so difficult a year as that which has just elapsed, and never have we had greater need of your counsel, your confidence, and your support.

Our internal management has encountered many difficulties, our financial estimates have been unavoidably exceeded, our Institution has been threatened from without; nevertheless, we have passed through this anxious period better than could have been hoped, and that Mettray should have remained unshaken is proof that it is based on solid foundations.

The department of Indre-et-Loire, has, as you are aware, been the scene of disturbances, and the Colony ran some risk owing to the excitement which had seized upon the inhabitants of the villages round about Tours, from which we are not far distant. Hunger, caused by the dearth of bread, and evil passions roused with sinister design, incited men, who are ordinarily among the most peaceful, to riot and pillage. The agitators had cast their eyes on the Colony, and had laid a plan to entrap our officers, whose uniform they would have rejoiced to see among them; numerous and threatening mobs, came to our very door, but they never crossed our threshold.

We will not detain you longer by detailing events which happily are now past; but we must not omit to inform you that in the midst of the excitement which encompassed us, and of the sounds and threats which reached our ears, our youths justified our good opinion and deserved our confidence, by the calm attitude they preserved, by redoubled order and diligence, and by proofs of devotion and subordination which contrasted forcibly with the disorder without, and demonstrated, in the most striking manner, the inestimable value of judicious training and firm discipline.

We have yet further evidence to offer to you. Fire, which during the last two years has done great damage in this district, at last attacked the Church of the village of Mettray; as it was, it suffered to the amount of 10,000 francs, (£400,) not a stone however would have been left, but for the two fire engines from the Colony, and the united aid of our colons and the neighbours.

Our young firemen, under the direction of their chief M. Hubert, gave on this occasion ample proof of their zeal and courage.

The Directors record that many distinguished fellow-countrymen came in the course of this year to inspect the Colony, which was also attracting much attention abroad; Mr. Gladstone visited it at that period, and gave convincing proof on his return to England of his high appreciation of its excellence, by aiding with his time and fortune in the establishment of the Philanthropic Farm School at Red-hill, which more nearly resembles Mettray than any other reformatory institution in England. The Report also states that Lord Brougham has discussed this year in the House of Lords, with all his extraordinary eloquence, the juvenile delinquent question, which he regards as one of the gravest his country has to deal with.

"To show the effects of these experiments [in reformatory treatment] he would take the French institution at Mettray as affording more details. * * * Besides this one there had been twelve others of a similar character established in France, which were founded in consequence of the great success that attended the original institution. He avowed that, if he were animated with feelings of rivalry towards France, if he were animated by those national feelings of rivalry which pervaded the bosoms of Englishmen—those national feelings would lead him more to envy the French people for the erection and usefulness of such institutions than for any glory they might have derived from their Algerian colonies, from their Spanish marriages, or even for all that redounded to the glory of Napoleon. He envied them for what they had, and which this country wanted—those noble and useful institutions.

Let us rather rival their noble and generous nature by imitating them in the erection of twelve establishments similar to Mettray, and thus taking the first step towards the amendment of our criminal law, which would be the first real attempt that had ever been made since we had a criminal law.”*

Referring to the evils of short imprisonments the Report continues—

In a word, every youthful offender who is thus thrown prematurely upon the world, finds himself under precisely the same conditions which caused his fall, and which can scarcely fail to plunge him again into beggary and crime. We have omitted no opportunity during the past eight years of pointing out this miserable and injurious operation of the penal code, and of urging the Minister of Justice, and the members of both Chambers, to introduce an amendment more in accordance with the spirit of this article; it should be framed to provide for the education in an appropriate institution until they have attained their twentieth year, of all children committed under the age of 16, and detained by virtue of article 66.

Another subject which we find dwelt on again and again, and to which, as we have already had occasion to see, the Directors attribute a large share of the success they have attained, is the elaborate and efficient system of patronage by which they exercise a kindly surveillance over all the youths who leave the Colony. As it would be impossible for the Directors of Mettray to perform this duty personally, they obtain the assistance of benevolently-disposed individuals (of whom an abundance are always to be found), residing in the various neighbourhoods where the colons are placed in service. These persons are denominated patrons, and as the duties of their office are at present but imperfectly understood in this kingdom, and as we are convinced that a system similar to that which is so efficient in France, is equally essential here to the successful operation of reformatory schools, we shall venture to give a passage, though of considerable length, which will explain the course pursued by our neighbours:—

---

[* From Lord Brougham's Speech in the House of Lords on the 18th Feb., 1847, on presenting a petition from the magistrates of Liverpool for the amendment of the Criminal Law.—Hansard, Vol. 90, pp. 197-9.]

We have already placed out 286 youths (89 during the year 1846) each under the care of a good patron, provided with a small sum of money the fruit of his industry, with a suitable wardrobe, and having a trade in his hands in which we aid him to find employment; thus a lad when he leaves Mettray begins a new life; he has been saved from himself, to use the words of M. Agénor de Gasparin.

He is as much sought after by the farmers and the various employers of labor round about us, as the convict coming direct from prison is avoided and driven away from every workshop where he may offer himself.

The reformation of the neglected child and his good conduct after he has left us, being the object which the founders of Mettray had in view, permit us, Gentlemen, to give you some details on those points, by reading extracts from our correspondence with the patrons of our lads.

M. Lefebvre, commissioner of police at Beaumont-Sur-Oise, writes us:—

"I am exceedingly pleased to inform you that the time passed by G——, at the Colony at Mettray has been most beneficial to him, and I consider him now as a pattern to lads of his age; I shall do my utmost to keep him in the situation where you placed him."

The Mayor of Beurley writes, "my surprise at the change I found in Augusté D——, has been very great; he has become civil, attentive, and modest; indeed I did not recognize him until his name was mentioned."

M. Marion, Vice-President of the Tribunal Civil at Nantes, who for a long time past has kindly undertaken the patronage of all our lads there, says, "I can speak only in terms of praise of the Mettray lads who since their liberation have resided in this town; not one of them has relapsed into crime.

"I was a little uneasy about the two T——s, in consequence of the masons here having struck, but they had no inclination to join their riotous meetings.

"I beg to draw your kind attention to C——, and his family; his conduct deserves your sympathy. Under the above mentioned circumstances he has displayed honesty of purpose, right feeling, and courage which are above praise. He would be glad to have a view of Mettray &c., &c."

I should gladly quote the whole of M. Marion's letter which is full of touching details, but it is too long for the limits of our report.

M. Daguin, Secretary General to the Prefecture of the Jura, informs us that B——, by working hard, is able to wholly support his aged grandmother, and that his conduct is excellent.

To conclude our quotations, and satisfy you of the trustworthiness of the information we lay before you respecting the youths whom we have placed out, permit us to read to you at length the form which our kind correspondents are good enough to fill up. They are the chief magistrates and different authorities, and persons occupying the most respectable positions in the various localities, who generously take upon themselves this charge. This form was filled up by M. de la Pierre, a manufacturer, who wrote to us from Clamecy on February 1st, 1847.

"Sir,—Being always desirous of complying with your wishes, I hasten to forward to you the statement of the conduct of J. V—, one of the numerous individuals rescued by your institution which takes them from our prison, and returns them to society corrected of all their faults.

"I am glad to have nothing but what is favorable to tell you of this young man. He fulfills every religious and social duty ; he always regrets living so far from the Colony, and being thus deprived of the pleasure of seeing his benefactors there.

"I have the honor to be, &c., &c."

This letter was accompanied by the following form :—

AGRICULTURAL COLONY AT METTRAY.

CHRISTIAN AND SURNAME OF THE COLON.	NAME AND RESIDENCE OF THE PATRON.
J. V.	M. de la Pierre, manufacturer at Clamecy.

QUESTIONS TO THE PATRON.

Does he perform his religious duties ?

Does he repeat his prayers morning and evening ?

Does he go to church ?

Is he diligent ?

Does he show intelligence ?

Is he obedient ?

Is he civil ?

Is he careful of his personal appearance ?

Is he economical ?

What different occupations has he been employed in ?

ANSWERS BY THE PATRON.

Invariably.

Regularly.

Regularly.

Yes.

Rather goodwill than intelligence.

Nothing to find fault with on this head.

Always.

No.

Yes.

Until now he has been employed only in field labor ; but his father, notwithstanding ill health, being obliged to work at his trade as a carpenter in order to support his five children, now employs him to work with him, he being himself very weak.

Does he occupy himself sometimes in reading and writing?	Yes.
What books does he read?	Religious, moral, and instructive works.
Does he attend an adult school?	He has neither time nor opportunity.
What are his leading tastes?	None that are evil.
What are his most striking characteristics?	Goodness of heart, obedience, gentleness, and civility.
Does he hear from his family?	He is now living with them.
How does he spend Sundays and fête days?	At church, in walking, or with his father.
Has he any friends or connexions?	None.
What character do the persons bear with whom he associates?	He associates only with his father, who is poor, but honest.
What are his wishes for the future?	To learn to work so as to help his father.
Does he think of the Colony?	Constantly.
Does he acknowledge the benefit he received there?	Yes.
In what manner does he speak of it?	With the warmest gratitude.
Has he been ill?	No.
What is the behaviour and character of the people for whom he works?	Before working with his father he was with very excellent people who employed him in field labor.
Do they perform their religious duties?	Yes.

Particulars of his conduct whether good or bad.

In consequence of a long and painful illness, his father had fallen into extreme destitution, which still continues. Accustomed to the use of tobacco, he had been obliged to forego it, his utmost means being needed to obtain food for his family, when on the 1st January this lad having received a few sous as a new year's gift, hastened with them to his father, who, however, refused to accept them. Your former pupil went then himself to exchange his sous for some tobacco, which he brought to his father. The latter wept while relating, only yesterday, this kind act of his son.

The minute information thus obtained respecting every colon (not one of the 286 who were now placed out had been lost sight of), enables us to accept with perfect confidence the statistics relating to the numbers reformed, as it also goes far to account for those numbers being so large. With respect, however, to the relapses, it must be recollected that they do not, of course, include the boys who are sent back to prison. Of these we hear as follows :—

In 1846, the number of lads sent back to prison from the Colony since its foundation, amounted to 34, including five during that year.

While acknowledging our failure in dealing with the deeply rooted depravity of those youths, and, moreover, the necessity we were under of inflicting upon them a punishment which should deter their companions from following their evil example, we have never lost sight of, or compassion for, those unhappy individuals; 16 of them are dead,—the first actually died of remorse. He belonged to a noble family in Bretagne, whom poverty had reduced to the necessity of cultivating with their own hands their few remaining acres. "Remember," wrote one of his relatives to him, "your aged father sank his head upon his breast the day you brought disgrace upon us by appearing as a felon at the bar, and has never raised it since." A monomania for theft was this lad's ruin, and pursued him at Mettray, where he found means of stealing even in his cell.

As regards the others we have been gratified to learn, and often by correspondence with themselves, that their conduct in prison was generally better than that of their companions; many of them write to us expressing their contrition, and come to see us on their liberation. Some grains of the good seed took root even by the wayside, and bore fruit though tardily. Many of those lads have behaved well since their discharge from prison.

In the course of this year the Colony sustained two sad losses from its staff of assistants, the first that had occurred since its foundation, in the death of one of the estimable sisters of charity, and of a sous chef—a youth of great promise.

Almost all the farm buildings, which we heard of in the preceding Report as in progress or contemplated, were now completed, and a mill had been erected and was already at work.

Between the publication of the Reports for 1847 and 1848, the political aspect of France had entirely changed. The Orleans family, which had always shown favor to Mettray, and most of whose members are inscribed as founders of the Institution, had utterly vanished from the country, and it remained to be seen how far their successors in power would be willing and able to aid the good work.

Meanwhile, despite the shock which made itself felt from one end of France to the other, we learn that the position of the Colony was tranquil and secure.

While keeping our wards, as it was our duty to do, free of all political influence, it is nevertheless right you should know they have not remained in ignorance of the important changes which have occurred, and that they are deeply interested by them. The eager curiosity of such restless and intelligent lads has never failed to follow closely the course of events, when indeed it has not been in advance of them.

We had no other means of preserving order among our colons, than by informing them calmly, but unreservedly, of what was taking place in Paris. Besides, many of them would certainly have learnt it from their relatives. The interest with which they received our communications proves, in the most convincing manner, how fully we have succeeded in kindling in their breasts a feeling of honor, together with a genuine love of their country, and of home. The Colony has become a home to them; they have attached themselves to us, as a son is attached to his father, and confidence in us and a sense of duty have kept them around us.

After relating to them the news, we always concluded by an appeal to their sense of gratitude, and by assuring them that under a republican Government, the performance of our duties, readiness to work, and obedience to the law, should be the rule for all; that it was especially under such a government that each could and ought to stand alone, supported by his own ability and his own merit; that we should be the first to set this example to all, we who in founding our Institution had taken for our motto, "Let good workmen trust in the future", (aux bons travailleurs, l'avenir)! "If order, and respect for all that deserves respect, be banished from the rest of France," we said to them "let it be on this spot of ground in an obscure village, that a wholesome example of them shall be afforded by a Colony of lads, of whom all the world despaired." We can assure you, gentlemen, these words were heard and appreciated; we are convinced of this by the fact that not only has the strict and systematic order of our customary discipline not been disturbed, but on the contrary, the number of infractions has sensibly decreased since the Revolution of February.

This was indeed remarkable at a time when almost every public school, and even some private ones, were in revolt, and proving their national origin by throwing up barricades.

But though so far as it depended on the officers and the colons, the prosperity of Mettray was undisturbed by external agitation, it could not wholly escape being affected by the convulsion of February.

The distribution of our young laborers among the different workshops has undergone, since February, a most untoward change.

In consequence of a decree by the Provisional Government suppressing labor in prisons and in charitable institutions, we have been obliged almost entirely to close the workshops of our smiths, wheelwrights, sabot makers, joiners, and rope makers, in other words those which were most profitable.

We still manufacture the articles we require for our own use, but external sale is strictly forbidden. This measure has had three injurious results.

1. It has obliged us to discontinue employing as apprentices lads who had worked in that position a considerable time, an obligation equally disadvantageous to them and to us, for their labor had begun to be profitable to us, and on their side would have insured them good places when liberated.

The change too of occupation, and the being obliged to give up so suddenly and with so little reason a trade they were fond of, inspired as may easily be supposed, discontent among even our best lads, and made them all the more indisposed to field labor.

2. Our workshops had been much enlarged and we had fitted them up on a liberal scale; we had engaged excellent teachers whom we were obliged suddenly to dismiss; we had received large orders, in fact the ruinous prohibition against work has deprived us this year of 25,000 francs (£1,000) clear profit.

3. These losses are the more unfortunate for us that it will be difficult to replace them or provide better for the future.

At the time when every evil passion of the working classes was inflamed, and they were led astray by those who excited in them hatred and even vengeance towards any who seemed to be competitors, all our neighbours looked with fear upon us. Local ill-will however had no just foundation, for we had never sold our goods at less than the current price, on the contrary we had from the first, invited the neighbouring tradesmen to share the advantage of our manufactures by offering to consign to them wholesale, every description of article that they could sell retail, by which they would have gained twice as much profit as by their own goods, which not being so well made nor so cheap, were not so much liked as ours.

Their mistaken opinions made our neighbours forget the good conferred upon the country for the last ten years by an institution which has spent more than a hundred thousand francs on the soil.

* * * *

The government has recognized the difficulty of our position, and has granted its benevolent aid to the colony—We continue to receive the same daily allowance, and the subventions accorded by former administrations.

Among the combatants in the streets of Paris, which included persons of all ranks and all opinions, Mettray was not unrepresented, but it was on the side of order that her children fought.

Permit us to return for a moment to the conduct of those of our lads who are now members of the Garde nationale mobile. They performed a gallant part in the lamentable days of June, but we should in particular mention Louis François Richard, who was born at Paris. He came to Mettray in 1843, and left the Colony in 1845. His conduct while there was invariably good, and his name appears on the tablet of honor. After his liberation he maintained himself honestly by his labor.

Having enlisted in the 8th Battalion of the Garde mobile when it was first organised, he distinguished himself even in that gallant band. He took part in the encounters of the Faubourg St. Antoine. After several barricades had been carried he rushed to the attack upon the last three which still blocked up the faubourg. Here he fell into the hands of the insurgents, who had planted on this, their last remaining stronghold, the flag of the 8th legion of the National Guard, which they had carried off from the council-house of the arrondissement. Richard freed himself from their hands by an immense effort, and then, with irresistible courage, threw himself on this barricade in the midst of a murderous fire; there he recaptured the flag, and had the signal honor of restoring it to the hands of the National Guard who were struggling to regain it. Conducted by them in triumph to the National Assembly, the Moniteur announces that he there received from President Sénart, his decoration as Representant, with the promise of that of the Legion of Honor.

All our lads who have become soldiers have behaved remarkably well. Priat, of whom we have spoken to you several times already, has obtained the rank of Sergeant in the Zouaves regiment; three other colons are corporals in regiments of the line.

Frequent reference has been made in the passages we have quoted to the Ecole Préparatoire; and some particulars of that invaluable branch of the Institution, which we find in the Report for 1848, give too much useful information to be omitted.

The results already obtained by our Ecole Préparatoire deserve your attention.

Of 155 pupils admitted,

37 are still at Mettray, where they fill the various offices of secretary, accountant, treasurer, schoolmaster, steward, labor-master, chefs and sous-chefs of families;

9 have left Mettray to become teachers;

15 have taken various situations (in railway, insurance, and commercial companies, &c., &c.);

10 have entered the army;

5 have become agricultural superintendents;

29 follow industrial occupations;

49 have left the Colony from want of capacity;

1 is dead.

There are at present about eleven pupils in the School; several are trying to obtain a schoolmasters' certificate; others devote themselves more particularly to agriculture, both theoretical and practical.

All help as monitors in giving instruction to the colons, and thus commence their apprenticeship in the difficult art of guiding and reforming their erring fellow creatures.

At a time when the subject of agricultural colonies engages universal attention, our Ecole Préparatoire cannot but acquire fresh importance, and demand increased care.

We cannot forget that it is to this establishment that the success of Mettray is in great part owing. We can rely with confidence upon the success of agricultural colonies, only when they are conducted by practical and experienced men. The school, then, in which Government can meet with such individuals deserves to be considered eminently useful. Such, gentlemen, we trust, will be the case with our Ecole Préparatoire; such is the object we proposed to ourselves in establishing it, and to attain which our efforts have been unceasingly directed.

1849 found the finances of the colony seriously depressed by the prohibition to manufacture goods for sale. Meanwhile expressions of sympathy and offers of pecuniary aid came from Holland and from England, and the colony received a visit from Louis Napoleon, then President of the Republic, accompanied by several of his ministers. They fully recognized the importance of the Institution, but nevertheless the Directors had great reason to fear that the subventions which each successive Government since that of Louis Philippe had continued to grant, might now be withdrawn. To avert this threatened ruin, they asked for a Committee to be appointed by the chamber of Representatives to visit Mettray and report upon it to Government.

Happily their investigations resulted in the subventions being continued, but the loss of profit from the workshops remaining closed, necessitated a reduction in the staff of officers. The Directors dismissed twenty of their assistants, parting from them with deep personal regret, and grieved for the decreased efficiency of the Institution which must result from their departure.

There are very few events recorded in the report for this year, but we find instead very elaborate and important statistical details on the number of youths received and of those placed out, of their parentage, of the proportion whose names were inscribed on the tablet of honor, of the degree of instruction they possessed on entering the colony, usually very small, and of the time devoted to its acquisition while there. This had latterly been increased and amounted now to fourteen hours per week, which was found amply sufficient to enable them to acquire the elementary knowledge—reading writing and arithmetic and, in some cases, linear drawing and music—which it was considered desirable to teach. A certain portion of the above mentioned time was moreover occupied in religious instruction, but to youths who were preparing for their first communion the chaplain devoted an additional hour daily. From the Report for 1850, we learn :—

Sixty five of our wards have made their first Communion, and in the most satisfactory manner ; and a large number have renewed it.

We have no fixed time for the performance of this solemn duty ; it is determined chiefly by the amount of religious knowledge, and the fervor of the aspirant.

At Mettray a large number of our children are foundlings ; it is impossible to form an idea of the neglected state of these poor creatures, whose birth is their only offence.

Many of them have done nothing from quite infancy, but watch cattle, and their brutalised condition is often on a level with that of the animals among whom they have lived ; indeed we have had boys who seemed to have acquired their most degraded attributes. Thus, if they quarrelled with a companion, they would after regarding him sideways, rush against him, and overturn him by butting at his chest with their heads, all done with such incredible rapidity that their adversary had no time to save himself from the blow.

The health of the colony continued to be exceedingly satisfactory.

We cannot but call upon you to rejoice with us that Mettray has been preserved from the scourge of disease which has found victims even at our very door. The Penitentiary at Tours lost two-thirds of its inmates in three days. It may be answered, that Mettray is situated on a high table land, free from stagnant water and injurious exhalations. But the houses in our close vicinity are in a similar position, and nevertheless in one of them a whole family was carried off.

It is shown by examining our register that the number of boys admitted into the Infirmary diminishes in proportion with the length of their stay at the colony, which proves how much their constitutions must be strengthened by their healthful mode of life.

We never allow lads who have been placed out at neighboring farms to go to the hospital ; if they fall sick they return to the colony. We claim the right to relieve them in suffering and in sorrow, as a father does his children.

The time spent in curing their physical ailment, we make additionally profitable by reawakening in their hearts the good principles, which during their residence at the colony we endeavored to implant. Our excellent sisters of charity, seconded by the chaplain, lose no opportunity for exhortation, and their counsel is always received with gratitude.

Thus our lads return into the world strengthened both in body and mind; and our gratuitous hospitality has the happiest influence on their characters, for by such evidence they are convinced of the disinterestedness of our advice and feel all the more willing to follow it.

An increased expense is the unavoidable consequence of this rule, as we receive nothing from government, for youths who have left the Colony; but you will agree with us, that there are sacrifices by which we gain.

We have already had occasion to inform you, in preceding reports, and our financial position obliges us to recur to it now, how seriously we have suffered from the decree by the Provisional Government which obliged us to close many of our workshops, and employ our supernumerary laborers in the fields. You will understand the difficulty we had to find useful occupation for so many hands; while, at the same time, it was imperative that the boys should not remain idle; we employed them therefore in making drains, which will not for a long time repay the cost of hand labour; it is indeed an agricultural advance that we have paid beforehand. The Colony will reap the benefit of it hereafter, but at present it appears to be so much loss. It was, however, far better to employ our lads thus, than 'in grinding the air,' as the English say, when speaking of their tread-mill.

Referring to the family system the Directors remark:—

In our endeavour to replace the home which has failed in its duty, we do not conceal from ourselves that the imitation can never equal the reality, and consequently, whenever our wards come from respectable families we lose no opportunity for enabling them to meet, in order to preserve the bonds of natural affection.

Our Colons often beg permission to send some help, out of the little fund which accrues from a portion of their earnings, to a father or mother suffering from poverty, and we always incline a favorable ear to such requests, being only too glad to foster every generous sentiment in their young hearts. If the amount of their savings is too small to meet the want, we add enough to make it sufficient, and nothing is so potent in exciting their feelings of gratitude towards us. We generally appreciate kindness rendered to those dear to us more highly than if we were its immediate object.

When the character and conduct of the parents are good, we allow them to see their children, and often their fathers, more often their mothers, come from a great distance, frequently on foot, even in the worst weather.

Our lads are not in a position in which strong passions are brought into play, and we may rejoice that it is so; but owing to this circumstance, when speaking of what concerns them, the incidents we have to relate are necessarily very simple. Love of labor, obedience to their officers, religious feeling, such are the virtues which we usually have occasion to mention. Some of our Colons have fortunately however had opportunities of distinguishing themselves by rendering a service to their fellow creatures, and even in saving human life.

One day a bull on the farm became infuriated and rushed at the woman who has the superintendence of the dairy, when the lad Bourdin, seeing the danger which threatened her, instantly threw himself just in the animal's path, and with a stick struck it a tremendous blow between the horns, which enabled the terrified woman to escape. The boy was not deceived as to the risk he ran, and said to us afterwards with much simplicity, "I made sure it was all up with me."

Another Colon, also quite recently, named Roch, having seen the wife of a laborer fall into a piece of water, which was more than three metres [10 feet] deep, jumped in to rescue her, and was fortunate enough to drag her to the edge.

Some high officers of the State, who happened to be with us when we congratulated these two boys, in the presence of the whole Colony, were so touched by the recital, that they suggested we should request the Minister of the Interior to reward their self-devotion by a medal of honor. We did not, however, think it right to yield to their proposal, for we wish that our lads should regard themselves as fortunate rather than meritorious in profiting by an opportunity to render a fellow-creature a kindness.

The lads who belong to the Department of the Seine are those who give us most trouble, for all our efforts do not always avail to prevent their returning to the Capital, which has an irresistible attraction for them, and whither, moreover, their families usually urge them to come; and you are aware that under no circumstances is our active and watchful care more constantly needed, than for those poor lads who are exposed to all the temptations of a great city.

Detained as we necessarily are at Mettray by the duties of our position there, it is impossible for us to exercise a due superintendence over our lads in Paris. It is M. Verdier, (barrister-at-law), the agent of your society, who, notwithstanding the duties already imposed upon him by the office he so disinterestedly discharges, does not hesitate to take upon himself this additional responsibility, and there is no trouble he will not undergo to obtain places for our boys."

The following passage enables us to judge of the position which the colony had attained in the course of ten years of active existence. It will appear that the apprehended withdrawal of the subvention from Government had to a certain extent taken place.

If Mettray even at the present time has not yet assumed its rank among first-rate agricultural establishments, we can assure you it is not for want of making the most strenuous efforts in that direction. But the task is a difficult one. Many and very different objects are there sought to be obtained. Intellectual instruction, moral training, the requirements of strict discipline, fixed hours which cannot be changed, the employment of youthful and inexperienced hands, of which moreover we have often more than we know how to occupy, render the task of cultivating the land well and economically, and of producing good agriculturists, a very hard one.

Now, however, that our efforts have effected in a moral point of view all we dared to hope for, and even more than that when we recollect the perils we have passed through and the class we have had to deal with, we intend to devote our utmost efforts to repair the losses which the agricultural portion of our enterprise has incurred, and also to place agricultural training on the footing which it ought here to occupy.

You have not forgotten, gentlemen, the critical position in which the colony was placed by certain acts of the government affecting us.

A ministerial order reduced by 10 centimes (1d) the daily allowance for each child, which has diminished our annual income by 18,250 francs (£730). The allowance for clothes has also been lessened 10 francs (8s) a head, by which we lose annually 1000 francs (£40). Finally, the suppression of certain of our workshops, those namely for the manufacture of waggons, carts, wooden shoes, and agricultural implements, have deprived us of an annual profit of from 10 to 15 thousand francs (£400 to £600). The total annual sum we lose then is 34,250 francs (£1,370).

The extension which our factory of agricultural implements had undergone led us to hope for still larger gains. We deplore the circumstances in which we have been placed, all the more that the time seemed near at hand when our institution should become self-supporting independently of governmental aid.

On the first of January, 1848 our receipts fell short of our expenses by only 30,000 francs (£1,200). The amount of work done in our workshops increased so rapidly in 1847 that we felt sure that by enlarging them still further, and considering the large orders we had received, we should, in succeeding years, have realized very greatly increased profits.

After ten years of strenuous exertion we have the right to say—“Either Mettray is an exceptional and ephemeral institution, and ought to receive neither the help which might retain a benevolent but useless experiment in existence, nor praises which would afford it futile encouragement,—or Mettray is the first stone laid of a complete system of correctional education founded in no rash love of novelty, but on the eternal principles on which society itself is based, and susceptible of infinitely varied application.”

In the latter case it ought to be unreservedly adopted, that so difficult an enterprise may not be left at the mercy of this or that favorable disposition which may fail us at any time, nor dependent on our individual efforts to obtain aid, which, whether more or less successful, entail always considerable loss of time, seriously interfering with the good management of the institution.

It devolves upon you, gentlemen, the founders of Mettray, to ensure the permanency of your work.

We gave ourselves ten years for accomplishing this great experiment; that period is completed to-day, and we may safely say, METTRAY IS ESTABLISHED.

Praise has succeeded detraction, approval has taken the place of objections, and the most convincing testimony authorizes us in adding, Mettray is understood.

Both at home and abroad our plan has been eagerly adopted, and similar institutions projected or already established elsewhere, enable us to exclaim, still more rejoicingly, Mettray is imitated.

Finally, if our anticipations and our wishes do not deceive us, the day is not far distant, when your system being applied to all those children who before that period had been a burden or a source of alarm to the state, they will, by promoting its prosperity, become to it a mine of wealth.

The report for 1851 contains no new facts of importance, but it again insists on the ruinous consequence of sending lads to Mettray for so short a period as two or three years, and upon the advantages resulting from effective patronage. It mentions also that the cultivation of the colza plant had been introduced, and promised to be highly remunerative.

In 1852 a most elaborate report was issued by M. de Gasparin on the state of the agricultural department, which it appears was then in a very flourishing condition.

In the course of this year the directors were away from the colony for a considerable time, owing to ill health.

Officers and colons whilst we were absent from the Colony redoubled their zeal, in order to prove their attachment to us, and to our esteemed representative M. Blanchard, whom they alike love and respect, and whose task they sought to lighten. This fact affords a most convincing answer to the objection we have often heard raised, that the existence of Mettray depends on two men. Mettray, we affirm, rests on an educational system based on established principles, and will bear fruit long, very long after those who originated it shall be no more.

Little did he who spoke or those who heard these words imagine in how a short a time the prophecy they contained was in part to be fulfilled; on the 10th of September of the same year, M. de Courteilles died. "He was attending the sick bed of a youth who had to all appearance become thoroughly hardened, when the latter, for the first time since his admission into the colony, exhibited some sign of contrition. The joy which M. de Courteilles experienced on the occasion reminded him of an extract from a sermon of the Abbé Lacordaire, which he had inserted in his work on prisons. * * * He went for the volume, and was reading the passage to the friends that were around him when the book dropped from his hand: he was dead."*

---

* Mettray, a Lecture, by Robert Hall, M. A.

"Thus," writes M. Demetz,

the Colony lost its firmest stay, and I the tenderest and most faithful friend, the companion of my early years, the adopted brother given me by God.

It may seem rash in me, to those who knew the force of his character—the power of his genius, to have consented henceforth to take upon myself alone the responsibility of this great enterprize. But it is to those very qualities, which circumstances enable me better than any one else justly to estimate, that my resolution must be attributed. M. de Courteilles has placed the administration of the Colony on so sound a basis, that I have only to execute what he has already organized. His zeal and devotion were never more evident than in the year which has just elapsed; the narrative of its events demonstrates the greatness of his creative genius. He regarded the position attained by the Colony, both in a moral point of view and in respect to discipline, as most satisfactory, an opinion which has very recently received ministerial confirmation,* but he deplored the irregularities still apparent in our domestic economy, and which resulted from the want of sufficient means to conduct it methodically; and it was to this department of our institution more particularly that he devoted the last days of his life.

The great increase in the number of inmates at Mettray had rendered the existing storehouses altogether inadequate to its requirements; it had consequently become necessary to purchase articles of consumption almost from day to day, which caused inevitably some waste in their use, and made it impossible to take advantage of a cheap season to lay in a large stock. To meet this evil M. de Courteilles commenced building extensive magazines which, when finished, not only enabled the managers to purchase largely when prices were low, but to keep a much more exact account of their expenditure in this department than had before been practicable. By these means together with the great saving effected by the improved method of purchase,

We are now able to state the average daily expenditure for food for each boy since the foundation of the Colony at 30 centimes ( $2\frac{3}{4}$ d.), while for the officers it has not exceeded 70 centimes ( $6\frac{1}{2}$ d.). For clothing each colon has cost per day 14 centimes ( $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.), for fuel and light 2 centimes ( $\frac{1}{8}$ d.). We cannot hope to attain greater economy in the two latter items. Washing has cost us 4 centimes per head, but we expect to reduce this amount considerably by means of a new system we have adopted, and which we will explain; and as regards our outlay for clothing, we trust that that also will be lessened in consequence of a rule we have just made, and which will, we hope, operate as favorably in a moral as in a financial point of view. We intend to award a prize to those of our colonists who, by the care they take of their clothes, make them last longer than the regulation period. We regard it as a duty to do our utmost to teach our lads orderly and economical habits, which, if acquired early, will remain with them, and have the happiest influence upon their after life. By limiting their wants, and accustoming them to live upon a small sum, we take from them the motive to seek riches by dishonest means.

---

* See the letter of his Excellency the Minister of the Interior, dated April 18th, 1853.

After further minute statistical information, relating chiefly to the health of the lads, among whom the rate of mortality for the fourteen years of the colony's existence amounted to only one and a half per cent, the report continues :—

Perhaps, gentlemen, you will think we have entered at too great length into these dry details, but they are so important to our success that we trust you will pardon us for presenting them to you. It must never be forgotten that to do good on a large scale we must effect it at the cheapest possible rate.

Words which deserve to be written in letters of gold.

In addition to the large store houses that M. de Courteilles had begun, he urged forward the works by which a more abundant supply of water was secured to the colony.

Every day he was occupied in overlooking the workmen, so much so that his health suffered visibly from these excessive demands upon his strength ; but when we besought him to moderate his zeal, he would reply in the beautiful words of Scripture, " So long as the flesh is able, the spirit should be willing."

You know how forgetful youth is by nature, but it is not so with our children. Exposed to sufferings of every sort, and having never received one mark of kindness from their infancy upwards, until Providence through you took pity on their misery, they are amazed to find that any one cares for them, and the smallest reward, the slightest proof of interest, affects them deeply. Judge, then, gentlemen, what they must have felt when deprived of him who had devoted, even sacrificed, his life to them.

I will not attempt to describe to you the state of the Colony during that mournful season, but the grief expressed by youths who have long left us will enable you to understand what theirs must have been who, to the very moment of M. de Courteilles' death, were the objects of his tender care.

The following is a letter from Hermerel, now established at Caen :

" Caen, September 27th, 1852.

" Monsieur Demetz—I awaited with the intensest anxiety the confirmation of this news. My master came to my house on the 12th of this month to bring me some work, when seeing the portrait of my revered M. de Courteilles hanging against the wall, together with the engraving of Mettray, he exclaimed all at once, 'Why that's Mettray there, and here's one of the founders; it is the very one who died yesterday afternoon of apoplexy.' I could not speak a word, and meanwhile he went away. As soon as I came to myself, I ran after him to ask him where he heard the news; he said he saw it in a newspaper, and I ran to every place where newspapers are taken in, but I could not find out if it was true. But I could scarcely avoid believing it, for why should a man who knew nothing of Mettray invent such a thing. I was in the most dreadful suspense till I received your letter, and ever since then I have been in the most dreadful grief. I cannot tell you, Monsieur Demetz, what I feel; I will only say that I seek in spirit the tomb which covers the dear remains of M. de Courteilles, and there my heart pours forth its bitter sorrow.

"What a terrible blow Providence has inflicted on you too; but I know, Monsieur Demetz, you are bearing it with the resignation you always show. God alone is our Master, and we must ever yield to His will. After such fearful proof of His power all we can do is to humble ourselves before Him.

"Children at Mettray, with grief I learn the loss we have all sustained. It is a dreadful loss, and one we can never replace. M. de Courteilles is no more. He was one of the colony's supports, and this support it has lost. He still watches over us from above, but we can see him no longer. He is no more amongst us. He will never again console the sick, nor the prisoner, nor ever praise good conduct more, nor be seen at any of your meetings. Ah! my dear lads, he is gone from us for ever! But every step we took at Mettray he guided, we were the objects of all his thoughts, of all his solicitude; he watched over us while we slept, he worked for us while we rested. What proof of our regret can we give worthy of such care and such sacrifices! No, dear schoolfellows, we can give none—for it was his earthly life he spent to save our souls. But, dear colons of Mettray, let us try to prove our respect for his memory, let every action show how truly we mourn him. Let your games, your laughter, be less boisterous. Break not his rest—he lies beside you, and his spirit is ever with you;* as for me, I share your sorrow, your grief is mine also, for I owe him more than any one. A servant deprived by death of a good master mourns him for a time at least; a son never ceases to regret the loss of a good father, but we have lost far more than a good master, or even father—we have lost a saviour.

Have we not then greater cause than they, to make our mourning life-long; and that every one who in future visits Mettray may know how great a loss the colons have sustained, I beg M. Demetz to be so good as to allow them to wear black collars to their coats instead of red, and to let the banner of each family be covered with crape for at least a year. But this is nothing in comparison with what the colony owes him.—I have no need, my dear boys, to ask you to pray for him, for that is your first duty. As for me, I trust, M. Demetz, and the officers under you, you will not think me wrong in putting on mourning for him; my heart will mourn too, and like my school-fellows I shall never forget him who was everything to me. M. Demetz is left alone over you, my dear friends; his charge is greater than ever, and besides he too has lost his friend. Try to lighten the task which this dreadful event has rendered double to him. Let offences be less frequent, let the elder ones guide the little ones aright, let those who have learnt something teach those who know nothing, and let all, animated with one spirit, endeavor to make the grief of your masters less bitter, and their life among you more happy.

---

* By his own direction M. de Courteilles was buried in the cemetery of the Colony: thus even in death he is not separated from those to whom his life was devoted. His epitaph is in these words, "J'ai voulu vivre mourir et resusciter avec eux;" they are an extract from his will.—ED.

"Farewell, my dearly beloved school-fellows. May Heaven receive the prayers we all offer up for the repose of the soul of the deceased, our revered M. de Courteilles, who loved us to the end of his life; and may it be pleased to grant, many, many years more to him, who is yet spared to us. (signed,) HERMEREL."

You will not wrong us, by imagining we have permitted a word of this letter to be altered.

Another letter equally expressive of the love and veneration inspired by M. de Courteilles, is given in the report, but our space will not permit us to transcribe it. M. Demetz received,

Numbers of letters, which, though less well expressed, are equally touching. We have preserved them all, and shall keep them, as affording the most striking testimony to the worth our friend. It is not given to every one to inspire such regret.

If in the hearts of children young, some of them very young, and untrained, our grief found such an echo, judge what we met with in our officers, educated almost entirely under our own eyes, and who had lived on terms of intimacy with him whom it was impossible to behold without being attracted to him by an irresistible power. These excellent young men have felt that the best way to honor the memory of their benefactor is to follow his exhortations, and it is simply an act of justice on my part to assure you that the management of the Colony has never been more easy. Right feeling is apparent throughout, and each performs his duty without my having even to remind him of it.

All give me their best assistance, but I ought especially to mention M. M. Blanchard and Mahoudeau,* who each in his own department supplies my place, in my absence, so satisfactorily as to leave me no possibility for anxiety. I can give no higher testimony to their merit, nor one which would more convincingly prove to you how worthy they are of that confidence which I accord to them with heartfelt pleasure.

This was a mournful year for the colony, which during its course lost many friends besides M. de Courteilles. One of these, M. Blonet, was the architect to whose happy adaptation to the requirements of Mettray of what he in company with M. Demetz had seen in similar institutions abroad, much of its success is owing. Madame Hébert, the foundress, as it will be recollected, of one of the houses inhabited by the colons, died in 1853, and also M. Bezancon, a munificent benefactor to the colony from the time of its foundation.

---

* These gentlemen bear respectively the titles of Inspecteur de la Colonie, and Chef de la Comptabilité.—ED.

The report is preceeded by a portrait of M. de Courteilles—it represents a man of distinguished appearance, and most benevolent countenance—but the record of the past year's events no longer bears his signature. May that which yet remains long be spared!

In 1854 we find reference to the assemblage of the colons in the great hall which takes place every Sunday.

On Sunday an account is given before the assembled colony of the conduct of each family and the work it has accomplished during the past week, and particulars respecting its individual members are related. Every boy who has deserved well receives encouragement; every family whose conduct has been satisfactory receives a reward. This emulation among the different families has always had a good effect. It was not however sufficient, and we thought it might be possible to excite this spirit of rivalry in good conduct to still further results, by fostering it not only in individuals but in the various families, so that it should animate the whole colony.

With this view we have established a kind of "prize of honor" (prix d'honneur) to be granted to the family which has incurred no punishment during the past week; it consists in the privilege of carrying the national flag upon which this simple legend has been inscribed, "Honneur à la Famille—"

During their military exercises, the family which has earned this distinction marches at the head of the colony whose standard-bearer it has become. The important aid we receive from this struggle as to who shall behave best, will be proved better by figures than by the most eloquent words.

Before the introduction of the flag the number of boys inscribed on the tablet of honor amounted to 66 per cent; it is now 74½, and we should add that 37 lads now at the colony have come to us within the last three months, and consequently are not yet privileged to have their names placed upon the tablet. Under the same influence the number of colons consigned to the cell, which was formerly 2 per cent per day, is now reduced to one and a quarter.

Every week, as has been already stated, we give to those families whose conduct has been particularly good, a little reward. This is generally an engraving representing either some courageous action, or else a religious subject; sometimes it is a print of one of our great battles, or of a naval encounter. The sublime scene of the death of the Archbishop of Paris* and the deed of self devotion by the sister of charity who in the midst of a fierce street skirmish saved the life of an officer at the risk of her own, are thus brought under the notice of our lads, and these engravings, conveying as they do an invaluable lesson, decorate the walls of the boys' rooms, and form a little gallery illustrative of moral greatness, piety, and heroism.

---

* The name of the successful family is written on a small scutcheon, fastened to the staff of the flag.

The Report gives most encouraging particulars respecting a large number of the youths who had left the Institution, contained partly in letters from patrons, and in one signed "A former colon." The writer, who had settled at Lima, after

* The event alluded to in the Report occurred, as doubtless our readers will recollect, during the terrible Three Days of June 1848. We were in Paris in the autumn of that year, and of course saw all the places rendered memorable during the preceding few months. It may be supposed we did not fail to visit the spot which the death of the noble-hearted prelate has made hallowed ground, and there the particulars were narrated to us of that fearful scene.

Hoping to stay the dreadful carnage, and to act as mediator between the Government and the rebels, the Archbishop departed from his palace on Sunday evening, the 25th of June, for the Place de la Bastille where the fighting was then hottest. Passing along the Rue St. Antoine the excited populace, aware of his intention, implored him to persevere, overwhelming him with prayers and blessings. Some few warned him of the peril he was incurring, but to these he replied, that duty forbade him to regard his own safety; and he was heard often to repeat to himself the words, "Bonus autem pastor de vitam suam pro ovibus suis." Truly he proved himself no hireling! He stopped from time to time beside the ambulances, blessing and absolving the wounded. On reaching the Place de la Bastille where a barricade had been thrown up across the embouchure of two streets which form an acute angle, he prevailed upon the officer commanding the Government troops to stop firing that he might parley with the insurgents. The latter ceased also, when accompanied by his two grands vicaires, and preceded by a man bearing a bough for a flag of truce, he advanced towards the barricade. The rebels descended from it to meet him, and there appeared reason to hope that his mission of peace would prove successful, when the report of a gun, possibly a random shot, was followed by a cry of "Treason!" and instantly the fusillade was resumed more fiercely than ever. The prelate and his no less courageous attendants were thus in the midst of a cross fire. He still advanced, reached the barricade and climbed to the summit where he was visible to the combatants on both sides. The balls whistled round his head as he addressed the multitude, but he remained unharmed, though one of his Vicars had his hat pierced in three places. While descending from the barricade the Archbishop was struck by a bullet in his side. The blow was mortal. A faithful servant who had followed him unperceived, caught him in his arms, and he was carried from the spot. He survived only a few hours during which his sufferings were intense, but borne with the calmness and resignation which belongs to true heroism.—Ed.

expressing the warmest gratitude and affection towards the Director and the officers of the colony, begs that his name may be inscribed on its list of founders, stating that he has transmitted the sum of one hundred francs in aid of its funds, a donation by which he would become entitled to the coveted distinction.

We find also the following passage referring to a visit paid to the colony by Lord Brougham.

It would be impossible to describe the impression produced by the noble Lord's stay at Mettray, where the kindness shown us by this distinguished individual in coming so far out of his way, was fully appreciated. Lord Brougham entered into the colony's minutest details, and even, at his own request, dined at the same table with our officers, conversing with them on the nature of their different employments. We shall not forget his emotion on hearing our band perform "God save the Queen," and on beholding the English flag flying on the mast of our ship, side by side with the French standard.

He did not depart from the institution without leaving there a proof of his generous sympathy, and we look forward to having ere long funds sufficient to build a house on which will be inscribed (as in the case of those constructed at the expense of different departments) the words "Founded by England."

We are informed by the Report for 1855 of a change in the time allotted to the instruction of the younger boys, whose numbers had recently much increased. It was now found best to allow them to spend a larger portion of the day in the school-room than their elder companions, their labor being of comparatively little value, while their aptitude for acquiring elementary knowledge is much greater than at a later period. The progress made by the pupils was on the whole highly satisfactory. Out of the 649 colons in the institution 396 could read, and 268 could write well, while the most uninstructed had made some progress in these arts, and the arithmetic class was very promising.

Great praise is due to our schoolmaster for the perseverance which has been rewarded with so large a measure of success, the more remarkable as we have during the present year received a large number of new boys. But we must award a due portion of praise also to the pupils in our Ecole Préparatoire, who have aided greatly to promote the improvement we have indicated.

We rejoice to be able again to bring under your notice the advantages resulting from this school whose usefulness we have never ceased to feel, and regarding which even foreigners who have kindly visited Mettray have taken opportunities of expressing their high opinion. We have evidence of this on very high authority in a letter recently published by Mr. Hill, Queen's Counsel, addressed to Lord Brougham.* This able writer in enumerating the conditions essential to the prosperity of an agricultural colony, unhesitatingly declares that the most important of all is the establishment, as a preparatory step, of a school for teachers, similar to our own.

Orfrasière, an off-shoot from Mettray, of which we shall hear more in the next Report, was founded this year.

The inundations of June, 1856, which overwhelmed the valleys of some of the largest rivers in France, caused great damage to the city of Tours. It was indeed threatened almost with submersion, its safety depending on the resisting power of a levee which at one time appeared likely to give way. The Mettray youths had on the occasion of a former flood rendered great assistance, and their help was again thankfully accepted.

During the disasters which ravaged our fertile districts, our lads—whom a journey in England prevented me from myself leading to the scene of action—were in the foremost ranks to oppose the evil. M. Blanchard was at their head, admirably seconded by the rest of our officers, whose names I wish I could here enumerate.

The zeal and devotion with which each one performed his duty on this occasion, called forth the following letter from the Municipal Council of Tours after those terrible days of trial:—

“ To the Director of Mettray.

“ SIR,—At the time when our city was exposed to imminent danger, you generously thought of offering us the help of your young colons; we gratefully accepted it, and a few hours only elapsed before these brave youths, furnished with tools which were familiar to them, came to assist our terrified inhabitants in opposing the violence of the flood.

“ For two days and a night they worked incessantly, with unheard-of energy and ardor, without letting order and discipline be relaxed for an instant in their ranks.

“ They remained with us to the last, when every means of safety had been tried. After all the fatigue they had undergone for us, the colons of Mettray still wished to lighten the misfortune which their courage was not able to avert, and these poor lads devoted their savings to the relief of those who had suffered by the floods.

“ This devotion and generosity have excited the warmest admiration of our citizens, which it is our gratifying duty to express.

“ All honor, then, to those poor boys who have so nobly gained for themselves a place in society whence the misfortunes of their youth, often undeserved, seemed to exclude them! All honor to the institution which has inspired such generous feelings!

---

* “ Practical Suggestions to the Founders of Reformatory Schools;” by the Recorder of Birmingham.

"The Municipal Council of Tours has decided that a commemorative medal shall be offered to the Colony of Mettray, to perpetuate the remembrance of the brotherly help it so freely gave to our city. I shall shortly have the honor of transmitting it to you, sir; but the Council was unwilling to delay any longer expressing to you their deep gratitude, and I rejoice to be their channel of communication on this occasion.

"With sincere respect,

"Allow me to subscribe myself, &c., &c.

"E. MAME, Mayor."

The medal, which I have received from the Mayor (always as ready to reward good deeds as he is the first to perform them) bears the following inscription:—"A la Colonie de Mettray, la Ville de Tours, reconnaissante.—Inondation, 1856."

The Cardinal Archbishop of Tours added his testimony to the heroic conduct alike of officers and colons from Mettray.

Speaking of the increasing development of the manufacture of agricultural implements, and the industry of the young workmen, the Report continues—

To assiduity they often unite considerable skill, and give proof of no mean capacity. One of them has invented a root-cutter, (coupe-racine), which accomplishes twice as much work as an ordinary root-cutter. We sent this implement to the Exposition Universelle, and it having gained a second prize, we resolved to take out a patent for it. We decided upon this step in order, firstly, to secure our property in a useful invention, but more particularly with the view of encouraging the efforts of our young colons, and sustaining their zeal.

Many specimens of their handiwork have gained prizes at agricultural shows both at Paris and in the provinces.

An additional department, entitled "Arts et Metiers," has this year been added to the Ecole Preparatoire, which will provide for the education of industrial teachers, serious evils having occasionally arisen from employing as trades-masters individuals who had not been brought up in that institution; it is intended henceforth to employ no officer who has not been trained there.

The vast proportions of Mettray have deterred many individuals from attempting to found an agricultural colony on the same plan. They feared lest the system when limited in its operation to comparatively few individuals, might not work successfully, and they nevertheless were unable for want of funds to attempt one on a large scale. To prove that their fears were groundless the little colony of Orfrasière was established at about twelve miles distance from Mettray where there are only sixty lads.

By reason of its distance from Mettray, supervision is difficult at Orfrasière, and the more so owing to the small number of officers there; these consist, indeed, of only a chef de famille and a sous chef. Nevertheless, not an attempt at escape has been made during nearly two years.

There has been but one attempt, which has proved successful, to escape from the parent colony since its foundation. It must, however, be borne in mind that the difficulty of moving about from place to place without incurring the notice of the police, which still exists to a considerable degree in France, renders detection more likely there than in this kingdom. Unsuccessful endeavors to get away are from time to time made, though we believe invariably by lads who have not been long at the colony; even then we imagine they are very few as compared with the attempts to escape from similar institutions in England. We recollect hearing of an instance, though we do not vouch for the truth of it, in which it happened to the masters to find themselves, one day, the sole representatives of their school, all the boys having taken their departure. Of course such an event could occur in only a very small establishment, and as knowledge and experience in reformatory treatment increase, we may hope this serious difficulty will be overcome. But to return to Orfrasière.

Not a complaint has been addressed to us by the neighbouring land-owners, and not only have our lads avoided exciting distrust, but their conduct has been so exemplary that the clergyman of the parish, in full congregation, was pleased to express his approbation of the manner in which they perform their religious duties, and his high opinion of their excellent principles.

But whilst thus occupied in extending further and further the influence of Mettray, we should be guilty of negligence did we not provide for the future prosperity of the colony itself—that prosperity which, owing to the precarious circumstances in which Mettray is now placed, may be seriously endangered at every renewal of a lease, we being limited to the disagreeable alternative of accepting onerous conditions which would destroy all hope of obtaining a profit from the land, or of abandoning extensive erections, to go and establish ourselves at a distance.

The Mortier estate adjoins our buildings, and we cannot step outside the court without setting foot upon it. Your Council expressed a wish last year to buy it. The period during which we can claim the right to do so expires almost immediately; the estate is worth 109,000 francs (£4,360), and is let for 4,000 francs (£160) a year.

We propose, in order to raise the sum required for this purchase, to have recourse to the method adopted by the Asile Fénélon.... The mode of proceeding is to issue bonds for 500 francs (£20) each, having the security of a first mortgage, at four per cent. interest,* to be drawn by lot for repayment, as the funds which the Colony may have at its disposal will permit. We are glad to be able to inform you that we are sure of disposing of a large number of these bonds in France, and also in England, where during our last journey in that country we received the kindest offers from friends.

The plan here proposed has been adopted, and we have ourselves seen a prospectus entering into minute details which has been prepared for circulation in England. Doubtless this opportunity will not be lost by those whom circumstances have enabled to appreciate the benefit Mettray has, by its example, conferred upon the reformatory movement in this country, for proving their sense of it at this crisis.

The salubrity of Mettray is one among numerous strong reasons for not removing the colony to another spot.

The rate of mortality since the institution was established has not exceeded two per cent. We cannot but rejoice at these results, especially when we reflect upon the neglected and destitute condition in which most of our pupils passed their early life.

The cholera, during three different visitations, ravaged the surrounding population without attacking us. Unhappily this year the Colony has paid its tribute; typhoid fever raged among us for four months; 152 of our youths were attacked, 14 only died.†

Who can imagine the terror which such a scourge would have excited among our officers, if they had not been men whose devotion was above all proof? At first we thought of having nurses from other places, but our noble assistants claimed as a right the care of our lads. It was truly a touching sight to see these young men, full of life and hope, voluntarily make our infirmary their abode.

The Reports for 1855 and 1856 notice at considerable length that branch of the institution which is devoted to the reception of boys from the upper ranks of society sent there under the law of correction paternelle. The results hitherto have been highly successful, but during the visitation

---

* Since the publication of this Report the Société Paternelle have determined to raise the interest payable upon the Bonds from four to five per cent.—ED.

† In comparing the number of boys attacked, who were for the most part of weakly constitutions, with those who died, we must express our high opinion of the skill and devotion of our medical attendants, Dr. Allain-Dupré and Dr. Anglada. The latter fell a victim to his excessive zeal. We may truly say that his death was the complement of a life wholly devoted to alleviating the sufferings of humanity, in which he labored with a disinterestedness that knew no bounds. We feel it to be a duty to pay this just tribute of praise to his memory.

of the fever it was deemed best not to receive lads of this description.

The yearly cash account is not published with the Reports. It forms a separate document which M. Gouin prepares and presents annually to the Société Paternelle.

We may gather, however, from incidental references to the colony's expenditure that this is governed by the most rigid economy. The average daily cost of food, clothing, light, fuel and washing for the colons, and of food for the officers, we have already seen. We have now before us a statement setting forth the provisions consumed on one particular day (June 12th 1855) together with their price and the number of consumers. The latter amounted to 698, and their food, including fuel for cooking it, cost on that day 266 francs (£10 : 12 : 9½). Financial statistics are not given in the Reports by which we can ascertain the entire cost of each lad; we were, however, very recently, informed by M. Demetz, that including his quota of expense for officers, rent, instruction, food, clothing, and patronage after leaving the colony, in short dividing the expenditure of the whole institution among the colons, three-quarters of a franc per day, or a trifle less than £11 per year, is the cost of each after deducting the average value of his labor.

It is not our intention to enter further into the statistics of Mettray, which have already been analysed in a masterly manner in several of the valuable notices of this institution which have from time to time appeared—and indeed we must now hasten to take leave of our subject altogether. Important as we feel it to be that information of the kind we have endeavored to supply should be placed within the reach of all who are actively engaged in the reformatory movement, we should heartily rejoice to see the subject pursued further by other penmen than ours. Germany, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and other European countries, as also the United States, have possessed Reformatory schools for many years, and invaluable knowledge might be gained from the careful study of their progress. France too has many schools beside Mettray deserving our attention, while at home, the House of Refuge in Glasgow, and Red Hill, together with some others, have been in existence long enough for their experience to teach a most important lesson. In addition to these a host of smaller institutions have sprung up around us whose course, though as yet short, cannot be uninteresting. The history even of such as have attained but a partial success, or have actually succumbed under the difficulties which inevitably beset the early existence of such establishments, will, if attentively perused, not only amply reward the student, but will impose upon him as deep an obligation for the instruction afforded as Mettray itself can do, since, to speak once more in the words of the Founder of that great Exemplar, "we owe no less to him who points out the shoals, than to him who shows us the right course."

---

ART. IX.—THEATRES AND ACTORS, SINGERS AND MUSICIANS.

1. Report from the Select Committee, on Dramatic Literature, With Minutes of Evidences. Ordered by The House of Commons to be Printed, Second of August, 1832.
2. Some Account of The English Stage, From the Restoration in 1660 to 1830. In Ten Volumes. Bath : 1832.

So far back as the year 1832, a Select Committee of the House of Commons, composed of men, many of them eminent in the literary world, agreed to a report, which commences with the following passage :—

"In examining the state of the Laws affecting the interest and exhibition of the Drama, your Committee find that a considerable decline both in the Literature of the Stage, and the taste of the Public for Theatrical performances is generally conceded."

In this year of grace, 1856, this decline appears to be equally held as an admitted fact, though if the Drama has indeed been continuing to decline since 1832, it is not easy to explain how it has continued to exist at all at this time. The truth, we are disposed to believe, is, that the taste for Dramatic representation has not so much declined as changed its character. The fashion of late dining ; the introduction of cheap literature ; and the now very general plan of country residences, have no doubt all of them contributed to lessen the number of regular frequenters of the Theatre. Nevertheless, burlesques, extravaganzas, and farces, still attract numerous audiences, and what is called the opera, with us in Dublin, is a favorite, because supposed to be a fashionable, resort.

It is not easy to give any rational solution of this Opera rage, as it blazes in its full fury in the great world of London. It certainly had not its origin in a pure musical taste, and love of music, for such are by no means characteristics of the English people. We have no hesitation in stating our belief that more than three-fourths of the title, wealthy, and aristocratic audiences, that assemble nightly in the London opera-houses, are wholly destitute of the smallest musical enthusiasm; and take their places in their stalls and boxes solely from a feeling of devotion to the goddess of fashion.

Young England, indeed, seems to regard the opera merely as a fashionable lounge, which he frequents, because "everybody" goes there; and where he passes such portions of the evening as are not occupied in drawling out the vapid nothing which constitute his idea of conversation, in criticizing with the aid of a "lorgnette," the attractions of the female part of the audience, or in staring superciliously at his humbler neighbours, whose object in coming to such a place, forms as large a subject for wonder and meditation as his little brain can conveniently accommodate. But it is when the musical part of the entertainment to his great relief is over, and the glories of the ballet burst on his vision, that we see awakened within him all the animation of which he is capable or thinks it proper to display. Then an exhibition which is destitute alike of grace, delicacy, and intellect, and which would hardly be tolerated in a barbarous country, is applauded to the echo; and the bounding and curvetting of a bespangled nymph, win warm greetings from an audience before whom the finest efforts of a Garrick or a Kemble, would be displayed in vain.

It will not do to urge as it is daily urged, that the Drama is unsupported, because there exist no great exponents of its beauties. True indeed it is that the days of the Kembles, and of Siddons, of Kean and of Young, are passed away, and that with Macready's retirement has gone out the last great and shining light; but still are left many lesser stars, whose rays now struggling through the obscurity of public indifference, need but a vigorous breath of public favor, to assert their full and native brilliancy, and to illuminate once more the page and spirit of the Drama.

Who that beheld the earnest, eager, yet attentive crowds that thronged night after night, in fair and foul weather, in "summer's heat, and winter's snow," into the Theatres in which Kemble, Kean, and Cooke, were "cleaving the general ear," could have supposed the words of Dr. Johnson's address prophetic when he wrote—

But who the coming changes can presage,
And mark the future periods of the stage?
Perhaps if skill should distant times explore,
New Behns, new D'urseys, yet remain in store;
Perhaps where Lear has raved, and Hamlet died,
On flying cars new sorcerers may ride;
Perhaps, (for who can guess th' effects of chance?)
Here Hunt * may box, or Mahomet † may dance.

We have witnessed in these days Drury Lane Theatre converted into an exhibition of wild beasts, and that exhibition graced by the presence of Royalty, and ceiling-walkers, and rope-dancers, have more than once formed the chief attraction within those walls which once echoed to the noblest utterance of the noblest sentiments that ever were expressed by man. It cannot however be denied that, however pure and strong the public appetite for Dramatic representations may at any time have been, it could not long continue keen if there existed no good actors; but it appears to us that any deficiency in this respect at the present time is the result, and not the cause of the or change of the public taste.

As the supply of all natural productions will in a state of nature generally equal the demand, so in the dramatic world, the supply of good actors would always be full in proportion to the public requirements as indicated by the encouragement extended.

We cannot surely be called on to admit that the world is daily deteriorating in genius and ability, and that the old cry of modern inferiority is based on truth; and not being disposed to admit this, we think that the number of good actors will always depend, as we have before stated, on the public voice and favor.

However great the innate taste and turn of mind may be, which makes a man desire to embrace the profession of an actor, he will only pause in his course before committing himself to its uncertain existence, when he becomes reluctantly convinced that he cannot hope to do much more than earn common subsistence in its pursuit, and that that fame which is the wished for goal of genius, will never be reached by him.

---

A famous boxer on the stage.

† A celebrated rope dancer.

It will be seen that in these few remarks we have considered the Drama, so called, as represented wholly by its serious part, and have not taken into consideration in noting its decline, the position or prospects of the sons and daughters of Thalia.

In truth we think that in those days the latter possess but little distinctive character; the efforts of the best are almost entirely devoted to farce and extravaganza, and the days of the true comedy appear to have gone by. At any time, however, the higher and nobler aim of the Drama was directed through the medium of serious plays—and through lighter productions might occasionally instruct, they were generally calculated (as intended,) simply to amuse.

The preponderance of good comic, over tragic or serious actors in every theatrical company, must have struck every one who has at all considered the subject. This we find especially the case in the present day, when in the persons of Charles Matthews, Alfred Wigan, Buckstone, and Robson, we can point at least to three first rate, each in his line, comedians, for one good tragedian.

With the comic actor a great element of success consists in good animal spirits, gentlemanly manner and address, and a keen sense of humor; he neither requires nor undergoes the patient study, the severe intellectual training, without which success in the tragic actor, is the exception to the general rule.

Whether "Punch," as some think, is to be held answerable for a certain taste to which we are about to allude, or not, we will not undertake to say, but certain it is that the appearance and successful career of that clever publication, brought out an innumerable host of what are termed comic writers, and created an appetite for productions whose only aim was to excite a laugh or at least a smile, if not by either their wit or humor at least by their absurdity. Could our dear Tom Hood have returned to life and seen some of these brochures, how would the current of his genial humor have been chilled, to find the powerful weapons of ridicule wielded by such puny hands. How mean would be his estimate of that wit, whose highest achievement would assist in burlesquing some grave and venerable author, or in making the history of nations a vehicle for wretched puns, and how would he have stigmatized as unworthy of true wit the miserable caricatures of our greatest Dramatist, which men of respectable parts have not been ashamed to write, and actors of no inconsiderable powers to appear in.

The result of this ill directed literature has been that audiences will now-a-days barely tolerate any thing that is not "funny," and will hardly listen with patience to the whole of a serious play, and while the Jew that Shakepeare drew, even respectably played, will be listened to if not with impatience, at least with apathy, Shylock "travestied" will be rapturously received.

This is an evil which will eventually cure itself, and we will dismiss it with the hope that the cure may be as speedy as we are convinced it will be effectual.

We have said that at present there is a paucity of good actors, and assuredly if the Dramatic literature of the country were ten thousand times as varied and extensive as it is, it would soon become a sealed volume to the general public if unillustrated by the genius of the actor. Thus we find Mr. Macready in the report which we have placed at the head of this article, and from which we have extracted, replying as follows to the question:—

"Are the tragedies of Racine the most attractive of the Théâtre François?"

"Not now, because Talma is no more."

"Generally speaking, have you not understood that Racine did not attract great audiences in the Théâtre François?"

"It was generally understood that the chef d'œuvres of Talma were attractive."

"Then was it Talma or Racine that drew houses?"

"Both, I should imagine."*

We are not sanguine enough to expect ever again to see so many actors of the first merit performing at the same time, as did our fathers some fifty years ago, when John Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, Edmund Kean, and George Frederick Cooke, formed a constellation in the dramatic heavens. Macready we look upon as "ultimus Romanorum," for though not as an eminent actor contemporary with any of these great names, he was the only actor in late years who approached their excellence.

There is hardly any art in which criticism is so various and conflicting as in the histrionic, but saving certain minor differences of opinion of his merits in certain parts, the world is pretty well agreed in giving Mr. Macready a high place. His Macbeth was indeed the realization of the poet's fancy.

From first to last he was indeed the Royal Thane. In look, in voice, in gesture, he was from time to time the ambitious chief, the treacherous host, the ruthless murderer, the haughty sovereign, the daring soldier. Whatever objections may have been justly urged against his style of acting, that it was stiff and clogged with mannerisms, the marks of a cultivated mind and of earnest study were always apparent; not apparent as detracting from the illusory effect, but apparent to the attentive observer who had himself studied the part and formed his own idea of the true mode of delineation. In Virginius, in Cardinal Richelieu, in Lear, in Iago, and in Werner, Macready had no rival, and even the merit of his acting was almost eclipsed by his fine, judicious, and tasteful revival of many of Shakespeare's plays and of other dramatic productions which had undeservedly fallen into oblivion. How those revivals contrast with others of a more modern date many of our readers fully feel. The very play bills printed under Mr. Macready's directions were simple announcements of the performances and performers, unadorned, or rather not disfigured, with elaborate descriptions of the scenes to be presented, and glowing promises of gratification to the audience which should assemble. With a determination honorable in the highest degree to his private character and principles Mr. Macready, in spite of all opposition, suppressed both at Covent Garden, and subsequently at Drury-lane, the nuisance of the sa- loons, which had hitherto been looked upon as an essential element in managerial success. Well aware of the fact that one good actor amongst an indifferent company only adds to the sense of disappointment which must be experienced at each representation, Mr. Macready's first step was to bring about him a really good company, and accordingly we find at Covent Garden Theatre, "Othello" produced with the following cast, in Nov., 1838.

Othello	...	...	Mr. J. Vandenhoff
Iago	...	...	Mr. Macready
Cassio	...	...	Mr. Anderson
Emilia	...	...	Mrs. Warner
Desdemona	...	...	Miss Helen Faucit

Mr. Macready's self-denial, which here places him in the second character, was still more fully exemplified at Drury Lane, where he subsequently appeared as Friar Lawrence, a fourth-rate character.

It was at Drury Lane Theatre that Macready revived with great beauty and exquisite taste, Handel's "Acis and Galatea"—

Polyphemus ....	H. Philipps		Acis	... Miss J. Horton
Shepherd ...	R. Allen		Galatea ...	Miss E. Romer

and refuted the common opinion that the "serenata" is not suited for theatrical representation.

In the whole course of Mr. Macready's management, at Covent Garden and at Drury Lane there were displayed the same consummate taste, the same judicious skill, and the same self abnegation which proved so plainly his real devotion to the neglected cause of the Drama. Though we, in common with the public, must regret his retirement from the stage, we cannot but rejoice that he has retired while health and years are left him for the enjoyment of his well won fortune, carrying with him the highest reputation as an actor, and an unblemished character as a man.

Irish soil has always been prolific in the production of eminent actors, and not the least it has produced is a native of Dublin, Mr. Gustavus Brooke.

Since Macready's retirement Mr. Brooke must be acknowledged as the first actor on the stage, superior to all others in most parts and transcendently beyond them, in some. His Othello is wholly unapproachable by any living actor, and we doubt if there was ever a finer portrait represented of the Moor.

The effect is heightened by the advantages of a sonorous voice, a handsome and expressive countenance, and a good carriage and figure. His exculpatory speech in Othello is the embodiment of manly truth and open candour, and the gradual change from confiding trustfulness to dark jealous suspicion, is finely marked in Mr Brooke's representation. In the scene in which by Iago's art, Cassio has become intoxicated and fights with Montano, and the gates suddenly open and Othello appears, Mr. Brooke with his scimitar in hand looks as if a cubit had been added to his height, and as if with one blow of his crooked sword he could annihilate Cassio and the rest. The expression of his flaming eyes gleaming from his dusky skin is terrible, and the broken yet firm tone in which he addresses Cassio, "Cassio, I love thee, but never more be officer of mine," are finely expressive of the struggle of duty with affection.

But it is in the latter scenes that Mr. Brooke's chief excellence is shown. Then the workings of his countenance are painfully true to nature; at one moment with fury in his eyes, and tortured to madness by Iago's insinuations, he seizes him by the throat, and threatens him with frightful vengeance if he fails to establish Desdemona's guilt; at another he implores him in heartbroken tones to shew him the worst at once, to satisfy his suspicions, and end the frightful state of suspense; and when at last convinced, as he thinks, of his wife's infidelity, how forcibly does he realize the outraged feelings of the husband, who having loved with all the ardor of his African origin, now hates with equal intensity. Mr. Brooke's Sir Giles Overreach is also a performance of great power and genius, and his Shylock and Richelieu are full of originality and vigour.

America has not as yet produced as many actors of genius as might have been expected in a country where people possess a good deal of dramatic taste. One only has appeared in these countries whose talents appear above the common. Mr Forrest's King Lear is certainly a great success. His making up, to use a theatrical phrase, is excellent, and the palsy of age which agitates his limbs is simulated with wonderful skill. In the scene in which he pronounces the awful curse upon his undutiful daughter, Goneril, Mr. Forrest seemed at first bewildered, and as if doubtful of his hearing, and when at last convinced of the reality of her rebellion, he sank upon his knees and with upraised trembling hands, and streaming hoary locks, but with thrilling voice and accent, invoked the most awful denunciation which ever issued from mortal lips, in a manner which curdled the blood in the veins of the listeners.

In no part of the play, even when his senses having forsaken him, he sits on the ground, discoursing with Mad Tom, did Mr. Forrest allow his audience to forget that he was still a king, nor forfeit one jot of the true kingly dignity; and when asserting that dignity in reply to Gloster, he throws off for an instant the burthen of years which had bent his shoulders and bowed his head, and drawing himself up to his full majestic height, with what glorious state did he pronounce the words, "Aye, every inch a king!"

If it be true that a good name is in itself a possession, Mr. Charles Kean is rich by the reflection of a great name. We cannot help thinking that if Edmund Kean had never trod the stage, though Charles might have been an actor, he would hardly have been the Charles Kean of the present day. We are told that he but vainly tries the player's province, who wants deportment, voice and eye. In two of these requisites at least Mr. Kean is sadly deficient, and though he certainly possesses a brilliant eye, this hardly suffices to make a great actor, and it certainly has not made a great actor of Mr. Charles Kean.

We do not even think that as an illustrator and reviver he has achieved any great success. Gorgeous scenery, splendid costumes, and classical and correct paraphernalia, may please the eye and even win the qualified praise of the critic; but unenlivened by the breath of genius, the whole is flat, stale and unprofitable, a splendid pageant indeed, but nothing more.

We have heard with surprise and not unmingled with regret, the prevalent rumor that the Queen contemplates conferring the honor of knighthood on Mr. Kean. We say we have heard this rumor with regret, because we believe that Mr. Kean, whatever his merits as an actor, is an estimable and worthy private character, and we would not wish to see him made ridiculous by any such proceeding.

Those, certainly, we cannot consider Mr. Kean's best friends who urge his claims to this distinction. Such a course can but lead to an examination of Mr. Kean's histrionic powers, and a comparison of these powers with those of other actors, such as can hardly prove flattering to Mr. Kean if impartially instituted.

If Mr. Kean can found no claim to be distinguished in this way, upon his professional merits, the excellence of his domestic and private character can furnish none. Were they allowed to do so, every supernumerary in his company whose life and manners are irreproachable would be a candidate for knightly honors, and unless it can be shown that Mr. Kean stands immeasurably above every other actor of the day in ability and genius, or that at least he has rendered some peculiar and extraordinary service to the Drama of the country, it would be an insult and a slight to every man of his profession whom the world acknowledges as his superior, and those are not a few, so to distinguish him.

So far from being averse to the conferring of distinctions on men of genius and intellect, we think that such distinctions are bestowed far too charily and niggardly in these countries, in which the possession of wealth generally constitutes the strongest claim to honor and respect; but in proportion as they are more scantily bestowed, they will probably be prized, and, on this account, the claim of the recipient should be established beyond the reach of cavil or dispute.

Again we say we have the greatest respect for Mr. Kean as a gentleman and member of society, and wish him the fullest measure of suitable reward, but we must lose every inkling of taste and judgment before we can consent to place him in the highest rank as an actor, or to confer a distinction upon him as such, which would be a tacit slight on men whom we must always consider as infinitely his superiors.

With regard to the actresses who at present grace our boards, we shall not be guilty of the ungallant assertion that we like none of them, but we will go so far as to say that, since the death of Mrs. Warner, we have not seen an actress on the stage who can play Lady Macbeth as we think it should be played. Miss Charlotte Cushman comes nearest to our notion of this character; but we will not pause to state in how many ways she disappoints us. This lady's performance of "Meg Merrilies," in "Guy Mannering," is a wonderful specimen of physical power and force, but her frequent assumption of such characters as Ion and Romeo associates her name in our ideas rather with a masculine than feminine character.

Those who think that consummate art and skill, joined with judgment and taste, form a first rate actress, will always be warm admirers of Miss Helen Faucit; but for ourselves we think that one flash of brilliant genius, one touch of nature, is worth all that art, and study, and careful training can effect. Well studied glances, skilful modulations of voice, "wreathed smiles," and graceful movements, must please the ear and eye; but to touch the heart, to open up and to set flowing the secret springs of thought and feeling, something more is needed, and, for us at least, that something is wanting in Miss Helen Faucit.

Nevertheless, and bating a little, we had almost said, affectation, Miss Faucit's "Rosalind," and her "Julia," in the “Hunchback,” are performances of great skill, and we cannot wonder that she has enlisted among her admirers many persons of intellect and taste.

Every play-goer has had reason, from time to time, to complain of the great deficiency, at almost every theatre, of even tolerable actors to support the leading performers. This no doubt, may be in part owing to the personal vanity which is said to be a marked characteristic of the Thespian body, and which induces an actor whose talents rise in the least degree beyond those of his companions, to disdain a position at all subordinate, and to prefer leading in the smallest and meanest to following in the largest and most magnificent theatre. This, as we have said, may be partly the cause of this great defect; but may not something also be due to the enormous salaries demanded and paid to leading performers, which drain the treasury of the principal part of its contents, and leaves but a scanty provision for the numerous auxiliaries.

We will not yield to any person in our desire to reward amply, and even generously, the exertions of genius, not alone with praise, but with more sterling payment; but we know that, some fifty years ago, men whose compeers the world has yet to see, were content with salaries from which the “stars” of modern days would turn with contempt. Thus we find manager, in receipt of	...	£56	14s.	0d.	per week.

John Philip Kemble, as actor and

Geo. Frederick Cooke	...	20	0	0	„
John Johnstone	...	14	0	0	„
Charles Quick	...	14	0	0	„
J. Fawcett	...	14	0	0	„
J. S. Munden	...	14	0	0	„
Charles Bannister	...	18	0	0	„

Contrast these with

Mrs. Nisbett receiving	...	50	0	0	per night.
Mrs. F. A. Butler	...	40	0	0	„
Miss Ellen Tree	...	25	0	0	„
Tyrone Power	...	120	0	0	per week.
W. C. Macready	...	100	0	0	„
Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean	...	80	0	0	„

It is plain that demands such as salaries like these, must entail upon the manager's funds the necessity of strict economy in the payment of the less attractive, though more permanently useful, members of the theatrical corps, and the reduction of their salaries to so low a scale as must inevitably induce them to seek some smaller space, where the diminutive stature of their fellow actors may exalt their own height to that of giants.

Again, we cannot help thinking that some portion of the existence of this abuse has had its origin in the diseased Italian opera mania. The incredible sums paid to foreign singers, naturally excited the hopes and desires of British actors, who fairly enough considered that they had as good a claim upon the gullibility of their countrymen, as people of another nation. But they have been forced after all to follow at a respectful distance, and they have received from the managers, as the managers have received from the public, a very different rate of payment from that which characterizes Italian singers and Italian opera-houses. While the prices of admission to the ordinary theatres have never risen to extravagance, those of the opera-houses have reached an almost fabulous height: many of the double boxes on the grand tier of Her Majesty's theatre have cost £8000; in April, 1847, £4000 was paid for one on the pit tier. From £300 to £500 a year for a box, or £40 for a stall, entitled the tenant to admission on but two nights, Tuesdays, and Saturdays, in each week.

When we reflect that these enormous sums are lavished on foreigners, whose insolence, and contempt of those on whom they grow rich, are only equalled by the folly of their patrons, we can hardly restrain our indignation. Genius and intellect, the fancy of the dramatist and the realization of the actor, the winged thoughts and words that burn, pronounced with all the grace and beauty that can lend another charm to the creations of the poet, are alike unheeded and contemned: and, where our forefathers would have knelt and worshipped, we, in our modern refinement, pass without a reverence.

And oh! wives and daughters of English aristocracy, is all your boasted modesty, all your vaunted purity, but a mask and a pretence? Will you turn with loathing eyes from the wretched victim of vice, when you pass her in the public way, and yet gaze with ardent glance upon her representative, when decked in histrionic garb she glides before you, the "Traviata" of the Italian opera.

Raze, ye guardians of the public morals, with the strong arm of the law, raze to the ground those petty haunts of crime and sin, in which the young outcast learns his nightly lesson of immorality and theft ; approach even the temple, or that which ought to be the temple of the drama, and watch with lynx-eyed vigilance every movement within its walls ; and if, in spite of licensers and censors, vice shall dare to teach her lessons on its stage, drive out its occupants, and close its doors, and boast, with sweet complacency, how carefully a paternal government guards the purity of England's humbler sons and daughters.

But stay your progress here, and presume not to invade the hallowed precincts of that august dwelling in which fashion holds her court ; dare not to censure that which Royalty stamps with its approval ; retire—ere even your accustomed eyes and ears be shocked to see and hear the prurient things that here are gazed upon without aversion, and heard without a blush. Well has one who soon will rise and push from their stools many a more pretentious bard, well and strongly, but not too strongly, has he sung—

Just now, the flower of England made a crown,
To garland whoredom's apotheosis ;
Revelling in unhallowed light of eyes
Upon the wanton's glance and wicked grace,
All honeyed with warm witchery of sin ;
Circe-encharmed with lewd sorceries
That slide into the whitest sanctuaries ;
Befoul the palace chambers, precious-lined,
And canker all the virgin flower of life,
I'the delicate sweetness of its budding time !*

In the face of every discouraging fact, we have consolation in the belief that the taste of the middle classes is not yet wholly vitiated. They are fortunately restrained by pecuniary considerations from imitating the follies of the higher orders, and, saving that inordinate love for merely "funny" entertainments, to which we have before alluded, they possess a great deal of sound judgment, and of due appreciation of sterling merit. It needs but little to bring them back to the right course, and we think there is hope that, in time, the little will be accomplished. We have been often struck by the number, respectability, and apparent intelligence and taste of those who frequent such of the public concerts at which good music is afforded at a moderate price.

---

* "Craigcrook Castle," by Gerald Massy, page 19.

The favor with which such entertainments are received is an omen of great promise and hope, that by degrees the taste of the middle classes will assert its own purity, and insist on providing for itself amusements which will combine intellect and "mind" with mere relaxation.

We often, however, see the wholesome influence of entertainments, such as the concerts we have alluded to, greatly lessened by the injudicious selection of the music. We shall, doubtless, be highly pleased, if the time ever arrives when the great body of the public will take unmixed delight in listening to what is commonly called classical music, and will have learned to appreciate all the beauties of more elaborate compositions; but this effect, if ever arrived at, must be reached by degrees, and we are in danger of disgusting many altogether by placing before them at the first, what is above their comprehension.

Our first effort must be to generate a pure taste, and we will effect this most readily and effectually by first touching the heart and engaging the affections; such music, then, as appeals to every heart, and makes every bosom throb with sympathy, sung rather with pathos and feeling than with science, is first to be provided. We have often amused ourselves with sketching in our mind a series of programmes for public concerts to be given in every large city at stated periods of the year, for which the best singers, who could be engaged on terms commensurate with a moderate scale of prices for admission, should be engaged.

Instead of long Italian scenas we would desire to have English ballads, of which the stock is abundantly large to supply, without undue repetition, at least a dozen of these concerts, which, to gain the desired end, and prevent advantage being taken for private gain of the public favor, should be under, to some extent at least, the control and patronage of the city authorities.

If in addition to merely giving in the programmes the titles of the songs and the names of the writers and composers, (a matter very often most erroneously arranged), a short memoir of each of the latter were subjoined, in the way we are about to suggest, a vast amount of information in a simple form would be conveyed to the audiences, many of whom on their return home would be set enquiring and reading about these writers and composers, and anxious again to hear more of their productions. This scheme may be deemed, and perhaps is, Utopian, but we can hardly convey sufficiently strongly our sense of its advantage; and while schemes for popular education are so rife, it would at least furnish one, by which some knowledge, not altogether useless, would be conveyed in a pleasing form, and, hardly less important, a pure musical taste would become widely diffused. We will then suppose an efficient band, and a set of singers consisting of a soprano, or two, a pair of tenors, and one or two basses, and if easily procurable, a counter tenor and contralto would be found an acquisition for harmonized pieces, and we would suggest a programme something in the following form:—

PART THE FIRST.

Overture—Masaniello—Auber.

(Short account of the Composer and his principal works).

Song—Where the Bee Sucks—Written by Shakespeare, composed by Dr. Arne.

(A short account of Shakespeare's songs as scattered through his plays, and Memoir of Dr. Arne as before).

Glee—Sleep, Gentle Lady—Written by J. R. Planché, composed by Sir Henry Bishop (Memoir as before).

Song—Bonnie Dundee—Scotch Ballad.

Duett—Love in thine Eyes—Composed by William Jackson (Exeter).

(Memoir).

Song—The Last Man—Written by Thomas Campbell, Composed by William H. Cullcott.

(Memoir).

Trio—O Lady Fair!—Written and Composed by Thomas Moore.

(Memoir).

PART THE SECOND.

Overture—William Tell—Rossini.

(A short account of the Composer, and of his principal works, and in particular of William Tell.)

Duett—Tell me where is Fancy bred—Written by Shakespeare, Composed by Sir John Stevenson.

(Memoir).

Song—The Thorn—Ascribed to Robert Burns, Composed by William Shield.

(Memoir).

Glee—Sigh no more Ladies—Words by Shakespeare, Composed by Steevens.

(Memoir).

Song—The Banks of Allan water—Written by M. G. Lewis, Composed by Mrs. Bland.

(Memoir).

Duett—The Convent Bell—Written and Composed by Dibdin; from the farce of The Padlock.

(Memoir).

Song—The White Squall—Written by A. Johns, Composed by George Barker.

Song and Chorus—Rule Britannia—Written by James Thomson, Composed by Dr. Arne.

(Memoir).

We have here a selection of music, for only two pieces of which, and those instrumental, we are indebted to foreign composers, and which selection we will venture to say will afford unmixed delight to any audience, save to that part which may consist of those affected dilettanti, who would pronounce it vulgar, and who pretend to think nothing worth listening to, except Italian and German music.

Owing to the too frequent culpable omission, in the performance of Shakspeare's plays, of the songs therein introduced, many of those whom we would wish should form a part of our imaginary audience, would be surprised to hear of Shakspeare's songs, and would be still more surprised to hear how exquisitely those songs have been set to music by different hands. In fact, several concerts could be given of music consisting solely of Shakspeare's songs. In addition to those we have inserted in our programme, we need only mention Dr. Arne's music to "Under the Greenwood Tree," "Blow, blow, thou Winter Wind," and "When daisies pied;" Dr. Cooke's "Hark the Lark," Shield's "O Happy Fair," Sir Henry Bishop's exquisite "Come o'er the Brook, Bessie," Purcell's "Come unto those Yellow Sands," and "Full Fathom Five."

We cannot account for the apparent disinclination manifested by many of our singers, to sing English music even at concerts, at which they must be well aware, the audience is comprised of that class which would most appreciate the simple touching ballad, in which English music is so rich. Mr.

Sims Reeves, indeed, is a great and glorious exception to this rule. Possessing one of the finest voices that has been heard in Great Britain these many years, he appears to take a becoming and creditable pride in exerting that voice in the illustration of the music of his native country, and we are satisfied that the attention and delight with which he is heard on those occasions, forms no small part of his reward. No living singer can at all approach the excellence of his "Death of Nelson," "Bay of Biscay," "Come if you Dare," and "Pretty Jane;" this last, one of the sweetest compositions of the sweetest of English composers: he has indeed but just gone from amongst us, and whatever may have been the errors of his life, we have no concern with any thing but his reputation as a composer of truly English character, a reputation that will endure, as long as taste shall guide or beauty charm.

The comfort and convenience of the public, with reference to position and seeing and hearing with ease, appear to have been always too little regarded in our theatres. However attractive the performance, it is not likely that a man who has sat out that performance in painful constriction, with strained and twisted neck and unsupported back, will be in a very favorable mood for returning on another night. He will certainly prefer his book and fireside to the most tempting bill of fare, submitted under such circumstances. As in every thing else, a judicious medium in the size of our theatres ought to be observed, and were this and a due regard to ventilation more studied, we should neither shiver in the vast desert of the large nor broil in the heated atmosphere of the little theatre. The great objection to a very large theatre lies in the necessity which its size entails upon the actor of straining his voice, in order to cause it to be distinctly heard, and it is obvious how much this must interfere with the finest efforts of tone and modulation, the quick whisper, the hurried question the suppressed emotion. Considering, too, the economical style of lighting adopted in general in our theatres, it is manifest that the occupant of the upper or middle galleries, or even of the upper boxes, especially of the back seats in these, must, from sheer distance, be unable to distinguish accurately the faces of the performers: certainly not sufficiently to enable him to catch those workings of the countenance, those nice shades of expression, which often constitute the most eloquent parts of speech. In the small theatre, on the other hand, the audience is in danger of seeing and hearing too much, and of having the illusion of the scene sometimes rudely dispelled, by Dick's more energetic than polite adjuration to Tom, his brother scene-shifter behind, or by the prompter's suggestive hint. The "making up" of the faces of the different performers is also subjected to too near a scrutiny, and the old man's wrinkles, and the young ladies' roses, betray their artificial origin; the splendor of the decorations and dresses fades into their original foil and tinsel, and the stage is reduced to the level of a fair booth or show. After having visited more than once every theatre in London, it is a source of some gratification and pride to us to be able to say with truth that we did not find one of them superior in any respect (save splendor of decoration) to our own in Hawkins' Street. There are some respects indeed in which the most pretentious of the London theatres cannot, for an instant, be compared with it, and one very important matter, is that of common civility from the attendants.

As most of our readers are aware, the first enquiry made of a visitor to the boxes of the London theatres, by the box opener, is "do you want a bill?" This appears no doubt a civil and indeed attentive enquiry at first sight, and many a "green stranger" replies, with bland courtesy and thanks for the attention, that he is supplied, and appends to his reply, a request to be introduced into a box. Marvellous to relate, the boxes which up to this moment presented a beggarly account of empty rows, suddenly become occupied, if not bodily, at least in the mind's eye of the opener, with an array of visitors, and he really has not a seat disengaged, "except in a fourth or fifth row." Our bucolic friend, amazed and silenced but hardly convinced, sinks into the retired position assigned to him, whence during the evening, he vainly tries to obtain a distinct view of either audience or actors, and returns home breathing many a vow to be earlier in the field the next time he goes to the play.

As a reverse of this picture we will suppose the enquiry as to the Bill, answered in the affirmative, and either through sad experience of the dire necessity, or as aforesaid, in innocent simplicity, a shilling tendered in payment. The coin is speedily consigned to its proper depository, by the now nimble attendant, in whom on this occasion, paradoxically, though changed, we find "no change," and who springs with alacrity to the door of the best box and ushers the visitor, with many a banging flap of the seats, into the front row, where, if of a bashful disposition, he seats himself hastily, conscious of the observant eyes of the pit, and presently perhaps, in his confusion, applies to his glowing countenance, in lieu of his pocket-handkerchief, the very bill which has been his passport, and streaks his face in every direction with the fresh ink.

Certainly we manage these things better in Dublin, where to secure the possession of a particular seat, it must really and bonâ fide be previously engaged, and a voucher obtained, a corresponding voucher being pinned or fastened to the seat bespoken. No person who is unable to produce the voucher will be permitted to take possession of the seat, but the privilege only lasts till the conclusion of the first act, after which every person is equally entitled to accommodation.

We have seen this pretext of all the good seats being engaged, made the means of extorting many shillings and sixpences in the upper boxes of Drury-lane Theatre, by a liveried ruffian (we feel constrained to use the word) who by his insolence and gross rudeness to even the female part of the visitors, nearly roused our Irish blood into knocking him down. True, the audience in the upper boxes at the time we speak of were not of the "gentlest blood," but they were respectable and well conducted, and were as fully entitled to politeness and attention from the servants of the Theatre as the highest in the land.—How such a state of things is suffered to exist, when its suppression is so easy, amazes us beyond measure.

The size of our Dublin Theatre Royal is we think convenient and suitable, and its construction admirably adapted to give every person in the audience a good view of the stage. Drury lane Theatre measures 61 feet from the curtain to the front of the boxes, and 50 feet across the pit; Covent Garden nearly the same; the Haymarket 47 feet and 35 feet in depth and breadth respectively; and Hawkins'-street 52 feet 6 inches from curtain to boxes, and 45 feet across the pit. In addition to its being well lighted and tolerably well ventilated, it has always been remarkable for the possession of a well trained and skilful band, which at no time was more deserving of commendation than under its present efficient and intelligent leader. Would that we could hope to see again in Dublin, the good old days of Crow-street, when the doors were besieged by an impatient crowd, half-an-hour before their opening, and when people frequented the Theatre from a pure love of Dramatic performances—but these days have departed hardly to come again, and with them have departed many a genial spirit, many a warm heart, which in the coldness of our modern atmosphere would soon have chilled and waned :—Heigh ho !

“ the hands of old gave hearts,
But our new heraldry is, hands not hearts.”

We have always thought that elaborate defences of the stage have been in a great measure thrown away ; for our own part we have met so very rarely with any objector to whom we could fairly assign conscientious motives, that we long ago resolved never to give the slightest reply to any of “these puritanical knaves,” on whose imperious obstinacy, argument and reason are but wasted. To urge upon them that due relaxation is as necessary to our souls and bodies as study and labor, and that theatrical amusements are as elevating and improving a mode of relaxation, as any that can be adopted, is as nothing ; for according to these wiseacres, as long as a man can find better employment he has no right to visit a theatre, which are hotbeds of vice and profanity. At first they declaim vehemently against the immorality and obscenity of plays, until stopped by an enquiry of how this knowledge can have been acquired by persons who have, according to their own accounts, never either seen a play performed, or read any save in perhaps a Family Shakespeare. Then they shift their ground, and say that the danger of the theatre lies in the temptations to which the visitor is exposed among the audience, forgetful that this objection would be equally applicable to any public amusement. The truth is, this hostility to theatrical performances, which is often most virulent in men of very indifferent character, is a remnant of the old puritanism, which everybody now admits to have been constituted three-fourth part of hypocrisy ; and though we would not deal so severely with these declaimers against an innocent and intellectual amusement as did the authorities of old with Mr. Prynne, we think that they would be but properly punished by being for ever debarred from pleasant social intercourse, and doomed to spend every evening in the year in sole company with those instructive and serious works, which they delight to recommend to the perusal of their neighbours.

Though, however, we can listen with patience, and sometimes even with complacency, to the outpourings of these "vessels," when their attacks are directed against theatrical performances only, we confess we cannot exercise an equal equanimity, when they turn the vials of their wrath upon the heads of the performers.

Of these, they will admit no woman virtuous and no man honest ; and with a charity admirably consonant with the principles of their peculiar faith, they consign them all alike to abhorrence and contempt in this world, and perdition in the next.

We who know this profession well, can afford to pity the victims of this rabid intolerance, which hurts no body but those who are possessed with its evil spirit. Well and truly can we tell of virtue to be found among the children of Thespis, which would adorn the character of the best and purest in the land ; of filial duty, of noble sacrifice for needy parents and helpless little ones, of heroic virtue struggling with temptation, of charity open as the day, of firm friendship, of liberal generosity, of stainless honor. But we do not write in the attempted fulfilment of the hopeless task of converting fanatics, whom we are content to dismiss with the expression of our hope, that they may never become worse characters than many of those whom they proscribe and censure.

There is no mode of life under the sun so filled with varied vicissitudes of fortune as that of the actor. From the cradle to the grave, the life of the actor, born of actor parents, is a scene for ever shifting. The grave—awful word!—in spite of all that philosophy, and more, of all that religion teaches, it is a word we cannot lightly utter. Awful, when with solemn thoughts and solemn aspect we speak of its approach, but how intensely awful when we breathe it amidst the glare and glitter of the crowded assembly, and with its single but portentous name, hush with a trembling chill the buzz of conversation and the sound of laughter. And yet, not alone its name but its dread reality has more than once broken in upon the midst of an audience "sitting at a play," and frozen the warm blood in the veins of every spectator. And strange, it was beheld not in the person of one of those same spectators, not in that of an actor merely assisting on the stage, but in that of him who at the very moment occupied, in speaking, the general attention, and stranger yet, who occupied that attention in pronouncing words of all others most suitable to the arrival of the awful visitant.

On the 2th of August, 1798, John Palmer, then an actor of eminence, was performing at Liverpool, and on the morning of this day, on which he was to have played the Stranger, he received the news of the death of his second son, a circumstance which naturally deeply affected him.

He appeared however in the character announced. In the fourth act Baron Steinfort obtains an interview with the Stranger, and having discovered in him an old friend, he prevails upon him to relate the cause of his seclusion from the world. The Stranger in his reply speaks of his wife and children, an allusion that must of course have awakened the most painful feelings in Mr. Palmer's mind, and at the moment when he had uttered the words, "there is another and a better world," he sunk upon the stage a corpse.

In October, 1758, Joseph Peterson, an actor of some position, was performing the part of the Duke in "Measure for Measure," and in the third act he comes disguised as a friar to prepare Claudio for execution. As he pronounced these words—

" ——— Reason thus with life :
If I do lose thee, I do lose a thing
That none but fools would keep ; a breath thou art"—

he dropped into the arms of "Claudio" and never spoke again.

On the evening of the 20th of June, 1817, "Jane Shore" was performed at the Leeds' Theatre, a Mr. Cummins enacting the part of Dumont.

Having, in this character, uttered the words

" Be witness for me, ye celestial hosts,
Such mercy and such pardon as my soul
Accords to thee, and begs of Heaven to show thee, May such befall me at my latest hour," he fell down and instantly expired.

We must try to smile now at a comical playbill which would in these days form an excellent satire on the absurdity of those flaming announcements which so often meet the eye, and in which the nightly ecstasy of the audience, and the splendor and interests of the performances, are described in glowing language. Such even are hardly as contemptible as the more ambitious of the class, in which the characters and general history of some grand revival are described in passages culled from a classical dictionary, interspersed with blunders which serve as a commentary on the text.

For our parts we never thank the management for this elaborate effort, preferring when ignorant or enquiring, to satisfy ourselves by personal research, and considering that a playbill will sufficiently serve its purpose, by giving us the name of the play and its author, and of the characters and performers.

BILL OF KILKENNY THEATRE ROYAL.

By his Majesty's Company of Comedians.

(The last night, because the Company go to-morrow to Waterford.)

On Saturday, May 14, 1793,

Will be performed, by command of several respectable people in this learned metropolis, for the benefit of Mr. KEARNS,

THE TRAGEDY OF HAMLET.

Originally written and composed by the celebrated Dan. Hayes of Limerick, and inserted in Shakspeare's works.

Hamlet by Mr. Kearns, (being his first appearance in that character) who, between the acts, will perform several solos on the patent bag-pipes, which play two tunes at the same time.

Ophelia by Mrs. Prior, who will introduce several favourite airs in character, particularly "The Lass of Richmond Hill," and "We'll all be unhappy together," from the Reverend Mr. Dibdin's Oddities.

The parts of the King and Queen, by direction of the Rev. Father O'Callaghan, will be omitted, as too immoral for any stage.

Polonius, the comical politician, by a young gentleman, being his first appearance in public.

The Ghost, The Grave digger, and Laertes, by Mr. Sampson, the great London comedian.

The characters to be dressed in Roman shapes.

To which will be added, an Interlude, in which will be introduced several slight-of-hand tricks, by the celebrated surveyor Hurt.

The whole to conclude with the Farce of

MAHOMET THE IMPOSTOR.

Mahomet by Mr. Kearns.

Tickets to be had of Mr. Kearns, at the sign of the Goat's Beard, in Castle Street.

*.* The value of the tickets, as usual, will be taken, (if required) in candles, bacon, soap, butter, cheese, &c., as Mr Kearns wishes, in every particular, to accommodate the public.

N. B.—No person whatsoever will be admitted into the boxes without shoes or stockings.

Every playgoer must have had occasion to remark and deprecate the want of earnestness, displayed by even respectable actors, when addressing or listening to their brother performers on the stage. It is astonishing how much this carelessness detracts from the effect of the performance, and still more astonishing that a defect so easily cured should be so general.

In common every-day conversation a man addressing another looks him in the face, and expresses by his countenance that he is more or less in earnest; but we frequently see an actor who is delivering an energetic and impressive speech addressed to another, glancing all the time at boxes or pit, looking anywhere, in fine, except in the proper direction.

Garrick took occasion to reprove this want of earnestness in an actress, who had been highly recommended to him, at a rehearsal of "Venice Preserved," in which she was to make her debut in Belvidera. She repeated the exclamation, "would you kill my father, Jaffier?" with so much sang froid, that Garrick, provoked at her coldness, whispered in her ear, and pretty much in the same tone, "can you chop cabbage, madam?" When we reflect that the great secret of success in every profession and undertaking is to be thoroughly in earnest, we can appreciate Garrick's annoyance on this occasion.

Were we to continue relating anecdotes of actors and of acting, we could fill a larger volume than that in which this paper appears, but our task draws to a close, and we must conclude these crude and ill-arranged remarks. The subject is one on which, however, we love to enlarge, and is one of deeper interest to the community than unthinking persons would be disposed to imagine. One day we trust, however, to see the influence of the drama upon the tastes and manners of the people properly recognised, to see men of genius writing for the stage, men of genius acting in those plays, and men of taste and judgment superintending their production. The drama will be then what it should ever be, the softener of manners, the refiner of taste, and the elevator of morals. The actor will be then esteemed as well as admired, the honored friend as well as the public favorite; living respected, and dying regretted, he shall earn for his grave and deserve to have recorded on his tomb,

Tread lightly on his ashes, ye men of genius, for he was your kinsman;
Weed his grave clean, ye men of virtue, for he was your brother.

We have written at some length upon the entertainment which should be afforded at our cheap Concerts; it may be interesting here to consider the prices formerly paid for admission to our theatrical establishments. The cost of admission to the theatres in the days of Elizabeth was very moderate. "Let me never live to look so high as the two-penny room again," says Ben Jonson, in the prologue to "Every Man out of His Humour," acted for the first time at the Globe, on Bankside, in 1599. The price of the "best rooms," or boxes, was a shilling; of the lower places twopence; and, in some places, only a penny. The twopenny room, mentioned above, was the gallery. Thus Decker: "Pay your twopence to a player, and you may sit in the gallery."—Belman's Night Walk. And Middleton: "One of them is a nip; I took him once in the twopenny gallery, at the Fortune." The place, however, seems to have been very discreditable, for it is commonly described as the resort of pick-pockets and prostitutes. In "Every Man out of His Humour," we have also mention of "the lords' room over the stage." The lords' rooms answered to the present stage boxes. The price of admission to them appears to have been originally a shilling. Thus Decker, in his Gul's Hornbook, 1609; "At a new play you take up the twelve-penny room, next the stage, because the lords and you may seem to be hail, fellow, well met."

Some of the customs which prevailed in the Theatres, in the days of our forefathers, are worthy of being noticed. The audiences, it seems, were less patient than those of the present day; for numerous methods were devised, to wile away the tedious hour, previous to the commencement of the performance. Books and cards, as well as nuts and apples, bottled ale and tobacco, were placed in requisition by the varying tastes of the motley assemblage; and even the women took a share in these unfeminine enjoyments. "In the playhouses at London," says Prynne, "they offer them (the women) the tobacco-pipe, which was then (to the ancient Romans) unknown."

Play-bills were very early in use; on the stationers' books is the following entry:—"Oct. 1587, John Charlewoode, licensed to him by the whole consent of the assistants, the only ymprinting of all manner of bills for players, provided that if any trouble arise hereby, then Charlewoode to bear the charge." These play-bills were then affixed to the numerous posts which formerly encumbered the streets of the metropolis; and hence the phrase, "posting bills," which is still retained. The following "merry jeast," on this subject, is related by Taylor, the Water Poet: "Master Field, the player, riding up Fleet Street, at a great pace, a gentleman called him, and asked him, what play was played that day? He, being angry to be stayed on so frivolous a demand, answered, that he might see what play was to be played, on every post. 'I cry you mercy,' said the gentleman; 'I took you for a post, you rode so fast.' "

It appears, that the name of the play to be acted was usually printed without any list of characters, or of the actors who were to personate them. The following poetical description, given by a contemporary writer, of a play-bill of those days, bears a considerable resemblance, in its style, to the whimsical and bombast titles prefixed to the early editions of the Plays of Shakespeare, and the other dramatists of his age:—

"Pr'ythee, what's the Play?
(The first I visited this twelvemonth day.)
They say, 'a new invented Play of Purle,
That jeopard'd his neck to steal a girl
Of twelve; that lying fast impounded for't,
Has hither sent his beard to act his part,
Against all those in open malice bent,
That would not freely to the theft consent.
Feigns all to's wish, and, in the epilogue,
Goes out applauded for a famous rogue.'
Now, hang me, if I did not look, at first,
For some such stuff, by the fond people's thrust."

The hour of performance varied at the different theatres, from one to three o'clock in the afternoon. Only one regular drama was exhibited, but this was usually followed by a burlesque entertainment, called a Jig; and relief and variety were given by the feats of dancers, tumblers, and conjurors, and the introduction of music between the acts. This latter practice is noticed in "Gammer Gurton's Needle," the first regular comedy of which we have any account. The duration of the performance was from two to three hours.

The growth of choral music in London during the past quarter of a century, is statistically set forth in the Letter to the Members of the Sacred Harmonic Society on the Handel Festival at Sydenham. Take, for instance, the following statement and table:—

The Sacred Harmonic Society has in the twenty years, from June, 1836, to June, 1856, given in the large hall, Exeter Hall, 344 performances. It will be a moderate calculation to place the audiences attending these Concerts (exclusive of the orchestra, stewards, &c., which may be taken at 700 more for each concert) at 650,000 persons.

Let us now look at the provincial musical meetings,— & the attendances at which are tabulated as under :—

6	Westminster Abbey.....	1784 to 1791.....	60,000
1	ditto.....	1834 .....	20,000
4	York Minster.....	1823 to 1835.....	90,000
4	Edinburgh.....	1813 to 1843.....	32,000
11	Norwich.....	1824 to 1854.....	88,000
25	Birmingham.....	1769 to 1855.....	180,000
4	Chester.....	1806 to 1829	} say 160,000
7	Derby.....	1810 to 1831
1	Dublin.....	1831
8	Liverpool.....	1813 to 1849
2	Manchester.....	1828 & 1836
2	Bradford.....	1853 & 1856
Total.....			630,000

To this may be added (the calculators continue) some 370,000 persons, who have attended the 132 meetings of the three-choir Festivals of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, making in all a million of auditors for mixed performances throughout all England during a century and a quarter past, to be set against upwards of 700,000 hearers of sacred music convened during twenty years, in London, by one Society alone. The difference betwixt the two sums, we imagine, could be readily furnished by the registers of the attendances at other choral concerts in London during the past twenty years.

The form of the Theatres, in Shakspeare's time, was derived from those buildings which experience had proved to be well adapted to the purposes of the drama. Like the Court-yard of an Inn, three sides were occupied by balconies, and these, properly divided, were appropriated to the reception of different classes of company: the fourth side formed the stage; and the central area—the pit, which was entirely destitute of benches. The common people, who resorted thither, stood to witness the exhibition; hence, they are called groundlings, by Shakspeare; and, by Ben Jonson, the understanding gentlemen of the ground; in fact, our old dramatists are never weary of the play upon words which this circumstance afforded them. Between this class of spectators, and the occupiers of the upper balconies or scaffolds, the gods of modern days, there was no distinction of rank, both being of the lowest description. The lower balconies, or rooms, answering to our boxes, were frequented by company of rank and fashion. "The Lord's rooms," which are often particularly mentioned, appear to have been immediately contiguous to the stage.

Independently of the regular rooms, there were also, in some of the theatres, private boxes, but their situation is by no means ascertained with precision. Occasionally, also, the public rooms were appropriated to individuals, under the security of lock and key. An upper balcony over the stage constituted the Orchestra. The stage was separated from the audience part of the house by paling; and, previous to the commencement of the performance, was concealed by a curtain, which, being divided in the middle, could be drawn from the centre to the sides; and the materials of which varied, according to the opulence of the house, from woollen to silk. Like the floors of private houses in the Elizabethan age, the stage was usually strewn with rushes, and to this custom we meet with innumerable references in our old plays. On occasions of extraordinary ceremony it was, however, sometimes covered with matting. At the back of the stage there was a balcony, or upper stage, on which those characters entered, who were required to appear in elevated situations, as Juliet in the balcony, and Romeo and Juliet aloft. When not in use for the purpose of the scene, the balcony-stage was also concealed by a curtain. When a play was exhibited within a play, the balcony was made use of, either for the scenic audience, or as a stage for the performance of the auxiliary play. Shakspeare furnishes us with an instance of each of these practices. Sly would sit in the balcony to witness the performance of the "Taming of the Shrew," and the play in "Hamlet" was undoubtedly acted on the upper stage.

QUARTERLY RECORD
OF THE
PROGRESS OF REFORMATORY SCHOOLS AND
OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF RE- FORMATORY AND RAGGED SCHOOLS, AND OF THE IMPROVEMENT OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

During the past quarter, lectures have been delivered, on every imaginable topic, by some of the most distinguished men of these kingdoms: yet admirable, and well designed, as most of their discourses were, we believe that not one lecture of the entire number was more important or more useful than that delivered last month in Bristol by the Rev. Sydney Turner, and of which the following abstract is furnished by one of the local journals:—

THE REFORMATION OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

A lecture was delivered on the above subject at the Philosophical Institution, Park-street, on Wednesday afternoon, by the Rev. Sydney Turner, M.A., chaplain of the Reformatory School of the Philanthropic Society at Redhill, near Reigate, Surrey, to a numerous and most influential audience.

The chair was occupied by the Right Worshipful the Mayor, who, in introducing the lecturer, referred to the importance of the subject of the address they were about to listen to, and the increasing necessity of some reformatory influence to counteract the swelling tide of juvenile delinquency, especially in great cities. He would instance Liverpool.—in 1854, 1,035 boys and girls were committed for various offences, 428 of whom were under 12; the value of the property detected to have been stolen amounted to £3,225; the total value, including that undetected, was estimated at £8,539, of which only £1,367 was recovered; if to this they added the expenses of their commitment, it would furnish a most powerful argument why reformatory schools should meet with support, entirely exclusive of any moral grounds.

The Lecturer believed it was the fashion for all lecturers to plead some excuse, or to make some apology, requesting the indulgence of their audience. He should have to do so too, though not because it was the fashion—first, because he was no professed speaker, having devoted his attention more to working than to talking; and another favour he would beg of them was, that they would excuse his appearing somewhat egotistical, because, when speaking of a work in which he had been so actively engaged, it was unavoidable that he should speak, to some extent, of himself. And if he should say anything involuntarily that might be opposed to their prejudices or opinions, he would crave their pardon, since he should be endeavouring to place his own experience on the subject before their notice. There were three or four important questions suggested themselves at the first starting, demanding answers:

I. Did they want such schools at all; were they necessary? Some 10 or 12 years ago these were formidable questions. They had to go far and wide into society, and appeal much to experience to furnish any satisfactory answer. But this stage had been passed. Most people now allowed the advantages of such institutions: that schools for curing diseased minds were as great a necessity as hospitals for the cure of diseased bodies; that, by the means of reformatory schools, that portion of English society which has become perverted, corrupted, and rotten, might be made sound and wholesome, and useful. Anyone who needed to be assured of the extent of juvenile depravity had only to go to our prisons. He was not so well acquainted with Bristol, as London, Manchester, and Leeds; but at any moment they could find in England 1,000 or 1,500 boys and girls incarcerated for crime. The children of the streets, too, were continually augmenting in numbers. It had lately been made the subject of a joke by Punch. Reformatory agencies were the most effectual and least expensive methods of ameliorating this increasing evil.

II. Why were Reformatory schools become so indispensable? The answer to the question was not so clear, nor so satisfactory. There was something revolting to their feeling in the very word Reform. When applied to a child of ten years old, why it was not yet formed! What a story did it tell of neglected duty, forgotten responsibility, and criminal negligence. There should be no need of reformation for children. The young woman who had fallen from virtue, or the young man who had erred from the path of rectitude, might need reformation, but for the child to require to be re-made was an outrage on common sense and religion. But it must be made the subject of earnest study and practical action. If it were asked if he ever expected that society will be wholly reformed, he replied, no. The vicious would no more cease from the land than the poor. But it was a very different thing to commit juvenile offenders by thousands and by hundreds, by companies or squadrons, and by units or tens. They might say, philosophically, there ought not to be delinquents, but there are, and they must deal with things as they were. They might not be able to stop the tide, but they might check it and lessen its force. If the cause were traced out, they might arrest the evil for the present, and diminish it for the future. They needed that the relation of class to class should be more regarded, that they should look less entirely to themselves, and more to the classes designated as the poorer. If they took more pains to implant within these higher feelings, they would secure from them nobler and more honourable actions. He believed that if there were fewer model prisons there would be more success. If parish authorities could be made to do their duty, and to do it from a higher sense of their responsibility, as being guardians of these classes, to have less anxiety to save half-a-crown, and more anxiety to save a soul from ruin, crime would be more scarce. But the one great cause was the general inadequacy of the means of education. For what use was it to build hospitals for the cure of a disease, when the cause of the disease was left untouched, or to fill the pit to empty it again.

A letter in the Spectator, in answer to a statement that seven were reprieved out of ten juvenile delinquents, urged that the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir G. Grey, Sir G. Pakington, and others, were responsible for those seven, since the fact of their being capable of reformation, proved that they need not have required it. He did not think the parties referred to, wanted in willingness or earnestness. The responsibility did not rest with them, it was diffused generally. If these gentlemen were to offer any assembly a law for general education, they would have almost as many opponents as the number they addressed. It would be asked, What sort of religious instruction was intended to be imparted? How did it provide for balancing the claims of this and that sect? He was afraid they each would rather let a boy rot in social crime, before they would allow him to be taught a different system of religion to their own. Nothing effectual could be done while this feeling lasted, though thousands were perishing for lack of help. He would that the same feeling, which was manifested by a Jewish mother, was dormant in all. She wished her boy to come to his school; and on his reminding her that as he would hear the Word of God frequently read, &c., there would be every chance of his becoming a Christian, she answered, "Sir, I would rather my boy should become a good Christian, than remain a bad Jew." The lecturer then referred to the educational surveillance adopted in America as a good example for our imitation. Reformation was good, but prevention was better.

III. If they had Reformatory Schools, would they be of any use? This was a practical question, and was continually pressed. He did not say every person could be reformed, but he was of opinion that most people could be; it was in the recognition of this principle that the Gospel of Christ was grounded. Yet theoretical arguments might fail to convert the philosopher, the statesman, or the politician, who had the making of laws, they wanted arguments more practical. A magistrate of his acquaintance once said of Redhill, "It is a nice place, and they are good sort of people who work there, for I know them; but if a boy is a prig he will be one." This gentleman seemed to consider that as some men are born poets, sculptors, &c., so some were born "prigs;" that a Turpin was as much a natural phenomenon as a Newton. He could only meet that objection by giving practical results. He would first mention the school at Kingswood, and his statements could be substantiated by Miss Carpenter. Out of twelve of the pupils who had emigrated or gone to sea, only one had failed to keep his good character; and but one out of thirteen placed out in England. What argument could be more convincing than that? The favourable chances were twelve to one, to prove that the reformatory method was not only right but profitable. At Hardwick, and other institutions, the results were as favourable. But he knew most of Redhill, and the School of Mettray in France, after which Redhill was modelled. When he thought of Mettray he was almost discouraged that so little had been done in England. There, out of 1,320 inmates during the past sixteen years, only 10 per cent. were relapsed. And these statistics could be depended upon, for the most careful oversight was kept upon all who had left

Mettray. Though not so much, they had done something at Redhill, especially considering their many difficulties and obstructions. It was seven years ago, in 1849, that it was determined to remove the Philanthropic institution from London to the country, where it was planted on a farm. Eighteen boys were taken there, in a year these increased to 100. More houses were built. There were now six different departments, and 247 boys. When he considered that they transferred a London school to the country, to agricultural pursuits, and where they were without walls or warders, he only wondered they succeeded at all. Another mistake was to begin without adequate teachers. M. de Metz, of Mettray, spent three months in training the teachers. We also neglected another precaution which he took; we had as many again scholars to commence with as he had; they should have formed a nucleus. They had received 847 scholars and placed out, or sent abroad, 636. Of course some of these were deserters. Many only came for a week or two to see what the place was like, for those he would allow eighty. Of the remainder, 377 had emigrated to the colonies, and 163 were placed out in England. What had been the results, for their real influence was determined by the effects. In 1854, of thirty-one who emigrated, only two turned out ill; those who remained were a very great assistance, especially in America. Of the nineteen placed out in England, thirteen were successful. In 1851, forty-seven emigrated, thirty-nine did well; thirteen were placed out, and ten did well. In 1852, fifty-three did well out of sixty-one, and eighteen out of twenty-five. In 1853, seventy-five out of eighty-six, and thirty-one out of thirty-six. In 1854, seventy-six out of eighty-six, and thirteen out of twenty. Total emigrated during five years, 308; of whom thirty-nine turned out ill, and 296 well; placed out in England, 119; forty-six were unsuccessful, and seventy-three turned out well. This showed a result of four-fifths of successes, and one-fifth failures, or twenty per cent. Allowing that a few whom he had not heard of had turned out ill, it was not many; for somehow there were plenty to inform him of any relapses. Allowing, say ten per cent., and that was a handsome allowance, it would still remain a fact that seventy out of every hundred did well, or seven in ten. Other difficulties were, the want of teachers, his own inexperience, the ages of the boys, some as old as eighteen years; while in France a law provided that they should not be older than seven. Considering all this, they need not be ashamed, as Englishmen, of what had been done at Redhill. The lecturer then proved that the school was no nuisance to the neighbourhood; and showed from a report for the last week, which had been forwarded to him, that out of 246 boys, only thirty-one were guilty of the slightest fault; those included dirty hands, want of punctuality, &c. The next point he proved was, that it offered no premium to crime. Experience had proved that very few volunteered to the school. It was no more an inducement to crime, than the workhouse was an inducement to idleness. The reformatory schools had been found rather a stimulus to parental responsibilities, by the exertion of which juvenile offenders would be almost eliminated from society. From Capt. Williams, to whose zealous aid and interference with Government the reformatory movement was greatly indebted, he had received, per letter, the following statement, to show that the number of juvenile offenders was on the decrease:—In 1848, 13,798 boys and girls were committed; in 1849, 12,953; in 1850, 11,276; in 1851, 12,392; in 1852, 11,821; in 1853, 11,453; and in 1854, the compilation of which was not complete, showed a still further diminution. Now, though he was ready to admit that this favourable position was partly due to the operations of our pauper district-schools, of which there were six in London, as well as other agencies, he would still claim a large amount of the result as due to reformatory movements. This diminution was at the rate of 7 per cent., or, allowing for our increase of population, 11 per cent. In referring to Kingswood Reformatory School, Mr. Turner passed a most warm eulogium on Miss Mary Carpenter, to whose personal exertions and warm heart the movement owed so very much. After entering very fully into many eminent points connected with the reformation of juvenile offenders, the eloquent lecturer concluded by urging his audience to personal exertion in so important a matter, especially as they had a school so near as that of Kingswood.

Mr. Commissioner Hill, in moving a vote of thanks to the lecturer, dwelt for some time on the various features of the reformatory movement, and particularly those of the school at Mettray, whose superintendent, M. de Metz, was his personal friend.

This was seconded by R. P. King, Esq., who remarked that, in his capacity of magistrate, he had to deal largely with juvenile offenders, some of whom were brought up, time after time, within a few days of their dismissal from gaol. Carried unanimously.

Sir E. Wilmot, in a few choice words, expressed the thanks of the meeting to the chairman, after whose brief reply the meeting separated.

Whilst Mr. Turner has been thus lecturing in Bristol, Lord Leigh has been printing his notes of his visit to Mettray last autumn, and has published them under the title—The Reformatory at Mettray. A Letter from a Visitor to that Institution, Addressed to a Member of the Committee of the Warwickshire Reformatory. This Letter gives, concisely and clearly, the writer's impressions of the colony, and he has introduced two wood-cuts, shewing the elevations of the washing and sleeping places. The following passages appear to us worthy of notice, and they place some new facts before those interested in the Reformatory Movement, particularly as the question of punishment is now engaging the attention of our friends. Lord Leigh's observations on the adaptability of the "honour" prizes of Mettray to English schools are most important. If we borrow the idea of the ORDER OF VALOR from France and its Legion of Honour, why should we not borrow the honor premiums from Mettray. Lord Leigh writes:—

"The strictest discipline is observed, and nothing is overlooked. Dry bread is an occasional punishment, but the cell is a more frequent one. Every fault which has called for reproof is registered, and a most careful and detailed conduct-book is kept, showing the behaviour of every child. Here are seen at a glance his name, previous residence, habits, health, appearance in detail, the crime for which he was convicted, every possible information which can be gleaned with regard to himself and his family, with a most careful and complete report of his behaviour since admission. When a fault calls for punishment, before it is inflicted upon the child, he is made to retire into a cell, which takes for the time being the name of 'salle de réflexion'—he is kept there for an hour or so, and meanwhile the 'Directeur' reviews his conduct-book, takes into careful consideration the previous circumstances and conduct of the boy, his general character, his advantages and disadvantages, and having carefully weighed them and taken time to collect himself, and given the boy leisure to reflect upon his fault, he is in a position to pronounce, as far as human discernment goes, the exact measure of punishment deserved by the child. Those confined to cells have an hour's exercise a day in chopping wood, or in some similar occupation. The cells are bare rooms, with sufficient light and air for health. Punishment is administered for apparently trifling faults. We found four boys in four cells on occasion of our visit. One was there for refusing to sing the day before, two for taking chesnuts, and the other for being found near the cellar where he had no business to be. I think it will be allowed that these are not offences of a very grave nature, and as the discipline is so strict, that it is satisfactory there were so few boys from so large a number. The cells are so placed and arranged that those in them, although unseen, can be admitted to take part in the Church service at the back of the altar of the church on Sundays. Eight Sisters of Charity undertake the housekeeping of the establishment. An account of all that will be required of them on the coming day is handed in to them the evening before by the comptroller of the finances.

* * * * *

It is scarcely possible, without a personal visit to Mettray, to form a correct idea of the amount of study and attention which is devoted to the consideration of every particular, and of every individual child. The 'family' arrangement makes this easy, by concentrating the attention of the several employés upon their respective little flocks; the same number of employés allotted to the same number of children, if assembled in an undivided mass, could never possibly effect the same amount of good, for the attention of each one would be divided by the whole number, nor could the interest in each other be awakened which now exists between the chef de famille and his young protégés.

As for the employés themselves, who are gentlemen by nature if not always by birth, it is quite impossible to see and converse with these intelligent, well-educated, and benevolent men without feeling how great must be their elevating influence upon the character and general tone of the boys. The two principal employés are in receipt of 160*l.* per annum each. They are of a standard of intelligence and ability which would ensure their advancement in any profession, and one who feels their devotion to be the more admirable. M. De Metz has been very particular in placing his employés in a respectable and comfortable position, and has built for the two principal ones suitable houses, a little apart from the houses for the boys. The wives of these two gentlemen are perfect gentlewomen, and we had the pleasure of meeting them at dinner at M. De Metz's house.

There are many things at Mettray suggested by the military spirit of the French which would at first sight appear perhaps impossible to carry out in an English Institution, but I see no reason why the feeling of 'honour,' which I believe to be as strong in an English child as in a French one, should not be appealed to with advantage in an English Reformatory. Why should not we have the Table of Honour hung up where every one can see it, upon which is inscribed the name of every child whose conduct during the last three months has not called for punishment?

With regard to the almost military discipline and order with which the children go through their movements before and after work or meals, I consider that by it a great saving of time is made, and five or ten minutes upon every change of movement are gained which would be otherwise lost in collecting and getting into place stragglers both young and old. Let me mention and recommend, too, the box placed within general reach, 'pour les objets trouvés,' which is a delicate way of allowing a boy whose temptations have been stronger than his virtue, to listen to the reproaches of his conscience, and, without being publicly brought to shame, to restore the theft which lies heavy on his soul. I will say no more of Mettray at present, except that the instruction given is firmly based upon religion, and includes reading, writing, and arithmetic, but very little beyond. Lesson-time does not exceed one or two hours a day. I must add that the children are first received as innocent, and as having sinned without discernment, and therefore irresponsible for their actions; but when they have been once admitted to the benefits of the instruction given them in the Institution, they are considered to be capable of discernment, and become subject to the strict discipline observed there.

I have been so lengthy upon Mettray, that I have no time to discuss other institutions. Of the three or four others I saw in France, I like Le Petit Quevilly, near Rouen, the best. Petit Bourg, near Paris, seemed to me to be conducted upon very objectionable principles, and not upon the family system. M. De Metz and other French reformers congratulate themselves upon the superiority of the French law over the English, as they are able to receive children direct into their institutions, whereas our law sends them first to prison, bringing upon them the stigma of having been within prison-walls, and disqualifying them for the army and navy."

Whilst an English nobleman has been thus declaring his opinion of Mettray, and endeavouring to place its various excellencies, in all their phases before his country; and whilst he has been thus, with genuine English open-hearted honesty, shewing how England might with advantage imitate the example of a French Reformatory Institution; a Frenchman has attacked Mettray and M. Demetz virulently, unfairly, and we hope ignorantly; we hope, ignorantly, for a more complete vindication, than that from the pen of M. Demetz, and of which we here insert a translation, it is quite impossible to conceive: for this most admirable translation we are indebted to The Midland Counties Herald, and it adds another to the many services conferred upon the Reformatory Movement by that excellent journal:—

“METTRAY.

[From the Journal des Economistes, January 15th, 1856.]

Sir,—The Journal des Economistes justly enjoys too high a reputation for anything which it publishes to be received with indifference. You will not, therefore, be surprised, that, in the name of the Colony of Mettray, I ask your permission to offer to the public some facts in opposition to the severe criticisms of your colleague, M. du Puynode.

In an article in your December number, entitled ‘Etudes sur la population et la Charité,’ this gentleman accuses Mettray of destroying the family feeling, the basis of all good education.

Allow me, in reply, to state, first, that Mettray does not receive children from their homes, but from prisons, in which place the life they pursue is very different from that of a domestic hearth; and further, that almost all these poor children have been led to evil precisely because they have no families, or only such as do them harm.* What does Mettray do for them? The very first principle called into action at the Colony is the esprit de famille. It, therefore, does not destroy, but restores this feeling in our young delinquents. M. du Puynode is perfectly right in asserting the superiority of family training over every other mode of education.

We coincide entirely in this opinion. In an essay we very recently published on Agricultural Colonies on the occasion of the Réunion

---

* From its foundation to the 1st of January, 1856, the Colony of Mettray has received 1,984 juvenile offenders. Of this number there are—

- 346 illegitimate children.
- 876 children who have lost father or mother, or both.
- 116 foundlings.
- 304 children who have a step-father or step-mother.
- 117 children whose parents live in concubinage.
- 408 children whose parents have been convicted.

Internationale de la Charité,* we earnestly insisted that it was the duty of every man aspiring to found an institution destined to receive poor and abandoned children to create in it a home feeling, if they desire to supply, as far as possible, to the child the family it has lost, or which has neglected its duty. We said in that essay that the reason why we have made no greater progress in education is because we have too often substituted discipline for moral action. It is easy to manœuvre a regiment by a word, the crew of a vessel by the whistle, but it is another matter to correct in mankind the inclination to evil, and win them over to the love of good. Now, as this theory has not only been professed, but has been reduced to practice by us during sixteen years, (the foundation of Mettray dating from 1840,) we cannot repress our astonishment at finding the system pursued in this institution attacked as destructive of the esprit de famille, and as mining in our pupils 'all spontaneity, all power of imitation, almost all free will.'

We venture to hope that it is only necessary to explain the principles on which Mettray was founded to efface the injurious impression which the above-mentioned article may have produced on some minds.

At the time Mettray was first established, children declared not guilty and acquitted under Article 66 of the Code Penal were subjected to the same regime as the most hardened offenders. Magistrates possessed only this painful alternative, either to commit them to prison, a step fatal to their well being, or to throw them back upon the streets. It was to remedy a state of things so afflicting that we determined to resign our office, in order that the law might for the future be applied in a just and salutary manner. In conjunction with M. le Vicomte de Courteilles, whose loss we can never cease to deplore, and under the patronage of the Société Paternelle, we established Mettray.†

The attention of the public being now fixed upon the purposes of our institution, it will be better able to judge of the views which regulated its organisation, and which we will endeavour to explain as

---

* A translation of this Essay was given in the Quarterly Record of the Progress of Reformatory Schools, &c., Irish Quarterly Review for December, 1855; and another has been published by E. B. Wheatley, Esq., M.A.

† Conviction being a necessary preliminary, it must frustrate the calculations some bad parents might be supposed to make, who to rid themselves of a burthen which nature imposes on them might, cause their children to commit an offence to procure their being sent to Mettray. Parents sufficiently depraved to have recourse to an expedient so odious, do not require the incentive of such an institution as ours to urge their children to do wrong. Besides, the child is as likely to be committed to a Maison Centrale as to an agricultural colony, so that it would be an erroneous calculation as well as a guilty act. Further, the number of relapses, which, according to M. Béranger, (de la Drôme,) amounted formerly to sixty per cent., is now at Mettray only ten per cent. Such a result goes far to compensate for any evil consequences with which this institution could possibly be reproached.

succinctly as possible. As we have said above, it is principally through the esprit de famille that we must hope to operate upon the human heart; but in order that a moral principle should first be thoroughly understood, and then properly applied by those whose duty it is to give it effect, we must embody this sentiment in a form bearing no distant resemblance to a real family. It is for this reason that we erected small detached houses. Our population, which now exceeds 660 lads, is thus divided into small families, each having a chief trained in the normal school, (which we previously established in order to educate officers competent to their duties,) under whose authority forty boys are placed. This chief bears the title of pere de famille; a title, by the way, which is justified by his kindly watchfulness. Two colons, who are called elder brothers, assist him. We desired, by these titles, to awaken in the hearts of our boys, and of the chiefs, a consciousness of those duties which family life imposes. In such cases names have more meaning than might be imagined.

When a family passes a week without having incurred punishment it earns a right to a collective reward. Sometimes it is an engraving illustrating a trait of benevolence or of courage. This engraving is hung up in the house, and remains as a memorial of the good conduct of the family. Sometimes the reward is a game, in which all can take part; the well-disposed, in the hope of this recompence, say to the ill-conducted, 'we will watch over your conduct, for fear you should spoil our week.' In this way we draw tighter the bonds between the different members of these little societies, by establishing among them an identity of interests.

As long as the boy remains in the Colony, he is the object of a lively, we may say a tender solicitude. He is instructed in the truths of religion—the basis of all good education; we endeavour to create in him good resolutions, and to induce him by every possible means to persevere in them. Above all, we neglect nothing by which we can appeal to his sense of honour, through which a Frenchman, no matter what is his station in life, is always accessible. The proof that this feeling has not been without influence over our population is, that though there are no walls, no gates, at Mettray—a circumstance which led to the happy remark of one of our high officers of state, 'What a singular prison,' exclaimed he, on visiting Mettray, 'where there is no other key than the clef de champs;' notwithstanding their severe discipline, their toil,* their hard living, their light

---

* We have drained to a certain depth a considerable portion of our land; a task which employed a great number of our hands. Moreover, the high farming in which our lads are engaged, over an extent of more than 260 hectares now under complete cultivation, calls for a large amount of hand labour: consequently there is no fear that our boys have not enough to do. The greater part of them are very young, and, in general, of weak constitutions. According to the opinion of M. Cordier, in his work on Flanders, the strength of a man and a half is required to cultivate one hectare; assuredly four of our boys would not furnish an equivalent. In fine, M. le Comte de Gasparin has undertaken the management of our agricultural department. With clothing—cotton being their only wear in winter as well as summer—their bare feet only protected by sabots, whatever may be the weather, water their only beverage—we have needed only to tell our lads that they are in some measure prisoners on parole, to ensure that not one out of 1,934 colons received at Mettray should be absent at the muster.

No one disputes the good effects of music. The sound of the trumpet, which breaks the monotony of their exercises, and gives them precision, inspires our lads with a strong liking for a military life, which we select for a large number of them.

The hazardous career of a soldier suits their love of enterprise; and thus, too, the burden of the conscription [l'impôt du sang] is lightened, which bears so heavily upon youths of irreproachable character, who are the pride and mainstay of their parents. We also train our lads for sailors, with the help of the masts, sails, and rigging of a ship, given to us by the Minister of Marine. Many of them who come from the shores of Bretagne have already made coasting voyages, and long for nothing so much as to go again to sea. Thus we train up soldiers, sailors, and agricultural labourers;—to defend our native soil and to enrich it is our great object.*

We have established a Fire Brigade, that we may afford assistance should a fire break out in our neighbourhood; but we have made a regulation to the effect, that those members who may be undergoing punishment shall not accompany their comrades, that they may feel privation from rendering a service to their fellow-creatures to be a penalty.

Punishment is never inflicted at the moment an offence is committed. The boy is taken to the salle de reflexion, as we call it, where he is left. This is no part of his punishment, but it gives him time to grow calm, and to reflect upon his conduct. We ought to admit that this rule was adopted for the sake of the officers at least as much as for that of the wards. At the very moment of an offence, influenced by the displeasure it excites, we may yield to an angry impulse and not always retain the coolness necessary in apportioning the penalty to the action for which it is inflicted; and it must be borne in mind, that chastisement only corrects when it is felt to be just by him who endures it; otherwise it is a struggle of the strong against the weak; and where there is such a struggle no good moral influence is possible. Restored to freedom, evil passions burst forth superintendence so eminent we are exonerated from entering into further details on the subject. There are names which afford so sure a guarantee to the public as to confer a distinction on the institutions with which they are connected. Our manufacture of agricultural implements has been carried to a very considerable extent, and a large number of our boys are employed in it. We have just received for this manufacture a medal of the first class from the Universal Exhibition, which proves the skill of our young artisans.

---

* Indeed, it strikes one that there are few of us who would not learn something from a course at Mettray; and that at least, the raw recruits of our army would be better qualified for service by a little of the multifarious instruction there imparted.—Times, December, 1855.

afresh, and with all the more violence the longer they have been pent up.

It is to these precautions that we owe the spirit of subordination which prevails among our lads, and of which they give constant proof under every variety of circumstance. Thus during the revolution of February, (1848) when insurrection was, to a certain extent the order of the day, when most of the public schools, and others even for the higher classes, took to arms and to making barricades,—our boys, though completely at liberty, never showed themselves more absolutely submissive, and yet they well knew what was going on round about them.

A box is placed in the middle of the open court, in which is placed every stray article that may have been picked up; its real purpose, however, is to facilitate repentance, by enabling the child who has cribbed (to use a school phrase) something from a fellow-pupil, to obey the voice of conscience, without having to endure the disgrace of an avowal, which is always very painful.

Such means may appear puerile to those who do not sufficiently estimate the precautions and excessive care demanded, would we make it efficacious, by education, that noblest of all sciences, which trains mankind to love what is right. It is by this unceasing care that evil inclinations are in time overcome. A regimen observed uninterruptedly is more beneficial to the health than the most potent medicines, and it is the same with the moral as with the physical constitution.

The facts we have quoted, which form a part of the Mettray system, prove that during the whole period of our guardianship we neglect no opportunity of cultivating right feelings in our pupils. We do not disguise from ourselves, however, the fact that our efforts would produce no good result, if we lost sight of our children as soon as they gain their liberty,—that critical moment, when they find themselves beset on all sides by the temptations of the outer world.

They never leave the Colony until we have secured a place with employers upon whom we can entirely depend. A patron* chosen in the neighbourhood whither the youth is sent, watches over him with unremitting care, and aids him with advice.

Colons who have been engaged by farmers in the neighbourhood of Mettray, or who having gone into the army happen to be quartered at Tours, come every Sunday to spend the day at the Colony. The same place is laid for them at the family table which they had used to occupy; they kneel at the same altar with their former schoolfellows; they dine with them, and join them in their sports. Thus we withdraw them from the influence of the tavern, whither they might be led by want of occupation; and we have no fear of overstepping the truth, when we say that the day is to the greater number a jour de fête.

We asked one of them if he enjoyed coming back amongst us, and he replied, with a most naïve expression of pleasure, "Monsieur

---

* A member of a Patronage Society, an admirable institution, of which we have scarcely an example in England.—Ta.

Demetz," (for our lads rarely use the title of Director,) "when I catch sight of the bell-tower of the Colony, I can't walk any longer; I am forced to run."

Youths who have been with us have no need to fear want of employment, which too often ruins a workman's hopes for the future. As soon as they are out of work they return to the Colony, and put themselves under the protecting wing, so to speak, of the chief of the family who has brought them up, who knows their character, and has won their affection. Then they resume in every respect the life of a colon, and submit unreservedly to the discipline of the household. We provide for their wants, on the understanding that they will work industriously. We seek a new situation for them, and it is not until one has been found that we consent to part with them.

If one of our lads is ill, and is living in the neighbourhood, we send for him to the Colony. We never allow him to go to a hospital; we claim the privilege of alleviating his sufferings and sorrow, as a father does those of his children. We endeavour as earnestly to strengthen in his heart the love of virtue as to cure his bodily ailments. We seek to revive his religious feelings; and should he die, we have the consolation of knowing that he dies like a Christian. Thus the time passed with us is doubly profitable to the youth. His companions are well aware that we receive no remuneration for the cost of his stay among us, for our lads know all; and this is why we make it a rule that nothing shall be done which it would be desirable to conceal from them. These acts of hospitality excite the gratitude not only of those who are its object, but of those also who witness it.

No youth ever leaves us until his health is completely restored. Convalescence is a time of still greater difficulty to the workman than illness itself, and more dangerous to his future well-being by exposing him to struggle with want. Our hospitals, which are always inadequate to the demands made upon them, cannot keep the patient long enough for him to regain his strength, and they dismiss him while the employer considers him yet too weak to work. What can become of him between the hospital which sends him forth and the workshop where he cannot gain admittance? Our lads have not this sad alternative to fear.

We maintain an unflagging correspondence with the youths we have placed out, as well as with their patrons: the number of letters we have written and received amount to at least four thousand. We never regret their multiplicity, although the correspondence is a very onerous one, not only for the time it absorbs, but for other sacrifices which it entails. It is by means of the packets containing these valuable documents, each endorsed with the name of the youth to which it has reference, that those persons who have visited Mettray with the intention of writing an account of it, have been able to verify the facts stated in our annual Reports.*

---

* The founders of Mettray are aware that transition from the Colony into the world is the period at which the young colon most needs counsel and support, and consequently, the institution continues to watch over him during this season of trial. If he loses his employment, is

We cannot labour too earnestly to prevent all misconception as to the nature of the endeavours made by us on behalf of our wards. Those by whom our efforts are understood well know that it is far from our aim to secure for our lads a life of ease, which would be an error on our part, since it is their lot to gain their bread by hard labour, and their hands are their only patrimony. On the contrary, it is our duty, who have in some measure taken upon ourselves the moral responsibility of their future welfare, to neglect no means which will aid their praiseworthy exertions to ward off those chances which, by exposing them to evil influences, might cause them to fall. We have to deal with characters whose morality is yet wavering and who need to be supported.

To sum up, the greater part of our boys had no home. In every case, we took them from prison, where no domestic influence can exist. They first experience it at Mettray, where everything concurs to assist its beneficent operation; it endures the whole time of their stay, and they feel its good effects even after their departure.*

We have, then, as much as possible, avoided the shoals pointed out by the author of the article; and we have endeavoured, guided by principles the same as those he has laid down, to supply, in the best way we can, the good influences and the pious teachings of the home fireside.

It is on this point alone that we have now thought it our duty to furnish some information. A complete analysis of the Mettray system must not be looked for in this statement—that would require a far more comprehensive treatise—but simply an answer to the objections which have been raised in this institution. It is the duty of him who has devoted his life to the success of a work of beneficence to destroy every unfavourable impression made on the public mind regarding it, which is not founded in truth.

Finally, Mettray is only five hours from Paris, and we are truly glad to receive in the best way we can any persons who kindly favour us with a visit.

If the author of the article which has called forth this explanation had expressed a desire to put himself in communication with us, we should have hastened to comply with his wish. He would thus have spared himself the regret which every honourable mind must feel at having, involuntarily we are convinced, possibly injured a useful institution, and one which needs the assistance of all.

I have the honour, &c., &c.,

DEMETZ,

Conseiller Honoraire à la Cour Imperiale de Paris, Directeur de la Colonie de Mettray.

---

overwhelmed by difficulties, or falls sick, the Colony is always open to him; it is a home for him. There he finds an asylum, and meets with sympathy, and there he is subjected to the best possible moral influence.

† The observance of religious duties, the love of labour, the esprit de famille, the influence of good example, the cultivation of the sense of honour, the habit of discipline, the proper use of liberty—in these grand yet simple elements, consists the whole reformatory system, all the regenerating influence of Mettray.—Notice sur Mettray, par M. Cochin.

[It will be remembered that, in addition to M. du Puynode's charge against the discipline of Mettray that it is destructive of the esprit de famille, he adds that the boys lose all spontaneity, all power of initiation, and almost all exercise of the will,—objections which have been repeated in an able article in the last number of the Quarterly Review, entitled "Reformatory Schools." On these latter charges, M. Demetz has only touched incidentally, probably for want of space, as a multitude of facts well known to all who, like ourselves, have visited the Colony, might be adduced to show, not only that they are without foundation, but that the system is eminently conducive to the freest action which any reformatory school is capable of bearing.—NOTE BY TRANSLATOR.]

Turning now from France to our own Reformatories, two points of the gravest movement claim our attention. It is, as we always contended it would be, plain that the Voluntary System alone will not suffice to keep open a sufficient number of Reformatories. It is true that the Government, in the House of Commons, admits that the system has worked well; it is true that with all the facts and figures patently before it, the Home Office refuses to increase the small sum now allowed for the maintenance of juveniles in Reformatories, notwithstanding all the proof showing the saving of the Reformatory when compared with the Gaol, and declared by the Rev. Mr. Clay, by Mr. Recorder Hill, by Miss Carpenter, by a dozen other witnesses of equal knowledge and experience. A very excellent paper entitled Reformatory Schools, printed in the last number of The Quarterly Review, places all these topics of expense, and of the right of the Reformatories to an increased amount of remuneration, and to this demanded increase (7s. instead of 5s.) they are fully entitled, if they continue in their present efficient state, and giving free liberty of conscience.

But amongst some of the most zealous friends of the Movement, a strange confusion of terms appears to prevail. They say—we want Government to increase the grant for maintenance, but Government shall not drive us from our position as founders of the schools. This declaration, and those doubtings, arise from the want of a sufficiently clear distinction being drawn in the speakers' minds between Management and Support. The Government are, we contend, bound to support, to a reasonable extent, say 7s. per head, per week, all juveniles sent to certified Reformatories, and by giving that support Government acquires the right of inspection, which all true friends of the Movement will not alone submit to, but will court; but here the right of Government ends, and Management belongs alone and solely to the founders or Directors of the School. If this management be improper, the Inspector can, and must, if he do his duty, recommend the withdrawal of the maintenance, or even of the certificate, but beyond this they Government cannot proceed. In short, so long as the certified Reformatory is properly conducted, the Government is bound to contribute to its support upon the terms of the original agreement between the State and the Managers.

Whilst we are writing of this question of Government support, we shall insert some passages from a letter addressed last January by Mr. E. Denison, to his constituents of the West Riding of Yorkshire; we are happy to perceive that Mr. Denison supports a principle to which we have ourselves directed attention—that of compelling the parish to pay for the support of the juveniles in the Reformatory, giving a remedy over against the parents. Mr. Denison writes:—

“The number of juvenile offenders which must annually arise out of a population of 1,340,000 is so large, that any attempt to provide for them by donations and annual subscriptions would be a complete failure; although one or two reformatories on a small scale, like that of Mr. Wheatley's, near Dewsbury, may be perfectly successful. But as I stated at Wakefield last winter—‘So important a public matter ought not to be left to depend upon the present or future liberality of persons whose contributions would certainly vary from many unavoidable causes; for thus an institution, however well-conducted, would be in danger of being broken up from a want of its former funds.’

The reformation of a juvenile offender is quite as much a matter of public duty and sound policy as is the case of a pauper lunatic; for the unreformed offender will probably grow up a very costly and dangerous subject; but if reformed in good time, he may become a valuable member of society.

The Pauper Lunatic Asylum Act enables the justices of all counties to erect or hire suitable buildings, to maintain the inmates, pay the salaries of all officers, &c., &c., without any limitation (by the act) as to the cost thereof, and to make orders upon the treasurer of the county for the payment out of the county purse of the amount annually expended; but the justices are bound to make an order upon the overseers of the parish, to which it may be proved a pauper lunatic belongs, for the repayment of a reasonable sum towards the maintenance of such pauper: if no settlement can be proved, then the cost of maintenance must be disbursed out of the county purse, and so be a county charge.

I have therefore some intention of bringing a bill into Parliament to enable the justices of the peace for the West Riding to deal with this difficult question. I should propose to limit their power of raising funds annually to one penny in the pound upon all property rateable as at present to a county rate; the said funds to be applicable to the erection or hiring of suitable buildings capable of accommodating all such offenders as the judge of assize or the justices in quarter sessions may send to such reformatory; the funds to be also applicable to the maintenance of all the inmates, the payment of salaries of officers, and all other incidental expenses; but I should propose to stipulate, after the requisite buildings have been provided, that the county rate fund should not be charged with any part of the cost of maintenance or salaries until the Government has agreed to pay 5s. per week, which they have already the power to do, towards the cost of each offender; and further, I would render it imperative upon the justices to make an order upon the overseers of the parish to which it may be proved the offender belongs, for the payment of about 3s. per week towards the cost of such offender; but I would also give the overseers of each parish the power of recovering from the relations of the offender the whole of such sum as they may have paid on his or her behalf.*

I believe that beyond such contributions by the Government, and the overseers of a parish, the annual demand upon the West Riding county purse would not reach one halfpenny in the pound after the necessary buildings are erected, capable of holding 400 offenders, as I assume that the three boroughs of Leeds, Pontefract, and Doncaster would gladly participate in the general scheme.

Nothing, in the whole wide range of human misery and desolation, can be more desolate than the condition of a reformed female convict or prisoner, discharged free, or on Ticket-of-Leave. If her friends be vicious she must avoid them; if they be virtuous she has disgraced them; and how few will apply practically the beautiful moral of that God-like teaching given by the Saviour when the adulteress was dragged before him. These women come forth with the stigma of Convict upon them; the odor of the gaol hangs about them, and thus they are deprived of all chance of honorable support by labor amongst the mass of the population of employers. But the more thoughtful portion of the employers are not the less unwilling to engage these women. They say, "Oh! they are very good prisoners; they got on well in gaol, they might as well be quiet there, and we know what sort of geese Gaol Chaplains are; they were good prisoners, and pleased the

---

* See this point urged at length in IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Vol. V., No. 18, p. 426, Art. "Reformatory Schools for Ireland."—Ed.

Chaplains, but what kind of women are they? Put them beyond the hot-house morality of the Prison, and then let us see if they are really reformed."

This is the general tone adopted in speaking of female prisoners by the most thoughtful of the community. Doubtless Gaol Chaplains are not yet, in the majority of cases in England, and in almost all cases in Ireland, equal, or at all fitted to their duties; they may be, and are, incapable of distinguishing between the good prisoner and the good man; and they almost invariably consider that if they report a prisoner's conduct as good, he ought forthwith to be considered as good. In our minds the Chaplain's Report, so long as the Chaplain discharges his duties as at present, without any INDIVIDUALIZATION of his men, is worth little, perhaps less than that of the Warden. But when Chaplain, Governor, School Master, or Mistress, and Wardens, report favorably, then we consider that some hope of reformation may be entertained.

A woman such as this comes forth from prison: she has no home; the chaplain may give her a few pence per week; cold and hunger, and the sting of neglect may oppress her: the roaring life of the old days, with its orgies and its hours of self-forgetfulness, rise up in all their lurid light before her. There is a dead past—she has had no friends, or they have cast her off: she would work, and she may have starved to be good, and poor, and honest, but all this will not avail, and so she falls back into the old course, when her hopes die out,—

"Love, by harsh evidence,
Thrown from its eminence,
Even God's providence Seeming estranged."

And why should this be the case? why should friends or the world look coldly on the fallen, but really reformed criminal? Every day that farmers and others engage servants, they engage them in utter ignorance of the facts of their former lives. Men and women may have been in gaol, and may have come out, and may have left the prison worse than when they entered it, and yet most employers would prefer this species of chance engagement, by which they may obtain the services of an unknown rogue, to securing the services of one who, though admittedly branded by committal to a gaol, yet has all the weight and security of "character" which the reports of all the prison authorities could supply.

Whence arises this difficulty? Doubtless from the fact, that between the gaol and the world no fixed and trusted intermediate place of probation is established in these kingdoms: no Patronage Society opens its Place of Refuge to receive the freed woman, before her old companions gather around her, or ere she has time to learn the blighting, blasting, terrible truth, that the world doubts her because she has been within the walls of a gaol—before she stands amidst the thousand lights of the city, houseless, friendless, despised and, therefore, hating.

What, it may be asked, is a Refuge? What is a Patronage Society? A Refuge is, simply and shortly, an institution in which those females discharged from prison, and who, also recommended by the chaplain, or other authorities, are received until employment can be obtained for them; those institutions have been long established in England, the Durham Refuge being the best known.*

Whilst our present excellent Viceroy served in this country as Chief Secretary, he was instrumental in founding an Institution of this class, for females; and though the plan was earnestly supported it failed, because persons of different religious persuasions were collected within the same walls, with staffs of Officers and with Chaplains for each, and the necessary result was, that the Chaplains and Officers quarrelled, and so the institution, after much care, zeal, and money had been expended, was closed, and the only Institution of this class now open in Dublin, is a Protestant Refuge on Harcourt Road, established in the year 1821, in which "females who, on being discharged from prison, may appear desirous of reforming, and are willing to put up with hard fare, continued labour, and strict discipline," are received. This is a well managed Asylum, but is adapted only for Members of the Established Church, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, and Methodists being obliged to conform to all the rules if they enter.

So far for things as they exist in Ireland; the well conducted, but needy woman has her refuge; the prostitute who has become repentant has her refuge, but the repentant, discharged prisoner has no Asylum to which she can apply, unless she be willing to set off the security of her virtuous reformation against the loss of her faith, a faith, it is true, which may have been slumbering, but which was always a faith, and which has become with her reformation, a revived faith.

---

* See "Two Prize Essays on Juvenile Delinquency," by Micaiah Hill, Esq., and C. F. Cornwallis. London: Smith, Elder and Co., 1853.

Leaving these considerations applicable to these Kingdoms, let us consider how the Patronage and Protection Societies have worked in France.

The first French Patronage Society was founded in the year 1822, and from that period to the present year these Institutions have increased in number as their utility became manifest : they have been founded at Lyons, at Strasbourg, at Rouen, at Toulouse, but the chief and model Institution is that founded, at the instigation of M. Charles Lucas, at Paris, in the year 1833, and directed by M. Berenger (de la Drôme). These societies are for the protection, or patronage, of young, discharged criminals, but the principle of management applies equally to Institutions for adults of either sex.

When the juveniles leave the Reformatory School, they are placed as apprentices to some teacher in an occupation suited to their natural taste or liking. Some of these youths are entirely free, others are liable to be re-committed to the School if their conduct proves them unworthy that their provisional freedom shall be rendered complete. It must be remembered that this Society does not hold itself out as furnishing a means of support for life, and thus afford a premium to abandoned parents ; it simply offers a hard, honest means of support, till reformation can be looked upon as confirmed, and until regular work can be obtained in the ordinary way.

The members composing the Patronage Society are divided into subscribers, patrons, and donors, their number is unlimited, and each is expected to extend the circle as much as possible. A subscriber is simply one who pays the sum promised by him : a donor is one who pledges himself to pay an annual sum of not less than one hundred francs, or in our money, four pounds ; and the patrons are those who undertake, to give during three years to, or procure employment for, the liberated juveniles.

The Society has an Asylum, in which the juveniles, sick, or out of work are received, and in one of the common rooms of which Mass is said every Sunday.

The affairs of the Society are managed by a Board consisting of a President, Vice-President, a Secretary, and a Treasurer. The Administrative Council, composed of twelve members, consider all the points most important to the Society. Three Committees, each presided over by a Vice-President, superintend the proper expenditure of the finances, the distribution of materials, the placing out of the liberated Juveniles, and deliberate upon the conduct of those already so placed. The General Assembly is convoked once in each year to receive the Annual General Report; and twice in each year, this same General Assembly is called to receive the Reports of the Patrons on the conduct and condition of the Juveniles committed to their (the Patrons') care. At these latter meetings officers are nominated, premiums are awarded, and much general business of the Society is transacted.

Very great care is taken that none may become Patrons save those whose moral conduct is good; and no Patron is permitted to take charge of more than six Juveniles at a time. The strictest watch is kept over the Juveniles, particularly over those who are liberated provisionally, or, as we say—"on Ticket-of-leave." If the conduct of any such Juvenile is bad, he is, by decision of the Committee, withdrawn from patronage, and sent back to the colony, or prison whence he came; but the Patron can be released from his position only by virtue of a judicial sentence of recommitment.

The registers are kept with the utmost, and most minute exactitude; containing every fact connected with the life of each Juvenile, and they are indeed a cash and moral account, kept by double entry.

During the twenty years, ending May 1853, the Society took charge of 2,155 Juveniles, of whom 964 turned out well, 112 died, 16 were insane, and the others were more or less unsatisfactory in conduct. During these twenty years the sums received by the Society amounted to 457,265 francs, 55 centimes, and the expenditure amounted to 381,824 francs, 89 centimes; the balance on hand in May 1853, was 75,440 francs, 66 centimes.

It is unnecessary to enter at greater length into these topics: those of our readers who feel an interest in the subject, will find the whole question, in all its bearings of facts and figures, fully discussed in the admirable paper of M. Jules Lamarque, read before the International Reunion of Charity, and which we printed in the Record of our Nineteenth Number, page lxxv.

It is, however, most satisfactory to learn that France has found an imitator in England. We have now before us the Third Report of the Park Row Asylum for Hopeful Discharged Female Prisoners, an Institute founded at Bristol, by Mrs. Sawyer, of Severn House, who has contributed a sum of £1,150 towards the completion and support of the Institution. The following passages from this Report will be read with interest :—

“ Since the first of February last, when the Institution was opened, twelve young women have been admitted.

One from Bristol Gaol.

Five from Bristol Bridewell.

Two from Shepton Mallet Gaol, Somersetshire.

One from Horsley Gaol, Gloucestershire.

One from Taunton Gaol, Somersetshire.

Two who have never been in any prison.

Two others from the Gaol and the Bridewell, Bristol, who were cases more particularly suited to the Penitentiary, have through Mrs. Sawyer's interest been admitted into that Institution, and are going on well. Thus fourteen destitute young women have been provided for, and most of them rescued, in all probability, from falling again into the hands of the police. If worldly benefit is alone considered, is not this a great saving to the country? and if so, has not this Institution a high claim to public support? Does it not also speak very favourably of prisons being visited by ladies? All the London prisons are visited by members of the British Ladies' Association, and so highly is their opinion esteemed by the Magistrates, that it is well known that prisoners have been remanded, and judgment deferred, in order to consult with the ladies, and enable them to investigate the cases, and provide for the prisoners a refuge in some of the London Institutions.

But to return again to our Asylum. Of the young women admitted, three were orphans; three had no mother; three had no father; two had both parents, but they did not live in harmony—nor together; and the mother of one is in prison for a serious offence.

Our first inmate, after being eight months in the Asylum, has been placed in a respectable situation. She has been there now four months, and is giving much satisfaction. Two have absconded; one has been dismissed for gross misconduct; eight remain in the Asylum, and are going on satisfactorily. Two or three are quite ready to enter any suitable situation that may be procured. The history of most of these poor young women is deeply affecting: one had only been one week in prison, and another only three days. Without friends, or a place of refuge, what must have been the lot of these poor outcasts if our Asylum had not been open to them? Their mental instruction and education is entirely entrusted to the care of the Lady Superintendent, whose efforts are directed towards raising the whole tone of their minds. Some have made great proficiency in reading, writing, and even in the composition of letters sent to friends. As a proof how much the best feelings of the human heart may be worked upon and drawn out, it is a pleasure to relate that at a time when a considerable rise in the price of sugar took place, Mrs. Sawyer being accidentally in the Asylum at tea-time, tasted the beverage. Finding it was not sweetened, she inquired the reason, and the Matron replied that the inmates, of their own accord, had decided that, as long as the price of sugar remained so high, they did not think it right they should take it. This was assented to by all, and though the sugar-bason was on the table, it remained untouched. When one reflects how fond young people are of sweet things, and how often even respectable servants do not scruple to take a little sugar out of a tea-caddy, this proof of self-denial in the inmates of the Park Row Asylum speaks well of the moral feeling inculcated in so short a time in the mind of poor outcasts; who, having once undergone the penalty of the law for the breach of the eighth commandment, are now, by proper training, recalled from a life of sin, misery, and temptation, to one of usefulness and respectability. This is most encouraging. Still it is requisite that much judgment should be exercised in the admission of candidates, in order to ensure the benefit of the Institution to those alone who are likely to do it credit. It is therefore again stated that no violent, refractory, or unwilling candidates can be admitted, neither Penitentiary cases; but only those who are hopeful, wishing to retrieve their character, desirous of coming to the Asylum, which is not a Reformatory School, but a temporary shelter for hopeful discharged Female Prisoners.

Gratuitous board, clothing, and instruction are given to the inmates. Household work, washing, and needle-work, are also done by them, but it is not expected that much remunerative work can be accomplished, as the candidates are generally very ignorant when they first come in, and therefore much time must be devoted to religious, moral, and mental training, by which alone real reformation of character can be hoped for, and obtained. Besides, it is not intended that the inmates should remain very long in the Institution, as it is desirable that its benefits should be extended to as many as possible.

A Visiting Lady, taken from the General Committee, is appointed every month. The Sub-Committee has the management of the general affairs of the Institution, of the admission of candidates, and investigation of cases.

Miss Pearson, who at first came forward and offered her valuable services as Lady Superintendent, still continues successfully to fill this arduous and responsible post. Her example may perhaps induce other ladies to undertake a similar work; but let none attempt it unless in a spirit of devotedness to Christian duty. The praise of man is a most dangerous lure, which should at all times be guarded against, but especially in such an undertaking. A single eye is required in the work; absolute devotedness to those whom we hope, through the power of the Spirit, to reclaim, is necessary. 'Ye cannot serve God and the world,' said the Lord to those who thought they could compromise with Him. This is strikingly illustrated by a visit Mrs. Sawyer paid four years ago to the Female Prison of Santa Maria Agnone, at Naples. One hundred and eighty women were there together, some under sentence of death for murder, and some for other serious crimes and offences. Only two Sisters of Charity of the Order of St. Vincent-de-Paul had the care of these poor women, and during the two years they have undertaken the charge, they have succeeded in enforcing order and cleanliness. The women expressed their thankfulness for the kindness shown them; and when Mrs. Sawyer, knowing well the filthy, low, and insubordinate character of the poorest class at Naples, inquired of one of the Sisters how such influence could have been obtained, 'Madame,' was her reply, 'ce sont mes enfans, je les porte dans mon cœur, je vis pour elles, je me dévoue à elles, c'est ma vocation, et elles le savent.' Sixty ladies, most of them of the first nobility, visit this prison, one in turn, twice a week, and their influence is also very great. This, Mrs. Sawyer witnessed when going over the Institution a second time with the aged Countess of Ludloff, visiting lady.

Let all then who undertake such responsible work, and hope for a blessing in it, be moved by a similar spirit of devotedness and Christian love to their poor fellow-creatures.

RULES FOR ADMISSION.

- 1.—No Penitentiary case is admissible.
- 2.—No Candidate can be admitted who has been in Prison more than once.
- 3.—Candidates must be furnished with certificates of good health and of good conduct during the time of imprisonment, signed by the authorities of the Gaols.
- 4.—No payment is obligatory; but Donations and Subscriptions are expected when a Candidate is admitted from the Gaols of other counties.
- 5.—A printed paper of queries will be sent to any Visiting Justices, Chaplains, or Governors of Gaols, on application for the admission of a Candidate, which should be made at least a fortnight before the discharge of the prisoner desired to be admitted.

All letters concerning Candidates must be directed to the LADY SECRETARY, Park Row Asylum, and will be laid before the Committee.

The Asylum is open to the public every THURSDAY, from Two to Four o'Clock."

Having thus shewn what has been, and is being, done in France and England, we now proceed to shew what Ireland is about to do, in this important and truly charitable plan of a Refuge for Females Discharged from Prison. During the past quarter some gentlemen of station and fortune have been induced, through the pressing and patent necessity of the case, to consider the best method of securing, so far as human agency can accomplish it, the work of Reformation commenced in the Irish Gaols, particularly in those excellently and wisely managed institutions, the Convict-Prisons; and after considerable thought and discussion, the following prospectus was issued by the Provisional Committee :—

“ Although the charities of Dublin are numerous and liberally maintained, it has long been felt that an Institution is necessary, in which women who have been imprisoned, and are disposed to abandon their evil courses, may find a refuge on their liberation, until their good resolutions can be tested, and provision made for their continuance in a life of virtue.

The difficulties which oppose the reformation of male criminals are great and lamentable; but they can, in general, when they receive their freedom, procure employment in out-door labour, and in the army or navy, whilst a woman, however penitent, on leaving her prison, finds every means of honest occupation denied to her. She is tainted with the plague spot of the prison; she cannot obtain work, or food, or lodging; even the workhouse will frequently object to her, as she belongs to no union; her good intentions are blasted in the bud; she is driven back amongst her old associates; and ‘her last state becomes worse than the first.’

The utter destitution and hopelessness of a female (especially a convict) discharged from prison was so apparent, that after transportation had ceased as a punishment for male convicts, females were still sent by Government to Australia, where they might, in a new country, find an honest means of livelihood, and where, at any rate, if reformation was impossible, and the individual was lost, she did not fall back into the stream of society in the mother country, and contaminate it by the contagion of her example.

Transportation has now ceased as a punishment, and a number of convict women will soon be turned loose on the community. It becomes, therefore, evident, that our social well-being requires the establishment of a refuge to receive them, so as to give these unhappy creatures a chance of reformation, and arrest the evils which must affect us all, should they pass from their prison door as abandoned outcasts, without hope in the world, or encouragement to amend, or the possibility of existence, except by crime; but when we consider that ‘there shall be joy in heaven upon one sinner that doth penance more than upon ninety-nine just,’ we have a stronger reason than mere social duty to adopt this course, it becomes a Divine command to smoothe the way of the returned prodigal, and enable her, in labour and penance, to follow the right path.

The Sisters of Mercy, of Baggot-street, feel strongly the urgency of this want, and have now determined to undertake the care of a Moral Hospital, where the recovered, but weak and uncertain penitent, will be received and attended during her convalescence, and where the influence of religion will be brought to bear on her crushed and humbled spirit, until she can endure the rough contact of the world without fear of relapse. For this purpose they have established a branch of their institution on the north side of the city for the reception of Catholic females discharged from prison, whose conduct has been such as to justify a hope that they will become good members of society. This establishment will be managed on the plan of the Solitude of Nazareth at Montpellier, and other similar institutions on the Continent. The women will partly support themselves by their labour, and there is reason to believe that funds will not be wanting to carry out the good work on a scale commensurate with the necessities of the country, when once it is firmly established; but in the first instance money is required to purchase beds and other furniture, to make some alterations, and fit up extensive work rooms and a laundry. After a little time the Sisters propose to form an auxiliary establishment in the country, where dairy and other farm work proper for their sex will be carried on by the inmates, to prepare such as are suited to them for the duties required in a female farm servant. A committee of benevolent ladies will labour to improve the permanent condition of the women, by procuring situations for such as it is desirable should be placed in this country, and by enabling others to emigrate with recommendations to persons of influence who will consider it a duty to further the opportunity of virtuous labour in other countries.

A Board of Governors, as in other large institutions, will manage the financial affairs of the establishment."

Our friend, Miss Mary Carpenter, sends us the First Report, with the Principles, Rules and Regulations, of The Red Lodge Girls' Reformatory School, of which she is the Superintendent. It would be at any time to us, and to all who are interested in the Reformatory Movement, a valuable and interesting document, but to us at this present period it is doubly valuable, as it enables us to shew to those who are active in organizing the Refuge to which we have just referred, the principles on which one of the most self-sacrificing, enlightened, and noble-minded philanthropists of England, conducts her admirable institution. Of the assistance given to the Red Lodge School, by Lady Noel Byron, all readers of THE IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW are long since aware. The Report is as follows:—

OBJECT OF THE SCHOOL.

This School is established for the reformation and restoration to society of girls who have cut themselves off from it by dishonest practices.

As a long period is usually necessary for the effectual reformation of such children, which can seldom be obtained without the power of legal detention, the School is particularly intended for children sentenced to a Reformatory School under the Act passed in Aug. 1854, 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 86; but it will be open to other cases of moral destitution.

CONDITIONS OF ADMISSION.

No girl is to be admitted if above 14, and it is preferred to receive children under 12; no child will be declined on account of extreme youth, as it is better at once to withdraw from her home a child, however young, who shows a propensity to dishonesty which cannot be checked in the circumstances in which she is placed.

No girl will be retained above the age of 16.

No girl will be admitted with any infectious disorder.

No girl will be admitted who is a fit subject for a Penitentiary.

The parties sending girls to this School must be responsible for a provision being made for them on leaving, as it will be generally undesirable that they should return to the unfavourable circumstances in which they fell into crime.

Two suits of strong under clothing and shoes are to be sent with each girl.

It will be in the power of the Superintendent to deviate from these rules under peculiar circumstances; but this will not be done readily.

When girls are sent to this School not under the Act, a payment of 5s. per week will be expected, Quarterly in advance.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF MANAGEMENT.

The girls admitted to this School will be usually found to be entirely devoid of any good principles of action; particularly addicted to deceit both in word and actions; of fine, but misdirected powers; of violent passions; extremely sensitive to imagined injury, and equally sensible to kindness.

The first step towards their reformation will be to awaken a feeling of confidence in their instructors, and to prove to them the anxiety for their welfare that is felt for them; they should be made at the same time to feel that they must yield to a controul which will be kindly but firmly exercised; their passions must be as little excited as possible, and when they are so, "overcome evil with good" must be the teacher's watchword. The misdirected energies must be called into healthy exercise, and wisely guided; the intellectual faculties must be judiciously cultivated; and above all, religious and moral principles must be directly enforced, and indirectly, but still more powerfully, taught by the daily life of the teachers, and their evident obedience to truth and duty.

MEANS EMPLOYED FOR THE CARRYING OUT OF THESE PRINCIPLES.

Daily reading and inculcation of the Scriptures with prayer, and other direct religious and moral instruction.

Intellectual training calculated to excite a taste for useful information and to awaken the higher faculties. Regular industrial occupation, especially such as will call forth the energies, or exercise patient application; choice being especially made of such kinds as will fit the girls for domestic service and prepare them for any situation in life in which they may probably be placed.

Innocent amusements, such as may serve to occupy the girls' minds, and distract their attention from injurious objects of thought.

The society of persons of virtuous character and loving spirit, who may insensibly win them over to love virtue, first for their sakes, then for itself.

The availing oneself of every suitable opportunity to act on the child's inner nature, and to rekindle the divine life within her.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

The great object of the religious instruction of these children will be to give them accurate and rational acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures ; a firm conviction of the truths they contain ; a loving faith in their warnings and promises ; and a deep and actuating love of God our Heavenly Father, and of his Son, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. They will be taught to seek in all things the aid of God's Holy Spirit, and by prayer and supplication to make known their wants unto Him. It will be attempted to make religion a daily influencing motive ; whether they eat or drink, or whatever they do, to do all to the glory of God.

All sectarian teaching will be strictly forbidden.

The girls will attend divine service twice on Sunday with the Teacher, at the nearest place of worship which appears eligible.

Regular religious instruction will be given on Sunday afternoon by the Superintendent or by some one authorised by her.

SECULAR INSTRUCTION, AND INDUSTRIAL TRAINING.

Reading, Writing, and the simple rules of Arithmetic are to be carefully and thoroughly taught ; also such knowledge of Geography as will enable the girls to read with intelligence ordinary books of an interesting and instructive character ; and such general information will be given, as will make them more able to discharge well the duties likely to devolve on them in life.

A small Library of instructive and entertaining books will be provided.

Singing will be made a part of the moral training, and regular instruction in it will be given.

The girls are to be employed from one to two hours a day at least in household work, three hours every afternoon at useful needle work, and a portion of the day at knitting.

The older girls are to be taught washing and ironing, with cooking, and other special kinds of house work which may help to prepare them for domestic service.

At least an hour every day should be devoted to active exercise, and, if possible, a walk should be taken beyond the premises three times a week.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING THE GIRLS.

The clothing of the girls will be uniform, but simple and neat, such as would be suitable for any girl in the labouring classes of society.

Great attention is to be paid to personal neatness and cleanliness.

The food will be wholesome and sufficient, but perfectly simple.

The girls must be led to feel that the allowance made for them by the Government or by friends by no means supports them, and that they must do all that lies in their power to aid in the expence of their maintenance. As an encouragement and stimulus however to exertion, a third of the profits arising from each girl's sewing and knitting will be credited to her, and will remain in the hands of the Matron, to be withdrawn by the girl at the discretion of the Matron; or remain in her hands until the girl leaves School, to aid in providing an outfit for her.

When any girl is newly admitted, she must for a time sleep apart from the others, and be under the especial care of a teacher; nor must she be allowed to mix freely with other girls, until it appears that she can do so without injury.

RULES TO BE READ TO EVERY GIRL ON ADMISSION, AND ALWAYS ENFORCED.

The girls who come to this School must remember that they do so in order to enable them to be honest and industrious members of society in this world, and to prepare them for another and a better.

To effect this, the labour and care of their instructors will be of little avail, unless they also use their own earnest efforts to improve themselves, and endeavour at all times to obey God's commandments, "not with eye service, as men pleasers, but as fearing the Lord."

In addition to the laws of God which are contained in His Holy Word, every girl is required to attend strictly to the following rules.

I. Every girl on entering the School is to begin with a new character; she must as much as possible forget the evil of her past life, and on no account ever converse with any of her companions, respecting any of the circumstances attending it.

II. No girl must on any consideration go out of the premises without a pass, unless with a teacher.

III. Strict obedience must be paid to the Superintendent, Matron, and Teachers; respectful attention to superiors, and kind consideration to companions.

IV. All irreverent use of God's name, low and vulgar language, slang words and nick-names, are absolutely forbidden.

V. Order, neatness, and cleanliness are especially to be attended to; "a place for every thing and every thing in its place," being the rule of the house.

VI. Diligence and activity in the work appointed are expected from all: "Diligent in business, serving the Lord."

VII. Great care must be taken of the property of others, and of every thing used in the School. Wilful or careless waste or injury of the school property must be paid for from the girl's earnings.

VIII. No girl must possess any money without the knowledge of the matron.

IX. No books, pictures, are papers of any kind are to be introduced into the School, nor are any letters to be sent or received without the permission of the Superintendent.

X. Whoever knows that these or any other rules laid down are broken, without informing the Matron of the same, becomes herself an accomplice, and is besides doing injury to her companion, by encouraging her in evil.

THE TEACHERS.

Those employed in this work must do it from their hearts, as a sacred duty, to which they will devote themselves with their whole power.

Entire confidence and good understanding must exist among themselves and with the Superintendent, who will endeavour as far as in her lies, to support their authority and influence, with her own.

The girls must always be under watchful care, though treated with confidence.

The teachers must rely more on their own personal influence to secure obedience, and on awakening a sense of duty in the girls, than on any enactments or rules. They must never converse with the girls respecting their past history, which is to be confided to the Superintendent only; and they must carefully avoid any expressions or mode of treatment calculated to awaken resentful feelings in the girls, or make them feel themselves members of a degraded class.

Punishments should never be inflicted arbitrarily, nor with any vindictive feeling; but made as much as possible the natural consequences of actions.

The best teachers will secure obedience and good conduct with the least punishment.

No intoxicating liquors except for medicinal purposes are to be admitted into the house.

REPORT.

The first year of a Reformatory School must not be expected to exhibit any very striking results. It is the work not only of unceasing care and effort, but of time, to establish in the School a satisfactory tone; and of still longer time to be able to place any well-founded confidence in the real reformation of the children.

A Girls' Reformatory School likewise presents in several respects greater difficulties than one for boys. The more susceptible nature of girls renders them, if once drawn into a vicious course, more deeply contaminated than boys; from being more confined within the home and exposed to its impure influences, their intellectual powers have been less developed, and their affections more corrupted; and in their reformatory training no equivalent has yet been discovered for the agricultural labour which is found so important and valuable in that of boys.

The foregoing principles, rules and regulations, which were founded on long experience, have been the basis of the system pursued in the establishment; and in proportion as they have been efficiently and faithfully carried out, they have proved sound, and successful in effecting the proposed end.

The moral and physical state of most of the girls on entering the school has been, as was to be expected, very low, their degraded condition being usually evident in their countenances. The educational acquirements of the larger number at once indicate how completely they have been neglected; 7 only of the whole number, 27, having received such amount of school instruction, otherwise than at the Gaol, as would enable them to read at all fluently and to write even imperfectly ; all of these 7 were sent to the School, not under sentence, but by persons interested in their welfare, and with one exception came from families not belonging to the criminal class, and generally in a respectable condition of life ; yet four of these have shown themselves among the most unprincipled and depraved in the School. Only three of the remaining 20 had received any available amount of instruction, beyond what they had obtained in the Gaol ! While these facts painfully indicate the very neglected condition of most of these unfortunate children. they also prove that mere instruction of the intellect is of little avail to influence the heart and life. Many of the girls exhibit for some time considerable tendency to pilfering, and are not in general those who may be supposed to have been incited to theft by want ; with these the greatest difficulty is experienced : yet a large proportion seem to feel on entering the School, that they desire to gain a character for honesty ; and though exhibiting other bad habits and tendencies, appear to have fallen into crime rather from the circumstances in which they have been placed, than from decidedly vicious inclinations.

Such being the condition of the inmates of the Red Lodge School, a rapid progress will not be expected ; yet a very decided improvement has taken place in all the girls, who have been for some time in the establishment ; and in many cases a remarkable change both in appearance and conduct has been perceptible even in a few months. The change has been frequently remarked by experienced visitors who have seen the School at intervals, as well as by official inspectors.

The serious illness of the Superintendent, which withdrew her from the School during a large part of the year, and the illness and resignation of the Matron under whose care the School had been ably conducted from its commencement, and which involved a complete change of staff, have of course retarded the intellectual and other improvement of the girls ; it may however be safely stated, that they exhibit at present a fair progress and increased capability of receiving instruction, both secular and religious. Considerable attention has been paid to the industrial training. The size and nature of the house afford ample scope for every kind of household work, which, with the cooking, is done entirely by the girls, under the superintendence of the Matron ; the neatness and cleanliness of the premises afford proof of the attention which is habitually paid to this department. The older girls have been taught to wash and iron under an experienced laundress, and now not only do the work of the establishment, but the washing of families, which is taken in both for the improvement of the girls, and to aid the funds of the School. Plain sewing and knitting have been carefully taught, and many girls, who on their first admittance hardly knew the use of a needle, can now sew well, and with interest in their occupation. The girls have done not only their own sewing and that of the establishment, but plain work has also been taken in, and orders for shirts and socks have been executed for two Boys' Reformatory Schools. Such orders will be gladly received.

There are in the School at present 21 girls ; of these, 12 are under legal detention, 2 were sent by Magistrates from private funds ; 7 are sent by friends or relatives. Of all of these hopes may be entertained, though of course there is more prospect of permanent reformation in the younger children. All but 4 have been in prison, some many times. One girl who was sent to Kingswood on conditional pardon had been in prison six times in four different towns. So little was she deterred or reformed by even a year's imprisonment, that when she had been at Kingswood a few months, she absconded with two other girls, and although captured the same evening had already picked six or eight pockets. She has now for some time shewn a complete change of character; she is quite trustworthy, and is continually sent out alone on short errands. She is happily conscious of the dangers she would incur if again in the world, and has no wish to leave the School. The youngest scholar, about 10 years old, was sentenced above a year ago with her brother to 4 years penal servitude for horse stealing! She was a deserted and neglected child, but very clever, and has already made great improvement. These facts painfully indicate what is unhappily generally the case with these unfortunate children, that gross parental misconduct, rather than natural depravity, is the cause of juvenile delinquency. In two cases only out of the 27 can the cause of crime be attributed to complete orphanage; in two others to parental desertion; in almost all the remaining cases it can be directly referred either to the mismanagement so often connected with the fact of there being a step parent, or to flagrant parental vice. It is greatly to be hoped that the provisions now made by government for recovering from the parents part of the cost of the child's maintenance will prove a wholesome check on their culpable neglect.

The following is an account of the 6 girls who have left the School.

- A. In service and giving much satisfaction.
- B. Sent to her uncle in New York, U.S.
- C. Sent back to her Father and doing well.
- D. Absconded and not heard of since.
- E. Sent to service, committed theft, and now under conditional pardon at Dalston Refuge.
- F. Absconded twice, and finally sent back to gaol to finish her original sentence, after extreme misconduct.

The two girls, D. and F. are the only ones who have absconded; shortly after their arrival in the School it was evident that they were not fit subjects for it, having been already familiarised with the vices of the street, and most reluctantly they were given up, for the sake of the other girls. E. had been six times in prison, and was of a peculiarly thievish nature; she was a volunteer, and unwisely permitted to go to service during the illness of the superintendent, after having been only a few months at Red Lodge, and a year and a half at Kingswood. It is to be hoped that these failures will not discourage friends who may be willing to do the christian service of aiding these poor children, by receiving them, when longer tried, as servants in their families.

The funds necessary for the commencement of this school have been kindly supplied by friends, who will, it is hoped, perceive that they have been economically administered. Though so large a demand on private benevolence will not be needed when the school is in full operation, yet it will still be necessary to appeal for aid to those who desire to rescue these poor children, as there must always be greater expenses attendant on such a school than an ordinary one.

In conclusion, while offering grateful thanks to all who have given help and sympathy in the work, the Divine blessing is implored on it, which alone, after we have sowed and watered, can bestow an increase.

MARY CARPENTER,
Superintendent.

Bristol : Dec. 26th, 1855

NOTE.

As the Red Lodge is calculated to receive from 40 to 50 girls, there are at present vacancies for more inmates. Magistrates wishing to send girls there under sentence, (17 and 18 Vict, c. 86); or private individuals desiring admission for children, according to the Rules p. 2, are requested to apply to the Superintendent, "Miss Carpenter, Great George's-street, Bristol."

The following is the Report for 1855, of the Ragged School of St. James's Back, Bristol: we beg the attention of our Dublin Ragged School Managers to it, as it contains a few hints on matters little regarded here, though of great importance:—

REPORT.

The Day School has, through the past year, maintained its numbers, and gone on improving in discipline, and in a manifest good effect produced upon the children. This was particularly noticed, as to their appearance and behaviour on Christmas Day last, when about 220 children of the Juvenile and Infant Schools had dinner in the School-room, after having been shortly examined by Mr. Andrews. The Evening School has fluctuated a good deal, and latterly the numbers have much decreased, partly owing to some changes which Mr. and Mrs. Andrews found it necessary to introduce, and partly to the want of being looked after. In April, the Secretary reported that he had received a communication from the Secretary of the Committee of Council, announcing that "My Lords have given the necessary instructions for placing Mr. Andrews' name on the list of Teachers registered as competent to instruct apprentices." This is important, as giving Mr. Andrews a little step in advance of his former position, but the Committee have very reluctantly come to the conclusion, that from the nature of the School, and its numerous demands upon Mr. Andrews' time, it will be necessary to decline taking any more pupil-teachers at present. Mrs. Andrews, Miss Belford and Miss Oxburgh, have also zealously pursued their labours during the past year, giving the Committee great satisfaction. Miss Fox, the assistant teacher, left the School in August, having the offer of an appointment in a School at Kingswood, and on her recommendation, Miss Griffin came on trial, to fill her place, and has since been regularly appointed to it. Mark Appleby, one of the Pupil Teachers, has given Mr. Andrews and the Committee much trouble and anxiety during the past year. The Secretary has twice been requested to admonish him, and warn him of the consequences of misbehaviour, and neglect of duty. Eliza Parker, the other Pupil Teacher, has gone on steadily and well, fulfilling her duties to the satisfaction of the Teachers. The Girls' Industrial Class has continually improved both in the amount and in the manner of the work done under the diligent teaching of Miss Oxburgh, and the general superintendence of one of the managers, who has continued her exertions in its favour; and also in promoting the instruction of some of the elder girls in cleaning the premises, which at the last report a new experiment, is now a settled and successful part of the operations of the School. Its usefulness will be shewn by the following statements by the lady referred to above. "The Class for learning household duties in cleaning the School premises, consists of six; one of these has continued during the whole of last year; about eleven others have been in the Class for different periods." "They are placed under the Superintendent, who teaches them how to sweep and scrub by both precept and example, shewing them how properly to use their brooms and brushes, by doing work before them. Some of these girls have gone to service. I have called on some of their mistresses, and have learned that they find them more fit for their duties than girls of the same class taken from their homes, without such instruction as they receive at the School."

"Though it is a great advantage to the girls to be taught household duties, and that might seem a sufficient remuneration, yet, in order to secure their regular attendance, and to satisfy their mothers, who do not sufficiently appreciate the advantage, and can find some kind of employment for them at home, they are paid for their services. This payment was first made in money; but that did not answer well. I used to advise the girls to save their earnings and buy clothes. They always said they were going to save in a short time, generally "next week;" but I never found that the period for saving arrived. It struck me that it would be of great service to the sewing class if these girls' wages could be paid into that class, the value being returned to them in clothes. Determining to make the experiment, I told the cleaners at the beginning of 1855, that I should no longer pay them in money but in clothes. I did it in some fear that I had been too absolute; but the result has proved the step to be a good one. The Sewing Class has been greatly benefited by the opening thus made for the sale of its productions, and the cleaners have attended much more regularly. The clothes, which they have been able to purchase with their own earnings have given them a feeling of honourable independence, and no doubt have been convincing arguments to their mothers that it is good for them to be taught to scrub and clean. The Tailoring and Shoemaking classes, from different causes, have not given so much satisfaction. Their future and it is hoped better management is now under the consideration of the Committee.

In the course of the year several applications have been made to Mrs. Andrews for apprentices. In this they have both taken great interest, and have, through the kindness of friends, been very successful in obtaining the necessary funds for that purpose, when they have had with them boys eligible for apprenticeship. Through the bounty of a lady at a distance from Bristol, Mrs. Andrews has also had the means of providing temporary food and lodging for several destitute boys, and thus saving them from crime, and putting them in the way of honestly providing for themselves. The Committee feel that they cannot so well detail this part of the proceedings of the past year as by quoting from the interesting statement given to the Secretary by Mrs. Andrews. "We have six boys from our School learning trades; not all bound apprentice, as some of the masters preferred having them without paying them wages, and teaching them trades while they behave well. W. T. is with a tinman, gets 2s. 6d. a week. J. G. with a carpenter, gets 3s. a week. They will remain until they are 21 if they behave well. M. apprenticed to a shoemaker was in the shoemaking class, and learnt a good deal there; he was a most improving boy. S. is with a carpenter, with the prospect of being apprenticed. M. Y. a boy of 13, has been in the School 18 months, has most of that time been supplied with bread daily—he was in the shoemaking class. Before he came to us he had been in prison for stealing. I think he was half starved. He was a most difficult boy to manage, of a violent temper and using bad language: but for the last six months he has been completely changed for the better. He has also the prospect of being apprenticed to a shoemaker, where he is to be fed and lodged for seven years. T. C. is a boy of 12. He has got his living since he was two years old by going about the streets of Bristol, Bath, Cardiff, and other towns, singing songs, &c. He often slept in a barrel on the Quay. He also used to go to beer houses to sing, with clappers, that is two bones which he struck one against another, as an accompaniment. He came to the School last December in a most starved and wretched condition, with a cough that promised speedy consumption. Every care was taken of him, medicine was got from the Infirmary and he was fed, clothed and lodged: once, shortly after he got better, he left the School for a day and sold his clothes. But he was found before late at night and brought back; so he was not allowed to sleep out: after six months he went off again, to Cardiff, but there he was soon found by H. Mansfield, most kindly taken care of by her, sent back again to Bristol, and has now for some time been improving wonderfully. He is apprenticed to a Tailor and Undertaker, where he is to be fed, lodged and clothed till he is 21. £5 has been paid with him, subscribed by friends to the School."

"Many other boys have got places of work from the School—Three other destitute boys were also fed and lodged for three months last winter, who had never before been used to work. Places were got up for them, and an honest character has since been given of them to the Master of the School. Ten other boys, and one girl, were fed with bread during the year, as was found needful; great care was taken not to let them feel they could be fed at any time without working, till the influence that could be used was used to induce them to work for themselves, and feel independent; and it was not without effect—if they earned a penny, it was brought to be saved towards clothes; and their desire to get places of work was quite striking after a time. We have at present, an orphan boy under our care. He is in place earning 4s. a week. He was brought to us from Prison, he is very promising. During the past year, about £8 has been brought to me, as savings from boys and girls in the Day and Evening Schools. The following parts of a note, accompanying the above statements, will farther explain how anxiously Mr. and Mrs. Andrews have performed this portion of their labour. The facts are truthful, and much more might be said, but I think these particular cases will shew that the labour has not been in vain. * * * There is much to be done in our School yet—The children want individual treatment; to be taken and carried in the arms as lambs not able to walk. P——, who was apprenticed last year, is now able to walk alone. C——, and M——, are now under good guardianship—So I shall try two or three others; but I should not be able to accomplish the work without food, which Mrs. —— has hitherto so kindly supplied.” In addition to the above, it is very gratifying to the Committee to state that a boy, P——, who went out to Australia from the School, with Mrs. Chisholm, sent home £5 to his mother for her use. She has applied it to the apprenticing of a younger son to a carver and gilder, his father paying the cost of the indenture. It will be interesting to the Subscribers to learn that the following Teachers have been wholly or partially trained in our School. Miss Williams, who for three or four years conducted a large School with much approbation, and is now School Mistress at the Red Lodge Reformatory. H. Mansfield, conducting a Reformatory School at Cardiff, with great success. Mr. Grant, master of the Counterslip Reformatory School. Mr. Morris, Master of a School at Thame. Sarah Paddock, Assistant Teacher under Mr. and Mrs. Morris, at Thame. Miss Fox, Assistant Teacher at a School at Kingswood. The memorial to the Committee of Council on Education, mentioned in the last Report, after waiting a considerable time for some favourable opportunity of presenting to my Lords by Deputation, it was sent to the Secretary of the Committee of Council in September last, together with a similar memorial from Gloucester, which had been forwarded by Miss Carpenter for such purpose. To these memorials no answer has been received. The Committee of the School look forward however to the establishment of an Educational Department in the Government, with an assurance that when it has got into full operation, the peculiar wants of Ragged and other Schools for the most neglected portion of the Juvenile population, will meet due attention. In October, M. Demetz, the distinguished and philanthropic principal of the Agricultural colony of Mettray for the Reformation of Young Criminals, visited the School, he expressed himself much satisfied with what he saw. His reception was quite enthusiastic from the children, who had been previously made acquainted with his noble and self-denying labour. The Manager of the Lending Library reports, that it has gone on successfully during the past year, fully answering the expectations of those who have contributed the books, and affording encouragement for its further extension. The Committee gratefully receive the kindness of those friends to the School, who have from time to time, sent out of the Funds of the School. The Committee now commend their Report to the Subscribers and Friends of the School, in the hope that what they have done will meet with approval, and the School in all its branches, to the blessing of Him, without whom all labour is in vain.

NUMBERS OF ATTENDANCE.

AVERAGE ATTENDANCE

On the Books.				Morning.	Afternoon.
					Tailoring,	20
Boys and Girls, 180	...	180	...	76	do. from Infant School	10—30
					Shoemaking,	8
					Sewing, &c.	40
					do. from Infant School	10—50
Infants,	...	145	...	78	...	...	Total 73
Total		...	325	...	154	...	...	161

EVENING CLASSES.

On the Books.		Average Attendance
Boys,	60	...	28
Girls,	40	...	24
Total		...	52

If one of our readers were to walk through the Dublin Market known as Smithfield, and if, observing the large building at the head of the Market, he were to enquire, from any of the numerous hangers-on of the locality, the title of the building, he would be told that it is "The Daypo." Well, so it was the depot, but within the walls of that depot there is now being tried one of the best-designed and most philosophically planned experiments for the complete reformation of Convicts, ever read of or witnessed by us.

When, in the year 1854, the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland inspected the establishments placed under their direction, they found, as their first Report declares, 3,427 prisoners confined, although there was accommodation for only 3,210.

With prisons thus situated, and without hope of being enabled to draft away the convicts to a penal settlement, the Directors first endeavoured to enlarge the accommodation, and thus, and by classification, resolved to attempt reformation. By an official communication, from the Superintendent's Office in West Australia, they found that, owing to the want of system in our Irish Prisons, the 600 convicts sent out in the ships "Robert Small" and "Phoebe Dunbar," seemed incapable of comprehending the nature of moral agencies; they knew nothing of the necessity of prudence, and self-reliance, as means to extricate themselves from the consequences of their former errors, and the Superintendent declared—"coercion appears to be the only force they are capable of appreciating." In a word, they were unfit for the world, by reason of their crimes; they were unfit for the penal colony by reason of prison mismanagement at home. Under these circumstances, and knowing that from want of good arrangement, the chief mischief springs, and knowing too, that by sending such Convicts from our Gaols to our Colonies they but retarded the advancement of our dependencies, the Directors, being of that class of officials so dear to the Administrative Reform Association, and whose qualities are pithily expressed in the motto—Right Men in the Right Place, set vigorously about their work of reform, and we shall permit them to relate, in their own words, some particulars of the course adopted:—

"The same feeling which prevents our inflicting on a colony convicts who have not been subjected to a proper course of prison discipline, also precludes our bringing forward prisoners for discharge in this country on Tickets of Licence as in England. We consider such Tickets of Licence to be a sort of guarantee to the community, that in consequence of a prisoner having been subjected to a proper course of prison discipline and reformatory treatment, he is considered a fit subject to be received and employed by those outside the prison.

Such reformatory course not having hitherto been pursued in this country, we have not felt ourselves justified in recommending the issue of Tickets of Licence.

On commencing our duties, we found the most pressing evil to be remedied was, the indiscriminate association of the young with those more advanced in years and crime; instead, therefore, of awaiting the completion of the Juvenile Penal Reformatory Prison, (a period, probably, of eighteen months or two years), we immediately selected all the male convicts under seventeen years of age, and placed them at Mountjoy and Philipstown Prisons. In the former there are separate sleeping cells, and convenient accommodation for working in association during the day. We have every reason to be fully satisfied with the results as evinced by the conduct and industry of the prisoners located here. In the latter there were facilities for separating the juveniles from the adults; but similar advantages to those possessed by Mountjoy were not here presented, and the effects have not been so favourable; however we hope that great improvement will result from arrangements which we are now enabled to make in consequence of the barrack (situated within the walls of the prison), having been recently transferred to the convict department, and by which the prisoners will be placed under more effective supervision.

Taking into consideration the inefficient state of the educational departments of the Convict Depots, and the importance which should be attached to them in this country, where the causes of crime are principally ignorance and destitution, we have felt it our duty to recommend that all the Government Prison Schools should be placed under the inspection of the National Board of Education. We are much indebted to the Right Hon. Alexander Macdonnell, the Resident Commissioner, and P. J. Keenan, Esq., for having been the means of securing the services of two gentlemen, as Head Schoolmasters, for Mountjoy and Philipstown Prisons. For the former we have selected Mr. McGauran, late master of the Andean Free Day School, in Cumberland-street, who has had great experience in training as well as teaching, amongst a class of persons from which the criminals may be expected to emanate.*

For the latter we have chosen Mr. Donaghy, (late master of Cork Union School), who has a well earned reputation, and possesses qualifications we have thought it all-important to require. Our intention is to train our different masters from time to time, under these gentlemen, and thus ensure a uniformity of system throughout the Government Prison Schools. We trust, therefore, the experience they have had will exercise a beneficial influence through the different convict establishments.

In order further to increase the influence which we trust these teachers will exercise over the convicts under their care, we thought fit to recommend the Government to allow them to visit the different penal and reformatory establishments in England, and practically acquaint themselves with the systems adopted therein, thus giving them an opportunity of forming opinions on a broad basis, which would render them more efficient for the reformation and training of the prisoners. Permission to carry out this recommendation was readily accorded by Lord St. Germans, and we have reason to believe the result will be most advantageous to the service.

We have found it necessary to call for special reports on the character and capabilities of the different officers of the prisons, with a view to remove those who are not qualified for so important a position; and regret to add that we have been compelled to recommend the dismissal of several warders for drunkenness, a crime that cannot be tolerated for an instant in a prison, where a good moral example should operate at one of the principal elements of reformation."

---

* See two admirable reports, by this gentleman, on the Andean School, and printed in THE IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Vol. IV., No. 14, p. 1237.—Ed.

Having thus arranged the prisons under their management, the Directors were in a condition to observe, closely and accurately, the result of their labors; and having carefully watched the whole working of the system adopted, and after consultation with his colleagues, Captain Crofton, the Chairman of the Board of Directors, resolved to test the following plan of the gradual restoration to liberty of the Ticket-of-Leave men.

Finding the Smithfield Prison was no longer needed as a Prison, he stated to all employed within its walls, that he was about to use it in a peculiar manner, and that turnkeys, so called, would be no longer needed. That he was about to collect, from all the Convict establishments in Ireland, the men of the very best characters as prisoners, and who were entitled, at an early day, to Tickets-of-Leave. That these men were to receive the suit of clothes given to Ticket-of-Leave-Men on quitting prison, that he would bring these men to Smithfield, that he would not make them free men, nor yet would he by any means let them consider themselves prisoners. That each one of these men, ignorant of a trade, should be taught one. That no man should leave the Establishment until, if possible, some means of honest livelihood had been obtained for him. That every man should perform his part in the Establishment, some cooking, some sweeping, all useful. That each of the turnkeys should know some trade, and that he should act as foreman of his craft, and sit and work with his pupils—in fact, that all within the Establishment should be usefully employed; and that the following rules should be observed:—

SMITHFIELD PRISON.

DAILY ROUTINE OF DUTY FOR EXEMPLARY CONVICTS.

A.M.

- |    |    |  |
|----|----|--|
| H. | M. |  |
| 5  | 0  | Ring Bell—Fold Bedding—Clean Cells.          |
| —  | 30 | Officers' Parade—Unlock Cells.               |
| —  | 35 | Empty Night Buckets—Prisoners Wash.          |
| —  | 45 | Assemble to Prayer.                          |
| 6  | —  | Ring Bell—Commence Labor.                    |
| 8  | 0  | „ „ Breakfast—Exercise afterwards.           |
| —  | 40 | „ „ Officers' Parade—Examine Mem. Books, &c. |
| —  | 45 | Prisoners' resume labor.                     |

P.M.

- |   |    |                                  |
|---|----|----------------------------------|
| 2 | 0  | Ring Bell—Dinner—Exercise after. |
| — | 55 | „ „ Officers' Parade.            |

H.	M.		H.	M.
3	0	Prisoners resume labor.
5	0	Ring Bell—Commence Lecture.
7	0	" " Supper.
—	30	Commence Reading—Prayer, &c.
8	45	Ring Bell—Prisoners to cells and lock up.
9	0	Out Lights.
Time—	Fold Bedding—Cleaning Cells—Wash, &c.	...	—	45
Meals—	Breakfast and Exercise forty-five minutes, Dinner and Exercise one hour, Supper thirty minutes	...	2	15
Lecture, Reading, Prayer, and preparing for Bed	...		3	45
Labor	...	...	9	15

From 5 A.M. to 9 P.M. ... 16 —

Shave on Wednesdays and Saturdays, Saturday morning naked feet examined.

Saturday Evening, Clean Shirts, Stockings and Neckkerchiefs issued. Sundays and Holydays, Prayer, Reading and Exercise, (walking.)

To Pump Water, Clean Wards and Yards, Whitewash and assist Cook, taken as required in rotation daily from Net-makers and Mat Pickers.

These rules came into operation on the first day of February, in the present year. At that date the inmates of Smithfield numbered 54, inspected by 8 officers. Of these 54 inmates two proved themselves unsuited for the Institution, as they required watching, and for this there is no time to spare.

On the 21st of February, there were 8 officers, and 48 inmates of whom we have the following return of employments for that day—the other 4 men being, we believe, in hospital :—

Shoemakers,	...	...	...	13
Tailors,	...	...	...	5
Netmakers,	...	...	...	13
Carpenters,	...	...	...	2
Brushmakers,	...	...	...	6
Nailor,	...	...	...	1
Weaver,	...	...	...	1
Picking and Teazing Mats,	...	...	...	5
Store Assistant,	...	...	...	1
Cook,	...	...	...	1
				—
				48
				—

The Net-makers, Mat-workers, and Brush-makers, are not employed at very well paying occupations, but many of these men are old, and incapable of learning the other trades ; and these men being of good conduct could not be excluded from the benefits of the institution.

Net-making is a trade which may be learned in a week, or less ; and any body with fingers capable of ordinary work can earn at it four or five shillings a week ; and the knowledge of the fact that an old, reformed man is able to earn this, or some such sum, may induce his friends to receive him kindly on his discharge from Smithfield. To this topic, however, we shall presently have occasion to return.

Captain Crofton, however, was not content with these excellent aids to Reformation ; he knew that where the life of the Good Prisoner ends, the life of the Reformed Man begins, and he resolved that he would not permit the inmates of Smithfield to go forth without some species of knowledge of Common Things. All their hours, to five o'clock in the afternoon were fully employed, but from that hour till seven o'clock, the time of supper, was open.

Being always anxious to secure the services of teachers trained by the Board of National Education in Ireland, Captain Crofton applied to Mr. Kavanagh, the Head Inspector of National Schools for the Dublin District, and that most able and efficient officer, with a readiness which shows his discernment and judgment, named Mr. Organ, who had been for many years engaged as manager and teacher of adult evening schools. It was not Captain Crofton's intention that Mr. Organ should teach, as ordinary pupils are taught, from books. Men who work from five o'clock in the morning are not prepared to sit down to study lessons from school books at five o'clock in the evening. But, in Smithfield, through the admirable system of lectures, the school hour is looked forward to as the pleasantest duty of the day.

Mr. Organ does not treat his audience as prisoners or as children, he treats them as men, as he was accustomed to treat his pupils in his night-school. He does not make speeches, he tells them of Common Things, of the air, the earth, the planets, the tides ; of the animate and inanimate world ; of physical geography ; of the British Empire and its Colonies ; of the rates of wages, and of the opening for honest industry in each of these dependencies. He tells them and explains to them, the rules of grammar and of arithmetic ; and as ignorance, through early neglect, is not shameful in his eyes, he has so far ingratiated himself with his class, that any man who does not clearly comprehend any portion of the discourse, at once holds up his hand, and at this signal the teacher leaving his desk, goes to the place where the man sits, and explains the difficulty to him, and does not leave him till perfectly satisfied that all is understood.

Thus the time, from five o'clock till half-past six, is passed, and from that hour till seven, Mr. Organ is engaged in conversation with the men, and in inspecting their copies. And each Saturday is devoted to an examination of the men on the lectures of the preceding week.

When he entered upon his duties Mr. Organ discovered that some of the men were unable to read, and finding that amongst those in the Institution were a school-master and two young men of very good education and aptitude for teaching, he employed the three in instructing the less advanced men in writing and reading.

A selection of books on useful subjects is open to the men after Lecture, and those who are able to write may employ themselves in correspondence with their friends, the letters of course passing through the hands of the Governor.*

When an inmate of Smithfield desires to obtain a situation or employment, amongst those whom he formerly knew, he names some person whom he thinks will accept his services, and, forthwith, if he be unable to write himself, a letter is written for him addressed to the person named by him. Let us, for example, take a case in point, the man being unable to write.

The clerk addresses a letter to John Murphy, Esq., of ———, and begs to inform him that James Mahony, now in Smithfield, and who was formerly in his employment, is desirous of again entering his service, and that any information which Mr. Murphy can give relating to Mahony's family will be acceptable.

* The Directors of Convict Prisons have been particularly fortunate in their selection of Head Masters. At the Mountjoy Prison they have one of the best men for his office it was possible to select in Ireland. It should be always borne in mind that a Prison Teacher cannot show results such as an ordinary teacher ought to produce. The best result of a Prison Teacher's instruction is just that of which he cannot produce results in tabulated returns. We can trace his work only in the general character of the prisoner. Plainly, and in fact, the Prison Teacher is as the Prison Chaplain—with the schoolmaster's duties added to those of the clergyman.

This letter is useful in more ways than one ; it may gain a place for Mahony, and if it fail in this, it may gain information as to the circumstances and reputation of his family, and thus, if he go back to his native place, the Directors know pretty accurately his chances of living honestly, and are able to judge if it be necessary to give the Police authorities a hint of the man's character. As a general rule, however, the men are advised not to return amongst their friends, unless the friends be honest reputable people, or unless the man can obtain immediate employment.

No employer need engage one of these men without the fullest information being afforded. The Special books show the sentence, offence, previous character, and prison character of the man. The books, showing his conduct in Smithfield, are open to all, and are kept carefully, exactly, and plainly.

The men themselves keep books showing their earnings, as every good artizan or workman should do, and thus a spirit of self knowledge and self dependence is acquired, for each man knows that if in his own book he enters his earnings, so, as accurately and as closely is his good or bad conduct registered by the officers. If he gain the best marks for one branch of conduct, he must strike a balance if he be but good or moderate in others : he is taught that he must strive to be the best of the best, and that in thus obtaining a position none is so deeply interested as himself ; that on himself alone must he depend, and of himself must he work out his progress to excellence.

When he leaves Smithfield his earnings are not given to him ; he must return at the end of six months and claim them in person, unless he can show good reason for his absence, and thus the Directors hope to gain some knowledge of each man's conduct during the most trying period of his life, the first six months after he quits the Institution ; and thus too, they hope to avoid the just strictures passed by Mr. Recorder Hill, the late Mr. Sergeant Adams, the Rev. Mr. Clay, the Rev. Mr. Field, M. Demetz, and others,* upon the hasty and indiscriminate manner in which Tickets-of-Leave have been granted in England, to those convicts who were considered to be GOOD MEN when they were merely GOOD PRISONERS.

We do not mean to contend that all the inmates of Smith-

---

* See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Vol. V., No. 20, Record.

field will turn out satisfactorily, if even the number should never exceed fifty, which we hope it never may, during the next twelve months; but complete success in this plan of Reformation can only be secured by the active agency of a Prisoners' Aid Institute and by a Patronage Society. Their help would make all things safe: but, "even without them," said one of the Directors to us a few days ago, "we shall effect this much,—we shall be tolerably sure of those to whom we are warranted in giving Tickets-of-Leave, through offers of employment; and the remainder, who are less fortunate, will have the benefit of their good conduct, in being better treated than in the ordinary prisons, and kept well conducted by the hope, from day to day, of some visitor to Smithfield offering employment; and, as their work can be seen, I anticipate this will come to pass: if it fail, they have only a few months longer to wait before their release."

But, it may be asked, do we think this Institution can be made self-supporting? We think it can, that is, we believe it will pay all expenses, extra ordinary prison cost; but if it exceeded these expenses we should still look upon the Smithfield Institution as more than repaying all charges, in its saving of the "waste of human suffering," which is committed by keeping men in prison one hour after they are found fit to leave it.

These objections as to cost are but the old arguments urged against Mr. Pearson's scheme of Prison Management, and which occupied so much attention a few years since; objections and arguments fully answered in the following letter of the Recorder of Birmingham, and which we here insert, as it is almost unknown, save to those who are deeply interested in this, the most important of all the questions connected with Prison Discipline and Management:—

Chalcotts, Hampstead, January 27, 1849.

Sir,—As unavoidable absence from London will deprive me of the honour of presiding at the meeting to-morrow, I have put into writing the observations which I should have made at the close of the debate from the chair, in the hope that you will permit them to be read. One object I apprehend is to form and to declare by vote an opinion upon a plan for the treatment of prisoners laid before us by Mr. Pearson, by which, as he alleges, the maximum of benefit to society may be obtained at the minimum of cost, and which, while it does not disregard the deterrent principle of punishment, is yet consistent with humanity to the sufferers.

In preparing the way for the reception of his own plans, Mr. Pearson has been led to criticise, with some severity, those of others, which has induced a discussion not at all times free from topics of a painful nature. The indulgence felt to be due to those who are excited by the ardour of debate, or smarting under attack, will be claimed for himself, and consequently granted to his opponents, by each of the disputants; but the meeting, which has had no temptation to resist, would, I respectfully submit, be without excuse if it should suffer personal questions to withdraw its attention from the object for which it is assembled, or permit the value of its opinion to be lessened by taking a side in any controversy where neutrality is not inconsistent with its design in assembling.

Now the advocates of the systems attacked will admit that they are expensive, and it consequently follows that if the good effects which they insist are attained by them, can be had by cheaper means, those means ought to be adopted. Again, Mr. Pearson, as I understand, does not wish to pledge the meeting, beyond a vote that enough has been shown in favour of his plan to justify a Parliamentary investigation, with a view to a trial on such a scale as will subject its merits to a conclusive test. If so, it may well happen that many who are not prepared to condemn existing plans, are yet desirous to institute experiments, as thinking it probable that in a science so encumbered with difficulties, and on which the public mind is so divided, the course of improvement has not yet arrived at its termination.

I would, therefore, observe, for the consideration of the meeting, that the duty which they have to perform in declaring their opinion may be summed up under two heads:—

1.—Do the principles on which Mr. Pearson's plan is framed so approve themselves to our reason as to make the plan desirable if it can be reduced to practice, in the event of Mr. Pearson's estimates passing the ordeal of a Parliamentary investigation?

2.—Is there a sufficient prospect of practical success to render it prudent to incur the cost, and to await the issue of an experiment?

To the extent of answering these questions in the affirmative, I am myself not only willing but anxious to go. Further than this I am loth to pledge myself. I proceed to give my reasons for concurrence in the plan; compressing them into the shortest space, and omitting everything not absolutely necessary to my purpose.

The first object in view is the diminution of crime; the second, the diminution of expense.

As to the first, considering that after a longer or a shorter period, criminals must be suffered to return to society, either here or abroad, the diminution of crime will greatly depend on the reformation of the guilty, it being notorious that punished offenders furnish a very large proportion of the criminal population; and that, moreover, by their corrupting influence, they replenish its ranks with new recruits to an enormous extent. The plan, therefore is, as it ought to be, reformatory. But one object of punishment is to deter by the example of pain, as consequent on crime. Now, for the attainment of this end, it is obviously sufficient that the pain should be inflicted. Whether it be inflicted solely for punishment, or as incidental to the means adopted for reformation must be immaterial. As far as deterrents are efficient, the deterring effect will be governed by the amount of the pain, and not by the purpose which induces its infliction. That reformation will always be a painful process, until some chloroform for the mind shall be discovered; cannot be doubted, when the causes of crime are kept in view. These are the ignorance or perversion of moral and religious truths, impatience of steady labour, intemperance, and lastly, that absence of the power of self-government which leaves the individual at the mercy of evil companions, and a prey to the slightest temptations. Consider, then, what a conflict between old vices and new duties instantly begins—what a revolution in all the criminals' thoughts and actions; from habitual indolence he passes to severe and long continued labour—from sensuality to rigid abstinence—from riotous mirth, drowning reflection by day and by night, to hours of solitude, to the absence of all gaiety, and to a sustained sobriety of demeanour when associated with others. This picture would, however, be much more vivid if we could see it with the eyes of the criminal. If we, ourselves, were called on to choose between two such miserable alternatives as the mode of life of criminals in an ancient gaol, and in Mr. Pearson's prison, we should not hesitate to adopt the latter, hard and even dreadful as I am sure we should find our lot; because no suffering would be so terrible to us, as that which would flow from association with inveterate offenders, whose minds were unindued, and who were triumphing in their resistance to the penalties of the law. But let the veteran criminal have his choice, and I am persuaded that the chains, the filth, and the pestilence of our former prisons, left as he was in the days of those abominations to the indulgence of many of his worst habits and even his most odious vices, would not possess one-half the deterrent power over his mind as would be exercised by any reformatory system deserving the name—certainly as would be exercised by that of Mr. Pearson.

Being, for these and many other reasons, of opinion, that to reach the ultimate object of punishment, namely, the diminution of crime, the only course to be pursued with criminals is to effect their reformation, I now proceed to deal exclusively with that subject. And here I greatly spare your time and my own labour, by avowing myself a disciple of Captain Macconochie, who has himself laid his system before you. I agree with him, that the release of a prisoner should not be governed by the almanack, but should depend on his own conduct; that separate confinement ought to be the first stage (but only a stage) of the prison treatment; that while prisoners, congregated in a mob, are in the worst possible position for improvement, yet that a prisoner prepared by separate confinement for the change, will be all the better for such regulated association as Captain Macconochie's system provides. And, moreover, that the society of his equals is necessary to the prisoner's training; and that it is not reasonably to be expected that a prisoner can acquire in solitude habits of self-government which will enable him to resist temptation and undue influence in the world at large. I agree, too, that the prisoner, having credit for the product of his labour, ought to be charged with the cost of his maintenance and training, to which I would add the cost of indemnifying the party injured by his offence.

Mr. Pearson's plan of agricultural labour within the prison walls appears to me well adapted to carry Captain Macconochie's system into effect. But I would suggest an extension.

Before the complete release of the prisoner, I would employ him outside of the walls, as at Mettray, and at the Warwickshire Asylum. If he be really reformed, he will not abuse his power of escape. He will know that his certificate of character will depend on his standing this test of his capacity for self-control, and that a certificate given after such a trial will be an invaluable testimonial, and enable him to re-enter society without those fearful odds against him which too often reduce him to despair, and finally urge his relapse into crime.

On the other hand, such an escape might be created a legal offence, and as experience abundantly shows, prisoners escaping are generally re-taken after a very short interval. In cases of escape the task of reformation, with all its sufferings, would be recommenced. Thus the evils attendant upon escape would, at the stage in which the prisoner is exposed to the temptation, strongly operate upon his mind, which, if he should yield, society would not be long subjected to the mischief of his being at large.

One feature, and one feature only, of Mr. Pearson's plan remains to be touched upon. Mr. Pearson aims at establishing a self-supporting prison. Of his perfect success I cannot be confident; but I am far from being without hope. The example of the United States is full of encouragement; and my brother, Mr. Frederick Hill, whose time has now for thirteen years been exclusively engaged in the inspection of prisons, and in devising plans for their improvement, and for the improvement of prison discipline, has long entertained the opinion that the object is not impracticable at home. Of its desirability no doubt will be entertained. Nor is it desirable merely in economical point of view. No prison can be self-supporting, which is not conducted on the soundest principles. The prisoners must produce much, and waste nothing. A wise parsimony must prevail over the cost of buildings, and the number of officers and in the internal arrangements, but only a wise parsimony.

The prisoners must be kept in health of body, or they cannot be good producers. They must be kept in health of mind, or they will not. In short, a self-supporting prison would prove by a clear tangible test, that it must be a good prison in every sense of the term.

My remarks have extended to an unsuspected length; but they are, I am happy to say, now brought to a close, and the pleasing duty only remains of thanking the numerous and most respectable audiences over which I have presided for the kind support I have received from them in the discharge of my duties.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

M. D. HILL.

To the Chairman of the Meeting of Mr. Pearson's Plan for Prisons and Prison Discipline.

Most of our readers will, we presume, recollect a prospectus which we inserted in the Record of the twentieth number of this REVIEW, page lvii, in the following terms:—

At a Preliminary Meeting of Friends and Promoters of the Reformation of Youthful Offenders, held at Hardwicke Court, Gloucester, on Tuesday, October 30th, 1855—present, * T. Barwick Baker, Esq., in the Chair.

- Rt. Hon. Sir J. Pakington, Bart. M.P., Westwood Park.
- 1. Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart. M.P. Pyne, Exeter.
- Sir Thomas Winnington, Bart. M.P. Stanford Court, Worcester.
- Sir Harry Verney, Bart. Clayton, Bucks.
- G. H. Bengough, Esq. The Ridge, Wotton-under-edge.
- T. B. Monck, Esq. Coley Park, Reading.
- 2. Rev. H. J. Barton, Wicken Rectory, Stony Stratford
- J. G. Blencowe, Esq. The Hooke, Lewes.
- Rev. Prebendary Fane, Warminster.
- Rev. S. Turner, Philanthropic Farm School, Reigate.
- Townshend Mainwaring, Esq. Galtvaenan, Denbigh.
- Miss Carpenter, George-st., Bristol
- 3. G. W. Latham, Esq. Bradwall Hall, Sandbach.
- G. A. Lowndes, Esq. Barrington Hall, Harlow.
- T. G. Curtler, Esq. Bevere, near Worcester.
- J. Fish, Esq. Malton, near York.
- C. H. Bracebridge, Esq. Atherstone Hall, Atherstone.
- 4. E. B. Wheatley, Esq. Cote Wall, Mirfield.
- 5. C. Castleman, Esq. St. Ives, Ringwood.
- Charles Ratcliff, Esq. Edgbaston, Birmingham.
- J. C. Mansel, Esq. Spetisbury, Blandford.
- Rev. H. Hatch.*

RESOLVED,—1st, That it is expedient that an Association of the friends of Reformatory Agency be now formed, to be designated "THE REFORMATORY UNION," of which the following shall be the principal objects:—To collect and diffuse information bearing on the Reformation of Criminals—to promote the formation of Reformatory Institutions where needed, and generally to advance the further practical developement of the Reformatory Movement—to consider and promote such legislative measures as are still required for the better care and reformation of youthful offenders—to assist in the placing out and subsequent guardianship and protection of young persons leaving Reformatory Institutions—to consider and promote means for the employment and restoration to society of discharged prisoners—to promote the practical training and preparation of efficient Masters and Teachers for Reformatory Institutions.

---

* 1. See IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, No. 17, RECORD, p. xxii. 2. Ib. No. 19, xxxvi. 3. Ib. No. 19, li. 4. Ib. lii, lv. 5. Ib. lvii, also RECORD of No. 18, and Mr. Recorder Hall's Lecture at end of same. The names thus * marked are so frequently, and justly, and necessarily referred to in the REVIEW and in the RECORD, that particular references would only encumber this note.—ED.

- 2.—That those here present be constituted a Provisional Committee to forward the objects of the Association—and to promote and obtain Subscriptions—with power to add to their number.
- 3.—That an annual Subscription of not less than 10s. 6d., or a Donation of not less than £5. 5s. constitute a Membership.
- 4.—That G. H. Bengough, Esq. be elected Honorary Secretary and Treasurer, with power to employ such assistance as he may find necessary; and that he be requested to summon a meeting of the Committee as soon as the course of the Society's proceedings shall be sufficiently organised—not later than January next.
- 5.—That the offer of the use of the Office of the Philanthropic Society, in Crown Court, Threadneedle-street, for the purposes of the Association until Christmas next, be accepted with thanks.
- 6.—That all communications be addressed to the Secretary, at Gloucester.
- 7.—That a General Meeting of the Members of the Association be held in London, in May next.

(Signed)

T. B. LI. BAKER,

CHAIRMAN.

One could scarcely suppose that out of this prospectus that awful fiend—THE RELIGIOUS DIFFICULTY—could arise; but it did arise, and spring up a regular full-blown, rampant demon. The chief creator of this offensive and mischievous imp is the editor of The Ragged School Union Magazine,—like that John Styles, dissected more than forty years ago by Sydney Smith, who called every body, unfriendly to Methodism, an Infidel and an Atheist, and who expected “that we should speak of Brother Carey as we would speak of St. Paul; and treat with equal respect the miracles of the Magazine and the Gospel.”

This representative of Brother Carey, with the above inserted prospectus before him, printed in the January number of his Magazine, the following editorial article, lecturing Mr. Barwick Baker, and many others, with a pragmatic unction, quite worthy of John Styles or Andrew Fairservice :—

REFORMATORY UNION.

In our last number we furnished a few particulars precisely in the same form in which they reached us of the formation of a central Society for promoting the establishment and increasing the efficiency of Reformatory institutions throughout the country, and designated the Reformatory Union. On carefully looking at those particulars, it will be apparent to our readers, that, for some unexplained reason or other, there is a studied omission of all references to the word of God as the basis of religious teaching. In fact, the religious element of the training to be imparted in the Reformatories, so far as this new Union is concerned, is altogether ignored. This omission is ominous and serious, and, if premeditated and persisted in, will, we augur, prove fatal to the usefulness, if not to the very existence of the new-born effort. We, however, hope the omission has been caused from inadvertency, arising from the undue haste with which the friends at Hardwick Court resolved themselves into a central Society. We say undue haste, and had almost written unseemly haste, for on further inquiry we are informed by Mr. Hardwick* Baker, at whose house the Union was formed, that its promoters had held no preliminary meeting, with a view to ascertain the necessity for such a central body, nor had they put forth any effort to bring into a focus the views of the Reformatory friends in general upon the subject. The meeting at Hardwick, therefore, was unknown to the great body of friends aiding the Reformatory movement; the consequence was, that at that meeting only six institutions were represented, which is not more than an eleventh of the whole.

Somewhat differently were the friends in London converging to the same central point. Early in 1855, the London friends of Ragged School Refuges, feeling the great need of more extended and systematic efforts for the reformation of juvenile criminals, desired to ascertain the feelings, views, and desires of their co-workers throughout the kingdom, for which purpose they addressed a circular to the officers of every Reformatory institution whose address could in any way be obtained, inviting them to a meeting for the consideration of important questions in relation to the work they had undertaken. This meeting was held last March at 3, Sussex-square. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, and representatives from thirty institutions were present. The subject mostly discussed on this occasion was the necessity for amending the Youthful Offenders' Act of the previous session. This having received full consideration, arrangements were made for bringing the subject before Parliament, and the result was the amendment of the Act as given in our volume for last year, pages 195 and 196. Other subjects came under consideration in the morning and evening conferences, and with a view to give effect and permanency to this effort a Committee was formed. Among other duties, this Committee was to gather information upon the subject of Reformatories from all parts of the three kingdoms, to mature plans based upon that information that would tend to render the movement both extensive and effective, and was empowered to call a general meeting or aggregate conference, early in 1856, of friends interested in the question. This Committee has met from time to time, and having arranged its plans, is now prepared to lay its report before its constituency, as may be gathered from the circular now lying before us and of which the following is a copy:—

[Proposed Form.]

3, SUSSEX SQUARE, HYDE PARK, LONDON.

SIR,

December, , 1855.

The Committee appointed at the Conference on Reformatories held here in March last have resolved to summon another and larger Conference on the same subject, and they beg to invite your attendance on the occasion. The Earl of Shaftesbury has kindly consented to preside. The Conference will assemble at 2 o'clock, p.m., on January , 1856, at the Hanover Square Rooms, and the following are the objects of the Meeting :—

---

* Barwick.—ED. I. Q. R.

1. To receive a Report of the Sub Committee as to the increase in the number of Reformatories since the last Conference, the advances made in legislation, and the general progress of the question.
2. To consider the propriety of establishing in London a permanent Organization or Society, as a centre of information and a means of united action on the subject of Juvenile Reformation.

Resolutions will be proposed and seconded on these subjects, as arranged by the Committee, after which they will be open to discussion—on the understanding that those who speak will address themselves briefly to the question under consideration, and abide by the decision of the Chairman on points of order.

An early answer will oblige, as to your intention to comply with this invitation.

I have the honour to be,

For the Committee,

Your obedient servant,

ROBT. HANBURY, Junr.

CONVENER.

These movements in London could not be unknown to the gentlemen who met in Gloucestershire, as two of the number, the Rev. S. Turner, and also Mr. Hardwicke Baker, the chairman, were members of, and present at, the London Conference; the former, being also a member of the London Committee, had been summoned to each of its sittings. We hold, therefore, that the Reformatory Union, as framed at Hardwick, is, to say the least, premature; and, consequently, is very imperfect in its formation, and defective in its constitution. To remedy which, the London Committee invited a deputation from the Union to confer upon the subject, and if possible to agree upon an improved basis upon which the two bodies might amalgamate, and for the future form an effective and useful body. This conference was held on December 21st last, in Mr. Macgregor's Chambers, Temple, when, after a lengthened discussion it was agreed to hold another conference in February next, and in the meantime for each body to ascertain the views of the parties they represent on the question at issue.

For the present, it must suffice for us to say that the Reformatory Union as now framed, cannot be recommended to our friends. It must, to be effective, be remodelled. This body is not the only one, unfortunately for themselves, that have made the effort to amalgamate the ever repellent elements of Trinitarianism with Unitarianism; Protestantism with Romanism; these are the rocks towards which we see the Reformatory Union drifting so soon after its launch towards the public for support, and on which, unless proper means be adopted, it must, like all its predecessors, be dashed to pieces. We earnestly recommend to its friends, while they have the opportunity, to revise their constitution, and for which purpose we cannot do better than advise the adoption of a rule to the following effect—“That this Union shall exclude no denomination of Evangelical Christians, and that those Reformatories only be received into Union where the authorised version of the Word of God is the sole basis of religious teaching.”

To this production, Mr. Baker replied as follows:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RAGGED SCHOOL UNION MAGAZINE.

Hardwicke Court, Gloucester.

January, 1856.

SIR,

I have just seen an article in your Magazine on the Reformatory Union, the writer of which appears so far to misunderstand; probably the facts and certainly the intention of the said Union, that you must allow me a reply.

The facts are these—I attended Mr. Hanbury's Conference last year, and thought the design good, but that even more good might be done if the members of it or as many as possible could be brought together, not merely to sit for some hours round a room in debate, but to mix freely for three or four days in converse man with man, and form an intimacy which might lead to future communication.

I therefore asked my friends, as the writer of your article truly supposes—without any previous deliberation on the subject of forming a Union—or for any other purpose than that which I think has been happily achieved, namely, the bringing into a state of friendly and frequent communication all those who met on that occasion.

But the manner in which I wished my friends to meet, had certainly this disadvantage—that it limited our numbers. My fortune is not large—my house is in proportion—I filled every garret and nursery in my house—but I could only find room for twenty.—Those twenty, I asked from all the Counties who had either opened schools or were preparing to open them. There were many who unfortunately were prevented from coming, but I think that as it happened there was hardly a County which was not asked, and I just filled my twenty beds.

I had intended to have had little of regular discussion, believing that the more useful object would be gained simply by promoting intimacy among the managers. But some of them wished for it, and the very wet weather of the first two days favoured their views, and we had much general as well as tete-a-tete talk, which I believe has not been without its use.

Inter alia—it was proposed, that as some men from most of the Counties, who were moving in the good work, were assembled, we should form ourselves into a Union for the purpose of circulating information amongst each other—pointedly excluding all interference in the management of each particular school.—I objected to this, as I said, because I believed the Committee appointed by Mr.

Hanbury to be still in existence, but I was told that it had ceased to exist.

The writer of your article seems to think that two of the gentlemen, "who met at the London Conference," must have known of its termination. But I can assure him that I saw equally a Committee appointed by the Birmingham Conference, and never heard of their termination, nor have I ever heard since, that that Committee died from any other cause than being superseded by that appointed at Mr. Hanbury's.

However, had we not believed that Mr. Hanbury's Committee had ceased, we should have been prevented by our wish to avoid giving offence from forming our Union—although I am really not aware of any reason why any two men, or any twenty men, or any two hundred men who chose to do it, may not unite to assist each other. If they unite for the purpose of ruling others, the matter is different and they require the consent of those who are to be ruled.

We had no such object, and therefore no farther objection was made, and the Union was formed.

Some time afterwards, the receipt of a summons to attend Mr. Hanbury's Committee, first shewed that that body was still in force. I went to the Meeting—explained that our Union had been formed under a wrong impression, but that no harm could be done, as we were working, as I believed, exactly the same object, and that we should, I had no doubt, be perfectly ready to join them, either as one body, or as what might perhaps be better, two portions (Town and Country) of the same body—anything rather than have anything like a dissension. As, however, I would not of course bind the other members—it was proposed to meet again and ask some of our Union to meet us.

At our second meeting, it was agreed to join, if we had common grounds; and then I first heard that as our printed rules of Union said nothing about the free use of the Bible or regular Prayer, it was supposed that we objected to Religion—I confess I was at first somewhat hurt at this imputation, but on consideration, I was thankful that we had not been still farther misunderstood.

We had said nothing about teaching reading and writing—or about habits of industry. Therefore, we might have been supposed hostile to both. We had said nothing about feeding or clothing the boys—We might have been as well accused of starving the boys physically, as well as spiritually—I can only assure you, Sir, that so far as I know the intention of my friends—neither the one nor the other was contemplated.

On being asked whether we objected to the introduction of our religious opinions into the printed rules—I said we could not object to it, though as a matter of taste, I thought it not well to introduce the subject into that place. I was told, however, that it was necessary, for the purpose of excluding Roman Catholics and Unitarians.

On this, Sir, I confess I changed my opinion as to the importance of the introduction. Had we been framing a body to govern the internal economy of the schools, I certainly should have strongly objected to Roman Catholics and Unitarians forming the governing body. I should have objected less to a body composed of members of the Church of England, but I confess, I should have objected to any governing body whatever, because I have always believed that though I have for a quarter of a century, acted as a visiting Magistrate under the strict, but generally wholesome rules of the Secretary of State, yet that in a matter where one had to deal with the heart, the most perfect liberty of action was necessary to the manager. I should therefore strongly object, in limine, to any interference with the discipline of schools by any Union or any body of men. I have even always maintained, that though I am thankful for the visits of Her Majesty's Inspectors under the Home Office, or the Privy Council—though I am thankful for their advice, and often profit greatly by it, yet were they to claim a right to order me to take some step which I believed would be prejudicial, I should claim my right to shut up my school, turn the buildings into cottages, or the land into farm, and as soon as might be, dissolve a connection, which could not be carried on satisfactorily.

Now the dictation which I should refuse to the representatives of the highest authority in the country I cannot concede to any Union, however highly I may respect the individuals.

But if the Union do not presume to dictate to the schools—if it be, as ours was, and as I had imagined that that appointed at Mr. Hanbury's had been—simply one for the purpose of circulating information, I really cannot see why we should exclude Roman Catholics and Unitarians, or any other class of men, from any benefits which we can give them. I would wish, so far as I had opportunity, to do good to all men, especially to those of that body whom I believe to be the household of Faith—but still where I have opportunity—to all men.

Were it required to agitate—to work—to obtain fresh help from Government, and fresh laws, I should be disposed to watch carefully those with whom I embarked in an agitation. But at present, we have no such need. For the Counties with whom we have to do, I believe we want no new laws, no additional help. The act of the last Session appears likely to work well, and if so, any fresh legislation is more likely to do us harm than good. You state by the way that this act was gained by the Committee appointed at Mr. Hanbury's. I had thought that the bill brought in by Mr. Adderley, had elicited it from Mr. Waddington. However that be, we are deeply indebted to those who procured for us the last legislation which was needed to enable us to carry out our long hoped for ends.

But now that we require no more legislation, why should we exclude from the circulation of any information we can afford—any body of men who are to profit by it. I confess I am most anxious to see Reformatory Schools of all denominations springing up in due proportion to the boys to be sent to them. I wish heartily that all Roman Catholics, Unitarians, and all other Creeds, were united in the Church of England. I would do my best fairly and openly to persuade them that that which I believed was, as I believe it, worthy of universal belief, but I certainly would not wish to take advantage of a boy's being placed by law for two years under my power to persuade him to change the Religion in which he had been brought up. It would be extremely inconvenient to have separate Religious teaching for different boys in one school, and therefore, I can imagine no more desirable plan than the having different schools to which boys may be easily transferred, where they may receive instruction in the creed (where there be any such) in which they have been brought up.

I have with this view, offered to give any information or assistance I may possess to any Roman Catholics who may open a school for the purpose of reforming those boys of their own creed: and therefore, I cannot consistently join in a pointed exclusion of those bodies who have (however strongly I may disagree with them in doctrinal points) given perhaps the most important assistance and information which our movement has received—through M. Demetz, and Miss Carpenter.

I regret therefore that I individually cannot join Mr. Hanbury's Committee, unless they rescind their present rule. My secession will signify nothing; any members of the Union formed at Hardwicke, who approve of their rules, will of course join them. But should any feel that they cannot consistently adopt their views—but must like myself secede from their more strict and rigid law, I trust that Mr. Hanbury's Committee will not be offended if we continue to meet quietly now and then—and endeavour to give any information or assistance to each other, to any of those whose good intentions we admire while we certainly differ from their doctrine—or last—but not least, to any of Mr. Hanbury's friends, to whom we wish heartily well, though we cannot entirely agree with them,

I am, &c.,

T. B. LI. BAKER.

Not content with thus standing by his principles, Mr. Baker finding that many persons opposed, as impracticable, any Union with "the Unitarians and Romanists," (which means, writes a friend to us, "that Mary Carpenter, Demetz, a number of people in England, and all Ireland must be excluded,") addressed the following letter to Mr. Hanbury:—

ROBERT HANBURY, ESQ., HARDWICKE COURT.

January, 1856.

My Dear Sir,—I had observed that the 6th of February was Ash Wednesday, and I had thought that you would probably therefore have named the next day; but I am perfectly ready to wait your own time.

I am sorry that our views disagree so much. The difference in reality between us is slight—yet I fear impassible by either.

It is not a difference in religious views, for I believe we equally feel that religion must be the sole basis of reformation, and that the more pure and true the form of religion which is taken as that basis, the better hope we may have that the reformation will be real.

So strongly do I feel this, were it proposed to form a Central Board for the Government of all the schools in connection with it. I should strongly urge that there should be one Board to govern Church of England Schools, another or others to govern Dissenting, and another Romanist Schools.

Each Board might readily help each other with such information and assistance as either could give or receive; but neither two could work quite harmoniously as a Governing Board.

But in this Union (and I at first understood in yours) no Government was in any degree contemplated. In ours it was particularly, and I think universally decided, that the management of every school should be entirely at the discretion of the manager or managing body. I confess this is a point which I have always felt to be absolutely necessary in this peculiar work, and I believe that even if my system of teaching were far inferior to yours, yet that I should teach better on my own system than I should if compelled to adopt yours.

But if no Government of the schools is contemplated, you will ask, what is the use of Union?

Simply this.—We unite for the purpose of circulating amongst ourselves such information as each may profit by. Any of this information which can be of service to Romanists or to Unitarians, we should be most glad to give them.

Should they suggest any of the details of teaching, plans of building, or the like, which may be of service to us, I would most gladly accept any plans or suggestions they can give us. Nor could I join in any Reformatory Union which should exclude such earnest and zealous workers (though of course there are some points in which I differ from them toto colo) as Demetz and Miss Carpenter, unless indeed it were a Sub-union as I may term it—a section of the Union not in antagonism to the rest, but as having a more close and perfect Union amongst ourselves, as being composed of members of the Church of England.

Were our object to gain a power of interference, a right of direction over the individual schools; were our wish to make a strong political party, or to gain power for some other purpose into our own hands, I should then hesitate strongly to join with the Romanists.

Did we ever propose to ask them for information and assistance, I might be illiberal enough—(I don't pique myself on liberality) to hesitate to lay myself under an obligation to them. But where, as is at present the case, our side has all the start. I cannot refuse to give them any information which the members of our Union can afford.

But though I fear that you will not agree in this, and that I cannot agree in your view of the subject, yet it is a happy thing that we can each take our own line without jostling. I see no evil, but rather the contrary, in having two Unions, not opposing each other, but working amicably together. You cannot exactly unite with us nor we with you, but I doubt not that any information you may possess will be gladly accorded to us, and I know little indeed of my friends who met at Hardwicke, if they are not at all times ready to give any information we possess to all of your friends.

More than this, so far as I know, our friends neither hope nor wish for, nor, I confess, can I see that "a very strong party," such as Mr. MacGregor spoke of, can signify materially to us one way or other. We have no public point to carry. We have laws nearly perfect as we can expect human laws to be (if the Act of last Session for making parents contribute works as well as ere the close of this month I hope to see it work.) We have money enough, for in almost every county, more than enough is subscribed. We have admirable men, rising up wherever they are wanted. All is far in the counties, and only wanting that, which neither you nor we can hasten—Time for the fruit to ripen. May God grant that no blight or storm may intervene between the ready and willing band of reapers, and the long hoped for and prayed for crop.

In the towns the time must be still longer. The reapers are as yet fewer in proportion to the need. But after seeing the rapid strides, which the movement has made through the country, I cannot fear that a sufficient number will ere long appear round the towns.

On again recurring to your letter, I see you mention that "you were informed almost last of all of the existence of our body, &c." I had hoped that I had fully explained to you that I being ill and overworked at the time, never informed any one of the Union, except Mr. Wright of Burton (whose absence I so sincerely regretted,) and that I am not aware that any one was formally written to, through many joined from seeing the advertisement in the Times, or in county papers to whom it was sent by the different members. Had we not understood that your committee had ceased, as the Birmingham Committee had done before, ours would not have been formed. As it was, we should simply and gladly have entirely joined with you, had we not found that there were points on which we could not exactly agree. This being so, we must go on side by side, helping each other where we can, and not interfering where we cannot.

You have a right to your opinions.—We to ours. Possibly some who at first joined our Union may prefer yours on consideration. Possibly some of your original members may prefer others. We do not seek to "frame rules" for any who do not approve of them, nor I am sure would you wish us to abide by rules (how much soever we may respect the framers) which we do not agree with. We will find no fault with you for confining yourselves to certain bodies as you may think meet, and you will not object to our wish, "as we have opportunity to do good unto all men, especially those who are of the household of faith," i.e. as I should construe it—to do any good we could do even to Pagans, far more to all Christians, even though we believe theirs to be a far less sound form of doctrine than our own, and most of all to that pure and apostolic branch to which we belong; but still, where we can, so far as we have opportunity, to all men.

Forgive the outrageous length of my letter, and believe me,

Truly yours,

T. B. L. BAKER.

The Editor of The Ragged School Union Magazine, had

Mr. Baker's letter before him for three weeks or a fortnight, before the issuing of the February number of that periodical, and his reply is the following ; and anything more amusing, in its cool impertinence, and in its shirking the real question at issue, we have never read :—

REFORMATORY MOVEMENT.

Our article last month on the "Reformatory Union," has caused several letters to be addressed to us upon the subject, but for which we have not space for their insertion. Suffice it, however, to say, that, with one exception, they all concur in our conclusion, that if there be a Central Association for aiding the formation of Reformatories, and rendering those in existence increasingly efficient, but in no way controlling them or interfering in their management, that Central Society must, to be effective, take for its basis the Word of God. It must be soundly Protestant, and truly evangelical. It is not enough for particular institutions to include in their constitution the religious training of the inmates ; in this respect, the Central or Parent Society must be a sound model. Failure here, upon so vital a question, would endanger the success of the whole movement. We learn from a circular sent us that a Conference will be held this month in London for the establishment of a General Association, as a centre of information upon the important subject of the prevention of juvenile crime, and the reformation of young criminals. The rapid extension of interest in this question is manifested by the progress made lately in many institutions of a reformatory character ; and the number which have been originated during the last year is a cheering indication of the practical efforts put forth in all quarters to supply Reformatories where, as yet, they have been unknown.

We have had occasion to express a hope that the conduct of these institutions would not be left to the formality of merely official superintendence, and thus a healthy tone of Christian philanthropy might be called into action, by a judicious co-operation between the Government and private individuals in this work. Endeavours have been made, it is true, to ignore the earnest labours of those who seek the real reformation of criminals by founding their instruction on the blessed truths of the Gospel ; but the Conference to which we now refer will, no doubt, effectually prevent an evil of this sort, by uniting and encouraging those who found their efforts in this field on the firm basis of Scriptural truth, and stimulating others to help by the diffusion of accurate information on the question.

Roman Catholics have lately begun to establish Reformatories, but, as yet, they have nothing of this sort to point to as examples of their zeal. It is vain to think of a hearty co-operation in a work requiring definite principles of action, if men who love the Bible are to unite with those whose church authorities are opposed to its free use, and whose principles are maintained in direct opposition to its plainest teaching.

We must leave to the Romanists that liberty in this matter which of right belongs to their sect ; but, as Protestants, we claim the liberty of teaching God's Word to the people, and we must use this high privilege alone if by joining with others our use of it would be interfered with in any degree.

The Conference will probably be interesting to all who are engaged in one or other of the hundred Reformatories, Refuges, Industrial Schools, and other similar institutions in Great Britain and Ireland, and we are informed that they will be invited to deliberate on this occasion by men who have had the largest experience on the subject.

Among these will be found the Earl of Shaftesbury, whose name is inseparably connected with the most successful efforts of this kind; Mr. R. Hanbury, junior, representing "The Boys' Refuge" (for 100 boys); Dr. Guthrie and Dr. Bell, from Edinburgh; Mr. Playfair, from the House of Refuge in Glasgow (for 240 inmates, soon to be increased to 400); Sheriff Watson and Mr. Thomson, from the Aberdeen Refuge; Mr. Bowker, from that of Brixton; Lord H. Cholmondeley, from the Hampshire Reformatory; Mr. Bowyer, from the New Road Reformatory (for 100 inmates); Mr. Wright, from the Institution at Brixton; and Mr. Dunscombe, from the Cork Refuge; Mr. Gent, from the Ragged School Union (numbering 136 schools in London); Mr. MacGregor, from the Shoe-black Societies (employing 130 boys); Mr. Maxwell, from the Girls' Refuge, Lisson Street (for 36 girls); Mr. Oliphant, from the Carlisle Reformatory; and Mr. Mountstephen, from the Field Lane Refuge, where accommodation is provided for 150 inmates.

Around these institutions there may be grouped, it is hoped, a large number of metropolitan and provincial reformatories, and the collection and diffusion of information on the whole subject will, no doubt, urge into activity many whose efforts are at present desultory or ineffectual, chiefly from the want of some available centre of action.

Whilst this article was being prepared, Mr. Bengough, the Honorary Secretary to the Reformatory Union founded at Hardwicke Court, was issuing the following circular:—

January, 1856.

SIR,—The Provisional Committee of the Reformatory Union feel it necessary to call your especial attention to one of its principles, as laid down in the prospectus, with a view to elicit your opinion upon it. They refer to that in the sixth paragraph, which asserts that the design of the Union "does not imply the introduction of any general system for the management of Schools," and that "it is not expected or desired that the information which it hopes to supply, should in the slightest degree interfere with the free action of the Managers in each case," recognising, as it does, the probability of its being formed by "the Managers of Schools conducted on principles materially different."

The reason which induces the Committee to call your attention to this principle, particularly at the present time is, that an attempt is being made to establish an Association, similar in general design, but upon principles, in this respect, essentially different; that is, upon principles of exclusiveness, instead of those of general comprehension. An endeavour was made, when the original promoters of the two designs were first brought into communication with each other, to effect an amalgamation of them into one. The attempt, however, failed. It becomes necessary, therefore, that your Committee should make a clear representation of the position they have taken up in this matter.

It is objected to the Reformatory Union that the teaching of the authorised version of the Scriptures is not made a qualification indispensable to the admission of any School to its benefits. Your Committee wish most distinctly to state, that they consider Scripture teaching an essential element of the training to be adopted in Reformatories; but they hold that the principle of non-interference with the particular mode of conducting Schools is fundamental in a Union which was intended to be a Union of Individuals more than an Association of Schools, and was designed mainly for the purpose of collecting and diffusing all available information, and enlisting the efforts of all who are practically working in their own way in the cause.

Your Committee therefore request the favour of your attendance at a General Meeting of the Members of the Union, at Three, P.M. on Thursday, the 7th of February instant, at 289, Strand, London; or, if unable to attend, that you will have the kindness to communicate, through their Secretary, your opinion upon the point in question.

For the Committee,

G. H. BENGOUGH, Hon. Sec.

Downend, Bristol.

The meeting was accordingly held on the day appointed, the members assembling at the office of The Philanthropist. Mr. Baker was Chairman, and the chief speakers were Mr. Adderley and Mr. Monckton Milnes. There was little business transacted this day; but on Friday, the 8th of February, the Reformatory Union met Mr. Hanbury and his friends at Mr. M'Gregor's chambers in the Temple, Lord Shaftesbury in the Chair. Here a set of resolutions, apparently unexceptionable, were proposed. First, that those who met at Mr. Baker's, and those meeting at Mr. Hanbury's should unite; all were willing, provided the grounds of unity of action could be agreed on. Second, that they should train School-Masters and provide books—agreed to. Third, that they should assist all Schools established for the purpose of reforming boys, &c., and training them in the fear of God and a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. It was, doubtless, a good resolution in appearance, but Mr. Baker asked if it was the intention of the Committee to exclude Roman Catholics, and was, we presume, induced to put this question, distinctly and pointedly, because he knew that one of the most distinguished of the Reformatory Managers in England had been excluded from the meeting because the Manager was a member of the Unitarian Church. In reply to Mr. Baker's query, it was stated by some of those present, that Roman Catholics would not be offended in the least by the resolution; but others, including Mr. Baker and, if we remember correctly, Mr. Adderley and Mr. M. Milnes said, that most assuredly the effect of the resolution would be to exclude them; and, therefore, Mr. M'Gregor very honestly stated that, as one of the Committee who drew up the rule, he was bound to say it was so drawn and introduced for the purpose of excluding Roman Catholics.

Lord Shaftesbury, acting with his usual good sense, proposed that the meeting should adjourn, but Mr. Hanbury pressed the resolution, and on a division it was carried by, we think, 44 to 29, all the county managers present, Mr. Adderley, Mr. Castleman, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir E. Kerrison, and Mr. Baker voting in the minority.

Thus ended Friday's meeting; all parting good friends, but evidently quite incapable of agreeing on the Religious Difficulty.

On the following Monday, February 11th, a meeting of the minority was held, Mr. Baker in the chair, when it was resolved that a Reformatory Association, to be called The NATIONAL Reformatory Union, should be established on the following principles, as declared by the circular:—

London, February 11, 1856.

NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

This Association has been formed for the following purposes:—

To collect and diffuse information bearing on the Reformation of Youthful Offenders.

To promote the formation of Reformatory Institutions where needed, and generally to advance the further practical development of the Reformatory System.

To consider and promote such Legislative measures as are still required for the better care and Reformaton of Youthful Offenders.

To assist in the placing out and subsequent guardianship and protection of young persons leaving Reformatory Institutions.

There has been constituted a Provisional Committee, to forward the objects of the Association, and to obtain Subscriptions.

An Annual Subscription of 10s. 6d. or Donation of £5s 5s. constitutes Membership.

The Association is not confined to this Country, but may include persons in all Countries who can contribute to the furtherance of its objects.

The Committee hope that you may be induced to co-operate with this Association.

Names will be received by C. B. Adderley, Esq. M.P., 68, Lowndes Square; G. H. Bengough, Esq., Hon. Sec. Downend, Bristol; C. Rateliff, Esq., Birmingham; or at the Association's Rooms, 3, Waterloo Place, Pall Mall.

Donations and Subscriptions may be paid to the account of the Association, at Messrs. Drummond's, Charing Cross.

The following Report on Mettray, for 1855, is translated by us from the original French Report, as drawn up by M. Demetz :—

REPORT OF M. DEMETZ.

DIRECTOR OF THE AGRICULTURAL COLONY OF METTRAY.

GENTLEMEN,

To day, the institution, for whose establishment your country owes you a debt of gratitude, completes its sixteenth year. This fact alone bears sufficient testimony to the wisdom of your administration; and its mention is enough to shew on what a solid foundation you have established Mettray from the very commencement.

The system which has been inaugurated by your colony, and sanctioned by the proof of time, has no need of defence. We shall therefore confine ourselves to recording whatever new facts have occurred at Mettray during the year which has elapsed since our last report. With respect to those persons who have not closely watched the progress of the establishment, and who still entertain doubts of the daily increasing advantages which it offers, we beg to refer them to the more circumstantial work confided to our care, on occasion of the International Reunion of Charity which was held at Paris under the presidency of M. le Vicomte de Melun. They will find in that report, interesting information, not only on Mettray, but on all the establishments of its kind, which we are happy to say, now cover the entire surface of France; for there are few departments which are not endowed with them: some count even as many as six within their own territory.

Let us now enter on the present condition of the Colony. Our population consists at this day, of 649 children. This number, the highest we have yet attained, may perhaps excite some apprehensions: these apprehensions it will be our duty to remove.

It may be asked if Mettray, by training its pupils on a scale of such vast proportions, may not imprudently compromise that discipline which to this present day has been so rigorously observed, and incur the risk of weakening its moral action.

In any establishment where the inmates live in common, such fears are legitimate, but they are groundless in respect to those institutions, where the children, as with us, are divided into small groups or families, over each of which is appointed a head, responsible for the individuals entrusted to him. The organic element at Mettray is 'The Family,' and the number of these families may be increased without danger. We may say with confidence that the testimonies which come to us from without, are conclusive on this point. They demonstrate that wherever the division into families has been adopted it has produced the best results. The worthy M. Sauringer founder of the Netherland Mettray, and of so many other establishments of beneficence in Holland, furnishes new proofs of its influence in his last report. M. Ducpetiaux, Inspector-general of the prisons of Belgium, having witnessed the excellent results produced at Mettray, has followed our example with a certain class of individuals at the Colony of Ruysselede nigh Bruges, which may be regarded as a model establishment.

Finally, M. the director of 'Public Assistance' in France, who has expressed himself very kindly towards us for transferring to him one of our best officers, M. Leteur, now sub-director of the Colony of Montagny founded by M. Fournet, has declared that to the system of division into families, must be attributed the improvement effected in that establishment, with respect to the orphans and foundlings which are there received.

But we may dispense with searching for proofs at a distance. What takes place at Mettray is sufficient to point out the advantages we have reckoned.

Considerable as has been in effect, the increase in our population, during the five years just gone by, the good conduct of our Colonists has made a corresponding progress.

Here is the abstract of our 'Moral Dividend,' if you allow the expression, exhibited by our 'List of Honor.'† On this have appeared—

In 1850—	43	per 100 of the	entire population ;
1851—	47	"	"
1852—	58	"	"
1853—	65	"	"
1854—	69	"	"

We have obtained a still more satisfactory result in the first six months of 1855.

Out of a mean population of 605 children, 475, or 75 per 100, have been promoted to the 'List of Honor.'

The inscription of a large number of colonists on this list has for

---

* Mr. Leteur has mentioned to us in writing that since the adoption of the family division, desertions have diminished to a great extent. We can count at Mettray only one run-away, and the occurrence took place as far back as six years.

† To be inscribed on the 'List of Honor,' one must have been exempt from punishment for 3 months.

result, as may be readily supposed, a notable diminution in the number of punishments. These rose in 1850 to 1579.—From 1850 to 1855, they fell in succession to the number of 808, or less than two punishments to each: during the first half of the present year, we have counted only 207.

An improvement so satisfactory requires that you should attach some importance to the discovery of the causes which have contributed thereto: they are of different kinds.

We must put in the chief place, the redoubled zeal of our officers, who coming out of our preparatory schools at an early age, gain experience from day to day, and thoroughly imbue themselves with a sense of their duties. We can scarcely add too much to the praises which are due to them for the happy results already detailed.

We do not hesitate to regard our 'Flag of Honor,' as one of the most efficacious means to ameliorate the discipline of our colonists, and excite a laudable emulation among them. We spoke in our last report of the advantages to our internal government which have accrued from the adoption of this flag. It has as yet lost nothing of its prestige, nor has the extreme difficulty of securing it, discouraged our colonists. In order to claim this recompense, a family must have continued for an entire week without reproach: a single correction, a single instance of restraint imposed on one only of its members, removes it from the list of candidates; and notwithstanding this, the number of families qualified to obtain the distinction has never fallen below the third of the whole amount. Sometimes even, the twelve families have fulfilled the necessary conditions, and then we have been obliged to select that one which owned the greatest number of names inscribed on the 'List of Honor.'

It may be remarked that it is a laudable thing to lead people to good, by the motive of honor; but will this sort of conversion be durable? While fully recognising the influence which such sentiment may have on Frenchmen, we are far from asserting that it is sufficient to win man over to the love of Good; so we look for our chief help in religion. By its aid we seek to act, and it penetrates deeper into the hearts of our colonists, because it is infused in ways the most accordant to their natural sympathies.

"This year," says M. the Almoner in his very interesting report, "187 of our children have received the Sacrament of Confirmation, 78 of them having made their first Communion the previous Sunday. During this August Ceremony, their modest and attentive demeanor, their simple and affecting piety made a deep impression on all those who were eye witnesses. Monseigneur the Cardinal, profoundly affected, expressed to them his entire satisfaction, in a truly paternal allocution. These happy results are the fruits of the religious instruction which is given them, and which, we may truly say, they receive with a pious eagerness. It is indeed an affecting spectacle to see with what attention and ever-increasing interest, these children, whose early disorders were owing to ignorance of sacred truths, listen to the exposition of the mysteries of religion, and the explanation of Christian morality. We feel that according as the evangelical light shone on their intelligences, their faith brightened, their consciences stirred, and devout feelings took root in those hearts, where formerly ruled depraved instincts, and a frightful craving for gross indulgences.

"Two striking events in the lives of our colonists prove the sincerity of their return to good: these are the departure from the colony and the approach of death."

"In the moment of separation from us, it might be expected that the joy of recovering their liberty, and of again visiting their family and native place, would banish all serious thoughts. On the contrary, you would say that they were casting a troubled look on that world they were re-entering; feeling that they were being deprived of the conduct of the paternal hand. The recollection of former scandals, of bad examples, and of pernicious counsels of which they had been victims, made them dread the future. Hence the greater number, with a desire to strengthen themselves against the trials which awaited them, came the evening previous to their departure, to purify their consciences, and to be united to their Lord who said: "Fear not, I have conquered the world." This religious act was the more praiseworthy, as no selfish motive could have prompted it. Now on the point of being independant of our charge, they could not have thought of it as a means of gaining our good opinion or giving us any pleasure.

"These children have also learned to find in their religious sentiments, that courage, submission, and energy, of which they have real need in their maladies and protracted sufferings, the results of bad treatment and numerous privations which they had endured in their infancy,

"How often have we been rejoiced and consoled by the holy resignation with which they offered up the sacrifice of their life, in the sweet and strong hope of a better one! At that last hour, the boon of christian education which they had received in the establishment, has often inspired them with feelings of sincere gratitude.

"One of them a few hours before his death, seeing the chief of his family who had come in to visit him, exclaimed, "Ah! is that you my good M. Warren? I hope to be this day in heaven: Oh! how earnestly I will beseech the Good God to reward you for all the good you have done me."

This is what M. the Almoner has communicated to us on the influence of religious sentiments on our colonists, and on the affection they entertain towards their chiefs. But what his modesty prevents him from imparting, and what we ought not to be silent on, is his own incessant sollicitude by which he has gained the hearts of all committed to his care. We have aided him as far as possible; and in order to lighten his task, we have introduced into the organization of primary instruction, an improvement which has produced the most satisfactory results, not only in the matter of the secular teaching of the children, but also in that of religious instruction.

Impressed by the serious difficulties which the absence of regularity in the exercises presents, when a large number is in question, we have established a uniform length of lesson-time for every class of our colonists: this arrangement has been prejudicial to the younger children that we have received in great numbers this present year.

We have not hesitated to allow to such of these last mentioned as have not made their first communion, all the time necessary to quicken their progress, particularly in reading; so that at this moment, all can read in their catechisms; and this measure has a double advantage; in augmenting the time devoted to instruction, it diminishes the duration of labour to the younger children.

Now Gentlemen, we beg leave to dwell for a while on the state of primary instruction in our colony.

The methods hitherto adopted at Mettray to teach reading, have not produced such results as we have reason to be satisfied with: we have now introduced the system of M. Lefevre chief of the Paris Institution. It consists in the use of a large black board ruled, on which they write with chalk the lesson to be learned by the children. From twenty to thirty pupils can be placed before this tablet, and can follow with ease the instruction of the teacher.

The introduction of this method which has the advantage of requiring fewer monitors, has been the signal of sensible progress. M. the school superintendent, has said in his report with respect to this: 'the day will come, and as I hope, it is not distant, when we will have none but the newly admitted, completely illiterate.'

Some new methods introduced among the writing classes, have made the superintendence easier, the application of the colonists more profitable, and have also effected many instances of rapid progress.

The teaching of Orthography has been well developed. We have established in the inferior classes, oral orthographical lessons according to the method adopted with success by M. Guerrier of Haupt, director of a superior school at Tours.

This method is simple, and enables us to teach orthography to children who are not sufficiently advanced to write from dictation.

We submit some statistical details in support of what has been stated.

READING.

649 Colonists present.

396—Read well.

95—Read tolerably well.

35—Read on the tablets.

83—Spelled well.

12—Were spelling words of one syllable.

28—Were employed at the alphabet.

649

WRITING.

268—Were at small hand.

91— ... large hand.

27—Were commencing.

386

ARITHMETIC.

The progress of the Arithmetic Class, has been satisfactory, owing to the earnestness of every pupil. Our children shew a particular taste for this branch of instruction, of the advantages of which they are fully sensible.

Our praises are due to the Teacher, whose persevering efforts have produced these favorable results. They are the more satisfactory, as we have received a great number of recruits in the present year. It is also our duty to confer a portion of our eulogiums on the pupils of our preparatory school, who have so powerfully contributed to the ameliorations which we have pointed out.

We are happy, Gentlemen, to have it in our power to mention here, the benefits of this preparatory school, of whose utility there has never been a doubt for an instant. Even strangers who have visited Mettray, have rendered justice to it, and proclaimed its importance. We have on this head, a testimony of high authority in a letter to Lord Brougham, recently published by Mr. Hill, Queen's Counsel.

This learned gentleman, after mentioning all the conditions necessary for the prosperity of an agricultural colony, does not hesitate to point out as most indispensable, the preparatory institution of a School constituted on the plan of ours.

In addition, there is a circumstance so conclusive, and so much to the honour of this institution, that we hasten to bring it under your notice.

The Colony of Ostwald which contains no less than 350 young detainees, was far from producing the results which were expected from it; and it was about to be closed, when the Municipal Council of Strasburg on which it depends, decided, on our recommendation, to accept as director, M. Guimas, one of the earliest of our pupils, and latterly occupying an important post with us. I had the pleasure myself of conducting him to Ostwald, and he was installed in his new functions the first day of February last. It is scarcely in our power to thank as we ought, the Authorities of the City of Strasburg, for the cordiality with which they received us.

Since this man, whose zeal is boundless, has been at the head of the house, a complete change has been effected in the dispositions of the children. The desertions have diminished in a wonderful proportion, although the discipline has increased in rigor; and now the same authorities who had refused any sacrifice at all, are the first, in presence of the good realised, to require additional buildings in order to accommodate a greater number of children.

Thus, gentlemen, you have the satisfaction not only of having founded Mettray, but of having contributed to save Ostwald into the bargain.

Results like these are to us, the most powerful encouragements; and at the sight of the good which the agricultural colonies are daily accomplishing, we feel our zeal redouble in order to prepare for our country, men worthy to direct such institutions, and to fulfil so noble and holy a mission.

For some time past we have recruited for pupils among the young men quitting agricultural schools. We naturally addressed ourselves in preference, to the institution which M. Daveluy has founded in our department, and which he so well directs.

We feel it our duty on this occasion to communicate to you, a letter received from M. the sub-prefect of Loches.

“ Monsieur le Directeur,

“ I cannot thank you sufficiently for the admission of my young protégé into your preparatory school. I scarcely hoped for a favourable answer after your obligingness in admitting two of our pupils since the commencement of this year. You will allow me to see in this, a new proof of the kind interest you manifest to our agricultural farm school, for which, as you know, I have a particular predilection.

“ Thanks to you, this institution presents an assured future to the candidates to be received. Aided by your profound experience, and the counsels of the skilful director of your agriculture, they will be enabled some day to place themselves at the head of establishments like yours, and which it is of importance to see propagated through France, as much for the improvement of agriculture, as for the good education of youth.

“ M. Daveluy, the worthy director of the Hubeaudières is as much gratified as myself, by what you have been pleased to do for his pupils: he certainly deserves to have his generous efforts well seconded.

While awaiting the honour of seeing you, and thanking you vivâ voce, please to receive. &c.

“ DELAPORTE,

“ Sub-Prefect of Loches.”

This letter now cited, proves with what zeal the first magistrate of this arrondissement occupies himself with the interests of his charge: it also exhibits one of the obstacles which prevent the development of farm schools. The pupils whom they produce are, for the most part, uneasy about their future condition, for they are seldom prepared for the expenses necessary for admission into the district farms: Mettray, as may be said, smooths down these difficulties to a certain extent; and the farm-school pupils whom it receives, may hope to be, some day, at the head of agricultural colonies now in course of formation, and for whose direction, applications are continually made to us.

We doubt not but that M., the Minister of Agriculture will give us credit for this service, as it must shew him that we neglect nothing to render ourselves daily more deserving of his good will.

We have established at Mettray, a manufactory of agricultural implements which by extending the application of profitable operations in agriculture, will be at the same time, a means of enlarging the knowledge, and of exciting the zeal of the pupils.*

The ‘Universal Exposition’ in which are at present exhibited the most ingenious implements, offers a vast choice, in the selection of which our worthy president, M. le Comte de Gasparin, so competent in * A double, weeding hoe, has been invented by one of our colonists; and the instrument has appeared so useful that very competent persons have advised us to take out a patent. This fact so much to the credit of the pupil does equal honor to the superintendent of the atelier, who neglects no opportunity of developing the intelligence of his apprentices.

---

a matter of this kind, offers his services. Thus we will be in a condition to furnish to our neighbourhood the most useful and carefully executed instruments.

We have opened at Mettray, an exhibition hall destined for the reception of the agricultural implements made in our own ateliers.

To each of these instruments is fastened a ticket marked with the price at which it may be sold, and the kind of soil to which it is adapted. Our possessions contain soils of the most different natures, which thus serve for conclusive trials, and which, at need, secure purchasers against deceptions too frequent in such cases. We are considering about giving a wider extension to this branch of business, of which Mettray will become one of the most important centres. We are at this moment in treaty with many foreign manufacturers, who have signified their wishes to choose our colony as a depository for their products. This will, in a certain degree, constitute a permanent 'exposition.' No locality in fact is better adapted to such a destination, for Mettray being at the junction of the lines of the Bordeaux and Nantes railways (and in a short time, of that of Mans), may always reckon on a large concourse of visitors.

Such, gentlemen are the innovations introduced by us, in order to possess at Mettray those resources calculated to assure a prosperous future.

We have made some experiments in another direction, which it is our duty to lay before you.

When you founded Mettray, you were as intent on proposing an example of good will to all, as to open a reformatory asylum for some individuals. You wished to shew how aid might be given to agriculture which was short of hands, and at the same time to orphans and foundlings who needed employment. With this object in view, we have not ceased to urge large proprietors to follow our example, to collect about them a certain number of orphans and deserted children, and to employ them in weeding, the most profitable occupation they could give them, so that they might do a good, and a profitable action at the same time.*

Our appeal was vain: the vast proportions of Mettray terrified them. They mistook our good taste for luxury; the rustic and at the same time the economic elegance of our little dwelling-houses, which we owe to Mr. Blouet of regretted memory, discouraged those who were tempted to follow our example; they imagined that they could not imitate us except at heavy expense.

We then conceived the idea of founding at some distance from Mettray, little detached colonies with forty children in each. We abstained from changing anything in the disposition of the localities, leaving the buildings such as our predecessors, the farmers, had quitted them.

This new measure did not obtain the favour of public opinion. They objected that though our farms were separated from the colony, they were still near enough to be affected by its moral influence, and that our discipline exercised an equally salutary check on these scattered communities.

---

* 'The Mettray System in application to orphans and foundlings.'

We have as we believe, given an effective answer to these objections by the establishment of a colony, more than twenty Kilometers from Mettray. This little colony has been located on the land of the Orphrasière on the friendly proposal of M. Manuel, proprietor of that vast demesne. No praises in our power to bestow would be worthy of his generous disinterestedness.

Our farmers with the example of the specimen we have just founded, will henceforward as we hope, enter with more confidence on the way we have been so long endeavouring to open for them. The orphans and the foundlings who press so heavily on the funds of the departments, will be also employed in a manner profitable both to themselves and the country.

Prudence imposes on us a duty, not to neglect any precautions necessary to success in this new experiment. We have taken care to send to the colony of the Orphrasière those children who are approaching the term of their liberation.

The great mistake of all those penitentiary systems which have been tried up to our own time, is, allowing the individual to pass at once from a state of the strictest seclusion to a state of boundless liberty.

The Orphrasière lying far away from Mettray, offers to our children a state of transition by which they can make their first essay of liberty, being still liable to a certain restraint. It is by having recourse to all these precautions, by observing these gradations, that we can hope to render the once vicious man an upright member of society.

But the proof of the utility of your foundation is particularly to be found in the conduct which the children observe after their liberation. You will thereby comprehend the importance, we attach to 'Patronage,' the sole means of inducing them to persevere in the good path on which they have entered.

This Patronage has now attained large proportions, as we never abandon our young charge, and as the 'latest dismissed,' still add to the number of their predecessors, and considerably swell our expenses for which we receive no compensation from Government.

Hearts less confident than yours in the resources of charity, would have been dismayed by the consequences of such engagements, but you have felt that 'Patronage' was the indispensable complement to your work, and that in order to organize it, you should not recoil from any sacrifice: and besides, we are bound to believe that the exercise of Patronage on the children who have quitted the colony, has a healthy action on those now present: by its means our influence on this youthful population increases from day to day. Our children cannot be ignorant of the solicitude with which we shall watch over their destiny when they will have become free: they know the sacrifices which we impose on ourselves in order to be useful to them; and they shew their gratitude by the only means in their power, viz. that of conducting themselves with propriety.

1,040 young colonists have quitted Mettray from the establishment to the first of January 1855.

421 have devoted themselves to agriculture.

301 have betaken themselves to trades.

249 have entered the army: we are happy to mention one of them, a soldier in the 3rd Zouaves now at Sebastopol, already decorated with the cross of the 'Legion of Honor.' He has made himself one of the subscribers to the foundation of Mettray.*

69 have entered the Marine.

---

1,040

The number of 301 children who have embraced industrial professions may appear large, but it is more strange that it should be so restricted, as out of 1817 children who have been admitted at Mettray 908 belonged to our large towns. This large proportion of children brought up among crowded populations, accounts for the number of the 'relapsed' which however has not been on the increase. It remains as at past periods, 10 per cent, as appears from the official return of 'Criminal Justice,' recently published by M. the Minister of Justice. This stationary result may be considered as a progressive one, if we take into account the length of time elapsed since the liberation of our first colonists.

We cannot conclude these observations on 'Patronage' without addressing our thanks to those who have seconded us in this work, and whose zeal, instead of diminishing, seems to increase in proportion as their task becomes more difficult. We would wish, Gentlemen, if the number were not too great, to pay to each individual, the tribute of gratitude due for his efficacious help; to recount with what persevering efforts the greater number have endeavoured to act (for good) on the children as well as their parents, well knowing that the best counsels have little influence in presence of evil examples on the part of the family.

We will content ourselves by naming M. Verdier, Agent-General of your Society, who, with a disinterestedness beyond all praise, has charged himself with the 'Patronage' of all our children in Paris. We can hardly form a correct estimate of the difficulties which this office entails, or the incessant goings and comings of every kind which it exacts. M. Verdier is dismayed by no obstacles of this kind.

After having given an account of the conduct of our children during their residence in the colony, and particularly of their behaviour since their dismissal, we have now merely to make you acquainted with the sanitary condition of our house. We cannot do better than analyze the reports of the physicians who are incessantly and zealously occupied with our poor little invalids.

The number of children admitted to the infirmary is about 383. This high number is accounted for by the frequent variations of the temperature, and its sudden depression in the course of the present year. This atmospheric influence has had a serious effect on our mortality, which this year stands at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; affections of the lungs and typhus fevers have particularly contributed to augment the number of deaths.

---

* This is not the sole instance of the kind which we have to record. What can be more interesting than to see Mettray supported by those to whom it once gave refuge!

At all events, Gentlemen, mortality may present very considerable variations with us, without proving for or against the medical regime of the house; it depends on the more or less vitiated constitutions of the individuals received; and you are well aware that we must take them as they are sent.

At the worst, we hope that no one doubts the care of which our children are the objects, particularly in case of illness; this very year we have introduced ameliorations into our medical service.

The visits of the physician take place every day.

Formerly, the service of the infirmary was confided to one of the colonists; frequent changes were the result which could not be otherwise than prejudicial to the management of the sick. To remedy this inconvenience, we have not hesitated notwithstanding our limited finances, to appoint an infirmarian who is charged specially with this service, and who acquits himself, as we are happy to say, with laudable punctuality. He is placed under the control of two Sisters of Charity who are entrusted with the care of our infirmary and dispensary.

Vaccination has been tried on 141 children, to wit.

51 vaccinations.

90 revaccinations.

The latter experiments have been successful in 27 instances, and, gentlemen, it is a source of much pleasure to us to announce to you, that there has not occurred amongst us since the founding of the establishment a single case of small pox, though this very year, both the ordinary and confluent small pox have attacked a certain number of children in the neighbouring communes.

The physicians of the establishment encourage us in the notion "that this immunity is the result of the care taken, according as the colonists are admitted, to vaccinate those who have not yet undergone this operation, and to revaccinate those who have."

Further on, they add this information which we are very happy to communicate to you:—"As to the cholera which visited Tours in the month of July, and did not disappear till the end of October, we have not had a single case."

We cannot announce such a circumstance, Gentlemen, without feeling it our duty once more to thank that Providence which to this day, has preserved Mettray from that scourge, though it has raged even at our gates.

We cannot conclude this report, Gentlemen, without introducing to your notice, a new institution which has been added to the one you have never ceased to invest with your solicitude, and which appears to us equally worthy of your sympathies.

This addition enables us to fill up in our correctional regime, a truly deplorable void, and to obtain results of the highest importance in the interest of families.

The legislator while adopting the principle of agricultural colonies for young convicts, ought to have equally taken into account those children whose vicious inclinations, or obstinate characters, stubbornly resist all instruction, all efforts of domestic discipline; and who, without having been guilty of an infraction of the penal laws, do not the less deserve severe punishment. We speak of children detained at the request of the father, on the ground of 'Paternal Correction.'

If we wish to achieve a reform as complete as it possibly can be, we should come to the aid of youth whatever be its social position, and combat its evil propensities wherever they manifest themselves.

In France, detention under the head of correction paternelle is the only means of repressing the transgressions of youth. But Paris alone offers, and there but in an insufficient manner, a house for the reception of such children, which holds out some guarantee to the heads of families.

In the provinces there exists no establishment of this kind. Children under age, whom their parents might wish to correct by withdrawing them from the evil counsels and evil examples which are perverting them, would there be mixed pell-mell with the suspected and even the convicted: thus they would be exposed to greater dangers than those from which it is wished to guard them. What father of a family would venture to give to his son, for companions, malefactors and others, the refuse of prisons.

The inexpediency of resorting to this mode of correction is so fully recognised, that there is no family in easy circumstances, who would not reject such a means; and there is scarcely even a poor but honest family, who would not hesitate to use it. Is it not indeed to be feared that he who had once been obliged to pass the threshold of infamy, would regard himself as disgraced for ever?

Rich families frequently send on long journeys and at great expense, sons of whom they have cause to complain; but this plan has often only the effect of substituting one kind of dissipation for another. By this course, studies are suspended; the habit of application is lost; the young people meet abroad the temptations from which they were sought to be rescued at home; and they yield to them with the less reserve, as they feel themselves now free from all surveillance: they begin to entertain ideas of independence and insubordination; and after having brought trouble into their families, they, later in life, introduce disorder into the State.

By the terms of the Articles 375 and 376 of the Civil Code, a child under 16 years of age may be detained one month, and the youth from 16 to 21 years old, six months. We must then, if we wish to produce a salutary effect upon the mind of the young offender in so short a time, employ a species of discipline which will punish fast, if we may be allowed such an expression.

Besides, the discipline of reformatory colonies to which young criminals are for a long time subjected, can scarcely present a sufficiently repressive character: the children in these establishments enjoy a certain degree of liberty; field labour would appear, especially to boys, much to be preferred to the study of Latin, for which the greater part entertain a profound aversion.* Moreover, this state of mixed society exposes the children to form connexions which would sadly compromise their future prospects in the world of the higher classes.

We do not hesitate to say, that solitary confinement only, can act with efficacy in such cases. It is necessary to have witnessed its effects in order to form a correct idea of the happy influence which it obtains over the character. A complete transformation is effected in the individual submitted to its operation. As he cannot procure either indulgence or amusements, nothing is at work to remove from his mind the exhortations and counsels he has received. Reflection is perpetually holding before his eyes the picture of his past life. In solitude there is no place for pride, for self-love. The child is obliged, in his own despite, to enter into himself: he no longer blushes for yielding to the promptings of his conscience, which has been so justly called the 'voice of God.' Little by little, he becomes accessible to religious sentiments: labour now becomes an occupation for him, and very soon a pleasure; he gives himself up to it with ardour; and that which he has hitherto considered as a painful task, becomes a comfort, even a necessary, so that the greatest punishment that can be inflicted on him is to deprive him of employment.

The short period of his detention dissipates whatever fears the solitary system may excite in the minds of some individuals.

We have been enabled to witness these effects of solitary confinement which we have just described, at Mettray, where children under 'paternal correction' have been sent for some time past.

Every child has two cells at his disposal, one in which he sleeps, the other in which he is employed, either at manual labor, or in being instructed.

The vicinage of the College of Tours enables us to procure for the children, such professors as people in easy circumstances would wish to give them. Up to the present time, with regard to the young people confided to us, M. the almoner has undertaken to direct their classical studies. He has betaken himself to this charge with the greater willingness, as it furnishes him with a pretext for being the oftener with his pupils, and holding intercourse with them, without appearing to come directly to read a moral lecture.

We always take the precaution before receiving a child of this class into our colony, to announce to him his parents' wishes that he should be placed under restraint. We give him to understand that we have obtained a delay in his favor: we exhort him to profit by this new proof of indulgence, letting him understand at the same time that if he does not, he shall be the object of severe chastisement. We have the satisfaction to inform you that in the greater number of cases this announcement has sufficed. Thanks to this weapon placed in their hands, many parents have made their hitherto despised authority, fully respected.

---

* Mettray affords, at the present time, a case in point. One of our colonists not being able to obtain from his parents permission to leave school, did not hesitate to set the building on fire. We are happy to say that the conduct of this boy is now of the most satisfactory character.

When the menace has had no effect, and we are obliged to put the threat in execution, the boy on entering Mettray changes his name for a number by which he is henceforth designated; the letters of his family, preserved with care, are delivered up to him when he quits us, so that there may remain no traces at any time, of a 'past' which is so desirable to be never drawn from oblivion.

As we endeavor to prevent whatever might compromise the future fortune of these young people, so we neglect no means of making the time spent with us, exercise a happy influence over them. They are the objects of our constant solicitude: we have made it a duty to visit them every day; to have long conversations with them. In our absence we confide this trust to M. Blanchard who is fully qualified for this mission by his experience and his devotedness. Such, Gentlemen, are the precautions which we have judged necessary to take, in order to realise all the good expected by the country from this new organization.

We do not think it necessary, Gentlemen, to occupy your attention with the state of our agriculture which is improving from day to day. Our worthy president to whom Mettray is so much indebted, has undertaken the office as in former years, to present a detailed account of your agricultural concerns: Mettray could not find a worthier interpreter.

We shall also abstain from entering on any explanation relative to the financial condition of the colony. Every year, our worthy collector consents to undertake this task. It is clearly shewn from his reports that all new expenses, all claims against the weakest of our resources, particularly at the present high price of cereal products, might endanger the very existence of Mettray. We fear not to avow now more than ever, our great need that charity should come to our aid, and we feel it our duty to appeal to all of good hearts on whose succours our hopes chiefly rest.

These men are numerous in France, and they will not fail our expectations. We are much gratified by the collections constantly accorded to us by the gentlemen of juries, and we beg them to accept the expression of our gratitude for their generous assistance. We must also not forget Messieurs the presidents of assize for their encouragement to the juries to come to our aid. The exhortations of these magistrates have so much the more weight, as they were the first to occupy themselves with the future prosperity of our work, and as they have strengthened their preaching by their example; for out of 27 imperial courts which exist in France, we reckon 17 among our founders. It is not then, Gentlemen, without a legitimate sentiment of pride, that as a magistrate ourselves, we invoke such a suffrage.

We must not omit mentioning an auxiliary no less dear, and one that recommends our colony as well to our fellow citizens, as to the confidence of Government. The Councils General as well as the Imperial Courts, and in a still more considerable proportion, have given us their encouragement and contributions.

Out of eighty-six departments, seventy-two have subscribed as founders of Mettray.

Strong in these good feelings towards us, we present ourselves to public opinion: it cannot condemn the utility of a work so well appreciated, nor refuse us that assistance which we need to assure its permanence.

As to ourselves, Gentlemen, we feel our courage redouble, in thinking of the good disposition of the little population you have confided to us, and particularly of the assistance which you do not cease to afford us. We claim no other recompense for our zeal, than the privilege of continuing to offer you new proofs of it, happy to live in an abode where so much good is realized, though always regretting not to have for a witness of this good, 'Him' who was its chief author.

The Director of the Colony,

DEMETZ,

Honorary Counsellor of the Imperial Court, Paris.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR THE YEAR 1854,

BY M. LE CTE. DE GASPARIN,

Minister of the Institute, President of the Parent Society.

GENTLEMEN,—Your Agricultural accounts for 1854, are closed by a net produce of 12,599fr. 91 c., which represents the interest of your standing capital. This result is the more remarkable on account of its rarity in a year (such as the last) which has been distinguished by unusual severities. Our cabbage crop so necessary for our beasts has been destroyed by the frosts of winter; the severe spring weather has arrested the growth of grass; the cold and prolonged rains have levelled and blighted the corn, and brought disease on the grapes: of the latter there has been no produce this year. Finally the prolonged drought of the summer has hindered the beet from coming to full maturity. Only for these obstructions, the agriculture of Mettray would have yielded a considerable interest on its funded capital; and if, despite these obstacles, it has produced some profit, we must attribute the merit to the devotedness, to the zeal of the agricultural officers, and to the sound and wise directions given to them by their chief, M. Minangouin, who continues to justify the confidence you have reposed in him. What may assure you that these successes are not accidental, but that they result from the wisdom of the course which has been followed, is the increasing value of our raw produce which has been in 1850	31,309fr. 94c.

1851	55,054fr. 16c.
1852	62,399fr. 15c.
1853	76,183fr. 69c.
1854	92,787fr. 65c.

To render these numbers in a true proportion, we should take account no doubt of the extension of our agricultural farm, but it is very easy to judge that it has not kept pace with the increase of the products.

We can form a correct estimate of these improvements, and of that of our nett revenue by recapitulating the ameliorations successively introduced in the management of Mettray.

1st. The roads which led to the different parts of the farm have been repaired: where half a load only, could be formerly drawn, we can now get a full load conveyed.

2nd. Many fields which were destitute of a clay bottom have now been subsoiled, and we have removed vast quantities of stones which being first broken by our colonists, have been sold for repair of the neighbouring roads, or burned into quick lime in a kiln constructed for that purpose.

3rd. We have commenced to drain these lands which have suffered most from humidity; and this operation is still continued though slowly, owing to arrangements entered into with the proprietors, of whom we are only tenants.

4th. We have replaced the sowing of spring oats by colza which has turned out very satisfactory in produce.

5th. The culture of wheat has been carefully looked after, it has been carefully weeded, manured after sprouting, and has been covered over in spring with a light coat of pulverized manure where the soil seemed too light.

6th. Lucerne clover, beet, and cabbage, have furnished provision for our cattle; we have ceased to purchase fodder.

7th. The mass of manure heaps has been increased: we collected only 1224 metres in 1850, while in 1854, we obtained 2834 metres.

8th. By the purchase of guano, we have increased the quantity of manure necessary for tillage, and though we have not succeeded in giving the land a complete dressing, still great progress has been made in this respect.

9th. The labors have been more regularly and better executed than formerly, and the substitution of oxen for horses, which is still but partial, has been of advantage. A day's labour with oxen comes only to 1fr. 80c., while one with horses amounts to 3fr. 55c. If the ratio of work between these animals is as thirty to forty, the value of a day's work with the latter animals ought to be merely 2fr. 66c. instead of 3fr. 55c. So there is evidently an advantage in substituting the ox for the horse, to the limit which will leave us the yokes necessary for pressed ploughings.

10th. Although our dairy presents better results, we are far from regarding them as perfectly satisfactory. But with the assistance of a Swiss dairy-maid whose skilful cares we highly appreciate, with a more careful selection of good milk-maids, with a reduction in the rearing of calves, and improvements in the management, we hope that this department will make a satisfactory progress.

11th. Improvements have been also introduced in our piggery which is to be limited to the exact number that can consume our buttermilk and the offal of the house: we have experienced a loss every time that, wishing to keep a larger number, we have fed them with marketable produce.

If we except 8 or 9 acres left for the culture of the vine, and for a shrubby, and our kitchen garden of 5 acres, and 2½ acres in unbroken pastures, the rest of the agricultural farm of Mettray enters into the general cultivation, and may be divided into four sections; the cereals, green crops, roots, and saleable products.

The cereals chiefly consist of winter wheat which up to the present time, has yielded the most certain products. The land appears best adapted to this produce which is most worthy of the attention of the cultivator. Spring oats are rarely profitable; the habitual dryness of the season prevents it from throwing out a sufficient number of stems. But we have reason to congratulate ourselves on the success of our winter oats. Colza is the crop which, conjointly with the cereals, yields the most profitable returns. So without letting ourselves be discouraged by this year's failure, let us continue to cultivate it on a large scale.

Among the green crops, the trefoil, the chief cutting of which takes place early in the season, and which suffers much from the want of spring showers, has not yet afforded a satisfactory return.

Lucerne by its repeated cuttings is exempt from this inconvenience: however, although it is a fine ornament to the land, the produce hitherto has been scant. Must we attribute it to the scarcity of manure used in its production, or are we to lay the blame on the want of depth in our loam, and the arid subsoil which meets the roots: perhaps both causes contribute their influence. A more careful culture will probably point out to us what we are to expect from this grass which moreover has as yet given us the least disappointment. If we pass to the roots, we now come first to the potato which we cultivated at an early period, on a large scale and in deep soil, and which has yielded us nothing but disappointments. These successive losses have obliged us to contract the extent of this culture more and more, seeking in the market what is necessary in the article of food, and at a price inferior to what we should lay out in its home production. The beet and cabbage are unprofitable. If we could dispense with half the manual labour which is necessary to make a profit on the cereals which follow them, we would find that we would really have a profit of 34fr. per acre, instead of a loss of 19fr. in selling them at 20 francs per millier, (1000lbs.) At a much inferior price such as they produce when consumed by the cattle (9fr. 80c. the price being 48 fr. as during last year), the loss would be still more evident.

We may say the same with respect to carrots which yield a good profit when sold to the cavalry at 31fr. 60c. the millier, which in home consumption is worth no more than 12fr. Unhappily, the quantity which can be so disposed of is very limited: we cannot extend the culture of this root beyond an acre and a half.

Jerusalem Artichokes are profitable owing to the little labor they require, but being set in bad land their return has been trifling.

Under the title of marketable produce we include artichokes, hemp, mulberry trees, and madder.

Artichokes have up to this time, yielded us considerable profit, but the progressive diminution in their price, in the same ratio as the railroads enlarge the Paris market, prevents us from extending their culture beyond the two acres allotted for them.

Hemp has not been cultivated with us except on trial, and in a low ground; but its success, and the use we can make of it, with ourselves, encourage us to extend its culture on a suitable soil.

Our essays in the rearing of silk worms, made on a small scale, and within the limit of the quantity of leaves produced, have succeeded so well as to induce us to enlarge our mulberry plantations, which being subject to skilful pruning, are easily distinguished from the bushy looking mulberry trees of the country.

Although the madder has sold well and is of good quality, we have not closed its account to a profit. It has shared the fate of our other crops, owing (as in the other instances) to want of depth in the soil, and to drought during summer.

Nothing can prove better than what we have said, the difficulty of judging of the qualities of land, and of fixing on the kind of tillage which will answer it best, particularly when motives of economy mix with the agricultural views, thus greatly complicating the question. This question has been broached at Mettray, but it is only proper to observe that we have often changed our mode of operations, up to the moment when the selection of M. Minangouin introduced perfection in practice, united to thorough agricultural knowledge, which were wanting to his predecessors, and which alone can lead to success. Now the line we ought to follow is fixed, and when we depart from it, it will be with the conviction that our shortcomings in farming will be more than compensated by the advantages of employing our young hands, and by the impossibility of reducing our operations to a state of simplicity, which might suit a simple farmer, but which would not afford the necessity of recognising the benevolent support of the Minister of Agriculture, by remaining above all, an Agricultural School.

The 'Parent Society' may now congratulate itself on the state of its farm, a state which is a happy presage of that to which it may hereafter attain.

CTE. DE GASPARIN.

We beg the attention of all our readers to the following most able and important letter, addressed by the Recorder of Birmingham, to Mr. Adderley, on the Ticket-of-leave question:—

Heath House, Stapleton,

February 20th, 1856.

Dear Sir,

I have read your remarks on my late Charge with great interest, and in many, perhaps in a majority of them, considered as insulated propositions, I entirely concur.* Thus the field of controversy is materially abridged, and the points of difference may, I trust, be disposed of without my trespassing too much on your patience.

* "Punishment is not Education."—Parker and Son, West Strand.

It may wear the appearance of pedantry or formalism, to begin by reminding you that the ultimate object of all punishment is the diminution of crime to the lowest attainable point; but experience has convinced me that such a precaution is absolutely necessary. This definition is the compass by which the argument must ever be guided, and to which the eye of the pilot must perpetually recur. But, unfortunately, the proposition is so obviously true, that the mind admits it and forgets it almost in the same instant, although if steadily kept in remembrance, nine-tenths of the differences which perplex the controversy would adjust themselves.

You maintain that we must rely on the deterrent principle; you believe that punishments must be 'short and sharp;' and you are of opinion that if the pain were exhibited, as the apothecaries term it, in homœopathic doses, with repetitions quantum suff., this remedy, from which the world has expected so much and reaped so little, might yet accomplish the desired object without the aid of long training, which implies a long detention. The deterrent principle captivates the mind upon its mere enunciation, consequently I am not surprised that it should have laid such fast hold on public favour in all ages. The maxim, metus ad omnes, pœna ad paucos, commends itself as a most specious offer. It proposes by acting on a few to influence all, confining acute suffering to those few, and only producing on the multitude a wholesome dread of incurring a like penalty. Such an offer at once engages our kindly feelings, and falls in with our admiration of powerful effects produced by slight causes. That every stroke on the shoulders of a thief should scare thousands of outstretched fingers from diving into honest men's pockets, and save the owners of those fingers from pain and disgrace, would be a state of things very agreeable to contemplate, if we could forget that it is for the most part only a creation of the fancy. Deterrents have a certain degree of power beyond all doubt; and that the power, such as it exists, is of the kind indicated by the maxim is also freely admitted. But each expedient which that maxim suggests has been tried in every possible form; and the state of crime in all ages and in all countries abundantly supports me in asserting that deterrents, however used, whether in large or small doses, whether at once or with repetitions extended over a long period, are but weak agents, and cannot be relied upon for an efficacious repression of crime.

Perhaps a succinct examination of the causes which produce this debility will disclose reasons why we must not hope to accomplish very much in our attempts to increase their efficiency. It is obvious that if every offence drew down inevitable punishment, and if the penalty followed quickly upon its commission, the deterrent principle would be vindicated by perfect success. Crime, although it can never be extinguished, would, at least, be so much reduced, as to be no longer a cause of public anxiety. Offences would be infrequent, and punishments might be slight. If, for instance, a thief knew that his plunder would to a certainty be taken from him in every instance, the forfeiture of his time and labour would be almost of itself sufficient punishment; sufficient to prevent his repeating his offence, and sufficient to deter others from embarking in so futile an enterprise as theft would then become. But alas! how are we to ensure certainty of detection? Have we made any near approach to it? Is not the existence of a professional class of thieves, conclusive evidence that the proportion of detection to offences must be small indeed? Bearing in mind the low price which the thief obtains for his plunder, as compared with its value to the rightful owner, it will be evident that every person who maintains himself by theft must daily exercise his calling; and as his term of impunity often extends over many years, we can have no doubt that he looks upon detection as a tradesman looks upon a bad debt, namely, as a misfortune incident to his occupation. The lesson which he draws from it is also identical with that learnt by the tradesman, namely, to exercise greater watchfulness for the future. Now this being the well-known state of the facts, why are we to be surprised at the existing pressure of crime upon society? And why are we, so long as we build our faith on deterrents, to indulge in hopes that the future will differ from the past?

In disregarding the chances against him, and in fixing his attention on those which are in his favour, especially when the latter outnumber the former, does not the thief act in conformity with a law of the mind influencing all around him? Nay, even when the chances are against them, a very large class of the community, such are the gambling propensities of mankind, are willing to incur enormous risks. Lotteries flourish in all countries in which they are not prohibited; and yet the adventurer knows full well that if he were to buy all the tickets, and consequently secure all the prizes, he would nevertheless be a great loser. When Beccaria and his followers magnified the value of certainty as contrasted with severity, they did well. But the fatal defect in their argument is their assumption, that certainty is attainable; shutting their eyes as they did, and still do, to the incontrovertible fact, that while in no age or country has it yet been secured, every addition to our numbers and our wealth, and every step of our progress in the arts, create new temptations to crime, and new facilities for its commission. That they also furnish additional means of repression is not denied; but on the whole, our approaches towards certainty of detection, if indeed, we are moving towards that point, are too slow to give any reasonable hope that it will be attained, even in the most distant future, while it is quite clear that for all present purposes it must be put entirely out of calculation. But certainty, even if attainable, would be insufficient unless accompanied by proximity. Indeed, certainty is attained in one sense. Every thief is conscious that sooner or later he must come under the grasp of the law, and that although he will be mercifully dealt with at first, yet in the end, his punishment will be severe. Still, he is not prevented from running his course of guilt. And here, again, he follows the example of his betters. The drunkard is painfully conscious that destruction is the inevitable consequence of his vice, and yet he cannot refrain from his bottle.

This habit of disregarding consequences, not immediate, was a few years ago brought to my mind with great force. I happened to visit a Cornish tin-mine, and inspected the various operations performed upon the ore. Some of these were carried on in the open air with the spade, and were, like agricultural employment, which they much resembled, very favourable to health. Other operations were conducted in buildings furnished with stoves burning fiercely. These emitted fumes which I found it difficult to endure, even for the few moments of my stay. On enquiry, I discovered that the painful sensations which I had experienced, arose from the presence of arsenic disengaged from the ore, by the process going forwards in the stoves. The workmen exposed to these deleterious exhalations are, as may be expected, very short-lived, few attaining the age of forty. On comparing the wages earned by the labourers at the stoves, with those engaged in the open air, I found that the difference is only half-a crown per week. For this miserable bribe does the victim incur the penalty of a certain and early death!

Let me relieve for a moment the dryness of this discussion with an extract from an article by Sir Walter Scott, in the "Quarterly Review," on Sir Humphry Davy's Salmonia :—

"We happen to recollect an anecdote, indicative of the passionate hold which the sport of angling maintains over the minds of some individuals, with whatever risk it may be accompanied. It is now a great many years since we met in fishing quarters, the very pleasing and accomplished gentleman, then engaged in his medical studies, from whom we heard the story.

In a former fishing excursion, such as that in which he was engaged at the time, our friend had observed a follower of the same sport, holding his course down the very midst of the small river; and the angler in question, was a 'noticeable man.' He was of uncommon stature—a large and portly figure, brandishing with both hands a rod which commanded the stream on either side,—while being immersed to the waist, his 'fair round belly' seemed to project like a dark rock when in the shallow water, and in the deep current to rest and float on the surface of the waters, like the hull of some rich argosy.

Our friend could not help looking back, more than once, at this singular figure, until he suddenly observed the angler quit the stream, get out upon the bank, and hasten towards him with shouts, which seemed a signal of distress. On his closer approach, our medical friend observed that the countenance of the fisherman, naturally bluff and jolly, and not unfitted to correspond with the height of his stature and importance of his paunch, seemed disordered and convulsed with pain. He begged earnestly to know if our acquaintance had in his basket a flask with spirits of any kind, complaining, at the same time, of an attack of cramp in the stomach, which gave him intolerable agony. This was supplied with all the benevolence which should subsist between brothers of the angle, according to the instructions of their patriarch, Isaak Walton. When the tall fisherman had experienced the relief which the cordial drop afforded, our informer told him his profession, and enquired whether these attacks were frequent, and whether they were constitutional. 'Very frequent,' answered the lusty edition of Piscator, 'and, I am afraid, rooted in my system.' 'In that case, Sir,' replied my friend, 'allow me to tell you that fishing, or at least wading while you fish, is the most dangerous amusement you can select for yourself.' 'I know it,' said the poor patient dejectedly. 'Assure yourself,' pursued the physician, 'that your very life depends upon your forbearing to pursue your sport in the manner you do.' The intelligence seemed nothing new to our forlorn angler. 'I know it, Sir,' he said, 'I have been told so by the best of doctors; but,' he added with an air of stoical yet rueful resignation, that might have graced a man who sacrificed life to some mighty duty, 'Heaven's will be done! I cannot live without fishing, and without wading I can never catch a fin.' So saying, the giant thanked his adviser, went back to the spot where he had left his rod, and was seen a few minutes afterwards bowled-deep in the stream.

Our friend had the curiosity to enquire after the name and condition of this devoted angler, to whom life was nothing without wading waist deep after trouts. In the course of the year, he saw his death announced by the newspapers. He was found dead on the banks of his favourite stream."—Scott's Works, 1835, v. xx.

Here the prescription of 'short and sharp' had a fair trial, the doses being repeated until death, an event which interferes with so much medical treatment of the most brilliant promise. In this case the deterrent principle had an advantage which you cannot command. Not only was the immediate pain intolerable, but it was known by the offender to be a solemn warning that unless he altered his course of life, capital punishment would quickly terminate his career. It will not do to say that this is an exceptional case. The criminal class is itself an exception, and is in the main composed of individuals who, from want of good training, are not amenable to the restraints which are found sufficient to keep the bulk of society within the boundaries prescribed by the law. Again, it would be conceding too much to admit that the instances to which I have called your attention are exceptions. As in the case of the tanners, large bodies of working men may be found, who, with their eyes open, encounter, not the risk, but the certainty, of early death. Take the trade of needle making, as it existed some years ago at Redditch, within a few miles of your own residence. The workman knew by unerring symptoms when his short life was drawing to its close, and if his friends ventured upon soothing him with hopes of recovery, he resented all such delusions as a cruel mockery, yielding himself to his fate as to an evil foreseen and not to be avoided. The gilders of Birmingham were formerly under the same irrevocable sentence, and many other artisans were subject to a like doom; nor is it immaterial to remark that when any invention has been made, having for its object to relieve the men from danger, it has frequently been very ill received by them, because it imposed some small trouble or inconvenience on the workman, or led him to fear that his danger being reduced his wages would undergo a similar change; so inexorable is the tyranny of the present over the highest interests of the future!

It must not be objected in favor of deterrents that criminals will undergo the sufferings of shame in addition to corporal or pecuniary penalties. Doubtless, by expulsion from the honest part of society, such as were ever members of that class suffer much, but that suffering comes too late. They have calculated on escaping detection, and have been deceived, or as they call it 'unfortunate'; and once enrolled in the criminal class, their sense of shame becomes inverted. Disgrace then attaches not to dishonesty, but to want of skill in their avocation, and to repentance under suffering; and thus it is that the same emotion which at one period presents obstacles to their fall, afterwards becomes a serious impediment to their restoration.

The absence then, either of certainty or proximity, will so far weaken deterrent action as abundantly to account for its inefficiency; but in the case of criminals we have, and I fear must ever have, the two causes of uncertainty and delay operating in combination, and, consequently, with multiplied force; if so, is it not hopeless to put faith in deterrents?

In early times it was natural to suppose that the want of certainty and proximity might be supplied by increasing the severity of punishments. But this expectation was quickly found to be fallacious. More than 2200 years ago this question was set at rest in the minds of the observant and reflective Greeks. The speech which Thucydides puts into the mouth of Diodotus, in the debate on the revocation of the decree of extermination against the men of Mytilene, shows that the vanity of this expedient was no secret at Athens, and the experience of the world from those times to the present has borne uniform testimony to the same effect.* I need not, however, urge this truth upon you, who freely admit it. I will content myself with observing that the crime of forgery was never so rife as when it was a capital offence, and when the Crown was far more inexorable towards forgers than it is now towards murderers.

But to you it appears that the salutary consequences which aggravated severity has failed to produce, will follow upon a milder infliction frequently repeated. Whether pain concentrated or pain distributed strikes more fear into the criminal, is a question which I will not take up your time in discussing, because it appears to me beside the mark. That by either process the mind of the sufferer may be filled with anguish, and his body racked with torture, that he may, in his moments of suffering, deplore his folly in having subjected himself to such appalling visitations, that his resolutions to avoid them for the future may be sincere and as strong as his mental constitution will permit, I make no doubt. But of this I am equally assured, that if you send him forth into the world without habits of industry, and without the power of self-government, to encounter the awful difficulties which stand in the way of every man who has lost caste, and is struggling to recover his position, you embark him on a hopeless enterprise. Not that he is ignorant of the fatal vortex towards which he is irresistibly drawn,—not that he underrates the agony which is in store for him; but his necessities are instant, and the penalty is at some distance. The contest is between his present and his future self. And with the members of his unhappy class the future self is as certain to be sacrificed as if it were the self of another being.

---

* Book iii. cap. 45.

And this brings me to what I must consider the fallacy which has misled you, in common with all the votaries of the deterrent principle. You assume that the deterrent force of a punishment will increase in proportion to the pungency of the infliction; and you would be right if you had any means of stereotyping the state of mind in which the criminal finds himself at the moment of suffering. But that is just where all your predecessors have failed, and where you must fail, because the change which you propose, if it were a novelty, which it is not, leaves the defect in the deterrent principle untouched. For the criminal under deterrent action the line, 'Wax to receive and marble to retain,' must be reversed. However deep may be the impression, it quickly wears away.

Thus then the school of criminal jurists, to which I belong, have not deserted received opinions on light grounds, or sought for new principles until the failure of the old ones for the production of good practical results had been demonstrated by centuries of experiment, varied until the wit of man had exhausted all the possibilities of permutation. What course then remained for choice? None within the scope of my imagination, save two. First, such treatment as incapacitates the criminal from the commission of offences, leaving at the same time his appetites and passions unsubdued, and his desires unchanged; or, secondly, a treatment which has for its object to reform him, by leading him to yearn after good instead of evil, and by so training his habits as that he shall be able to give effect to his new aspirations.

We are reduced, in short, to Incapacitation or to Reformation. Both these expedients, it must be admitted, are of very humble pretensions, when contrasted with the ambitious aims of deterrent punishment. Incapacitation limits itself to preventing the criminal from repeating his offence, either for a time, as when imprisonment is employed, or for ever, as by the infliction of death. But as we are in no wise friendly to capital punishment, we would only use incapacitation as furnishing the opportunity for exercising reformatory action on the criminal, or in extreme cases, for withholding from society one who has resisted all endeavours to improve him. But although we administer pain with a reformatory object, yet we incidentally obtain the advantage of whatever deterrent defect belongs to that pain, because it is clear that the patient is deterred, not according to the purpose with which the pain is inflicted, but according to the amount of the pain itself. Now reformation implies a long detention,—a protracted struggle,—and many a disappointment before the goal is reached. Indeed, one of the grounds of your objection to reformatory treatment is (if I have not mistaken your meaning), that from its extensive duration, it exceeds all just measure of severity. Let me admit, for the sake of argument, that your censure is just. Surely then, reformatory treatment cannot be objected to as wanting in a copious infusion of the deterrent principle, and consequently to compare or contrast reformatory and deterrent punishment must be illogical. For although we find deterrent punishments are too often not reformatory, reformatory punishments must of necessity be deterrent, and thus the latter scheme combines the advantages of both systems.

But I am in hopes you will cease to consider what you term a reformatory education as visiting the criminal with excessive punishment when you call to mind that, while enduring it, he is not merely expiating an offence, but at the same time receiving an inestimable benefit; for you, I am sure, will not hesitate to admit that reformation is the greatest good to which the criminal can possibly aspire, and that riches, titles, power, or any, or all the objects of earthly ambition, ought to be as nothing in his mind in comparison with what we are doing our best to enable him to achieve.

Our first expedient in reformation is, you know, to induce the criminal to labour, until the habit of industry is well formed. Yet although this may be justly called our main expedient, it is far from being our only one; since the habit of industry, without the power of self-government, would be insufficient to preserve the prisoner when at large from falling a prey to temptation. But his industry may be made to supply a fund, which will enable us to train him in the art of self-government. Let all fines for misconduct, either of a positive or a negative description, be paid out of this fund. As he advances in the work of reformation, relax gradually the various restraints which are imposed upon prisoners. At first he will be kept in a state of separation from his fellow sufferers, and cannot there exercise many of the social duties. Still he may do much towards the acquirement of self-control. Let him have a certain limited command over the produce of his industry, which he may at his own option expend for the purchase of indulgences, or retain to accelerate the moment of liberation. If he snatch immediate gratification at the expence of increased length of imprisonment, it will be seen at once that his power of self-control is inadequate to protect him from the temptations which he will have to encounter on going back into the world. But when there is good reason to believe that their minds are turned into a right direction, however feeble may be their power of acting on their convictions, let a small class of such prisoners be permitted to associate together. Let the little band be under pecuniary liability for the offences of each, or in other words, let the fines be paid out of a common stock. Thus the prisoner will find himself exposed to new dangers, new temptations, called upon for the fulfilment of new duties, all of infinite importance, and his powers of self-government will be elicited to an extent for which solitude furnished no scope. So again, if the little community, by quarrels, by supporting each other in misconduct, or by relaxing in any way the efforts of each member towards reformation, showed that the individuals of which it is composed had been brought out of a state of separation before they were prepared to live together with profit, it should be broken up, and each prisoner must recommence in solitude the labours of self-improvement.

By these and similar means, many of which are not mere speculations, but have been reduced to practice, the prisoner might be so gradually released from one restraint after another, as to make the step to perfect liberty a far less change than it is now.* For instance, one stage might be to remove him from a prison, strictly so called, to some building not surrounded by walls; to let him know that he was under no physical restraint, but that if he absconded he would, upon his apprehension, be brought back and consigned again to the gaol, to recommence the toilsome journey towards freedom. Here is a new temptation to resist, the power of which it is almost impossible for any one who has never endured the tedium of a prison life adequately to conceive. Being some years ago at Florence, I made the acquaintance of Signor Salvagnoli, the head of the Tuscan bar, a gentleman who, having been a Minister of State during the revolution of 1848, found himself when the old order of things was restored, consigned to a fortress, in which he was detained for a period of some months. I took the opportunity of enquiring from him, as I had done from others, whether he found the privation of liberty more or less painful than he had anticipated. He, like others, told me that he found imprisonment irksome to the last degree, and that when he regained his freedom he spent his whole time for some days in roaming about, changing his route almost at every moment to assure himself that he was not compelled to observe any prescribed course. 'Juvat ire,' he repeated to himself again and again, every time striking into a new path.

To overcome the temptation to wander at large, revisit old scenes and old companions, and more than all, indulge in his old gratifications, would indeed be a great lesson in self-government, and furnish a most valuable test that the reformation of the prisoner, so far as it had proceeded, was genuine and substantial. The next stage might be employment upon public works, at wages below the ordinary standard, but which employment would, after a time, entitle the prisoner to a Ticket of Leave of the very best kind, because it would be a certificate of character. I would then place the prisoner under the guardianship of a member of a Société de Patronage, such as France has long possessed, and such as I trust England will not be long without.

By the aid of such a society, prisoners who had gone through the ordeal which I have thus indicated, would be placed in reputable employment, and to a very considerable extent, guarded from the snares which beset the liberated convict. Meanwhile the liability to recommitment would still hang over him, at least for some years, and must, if duly exercised, operate as a check, not only upon the commission of crime, but upon the formation of habits and associations which lead to crime. The warning now endorsed upon the back of

---

* See Captain Maconochie's pamphlet, just published, entitled "Prison Discipline." Harrison, Pall Mall. 1856. See also, "A Visit to the Great Prison at Munich," by the Rev. C. H. Townsend, in the Zeist, for January, 1856.—Hall, Paternoster Row. If I had seen this article before I wrote this Letter, I should have made frequent reference to it in support of my suggestions.

each Ticket of Leave would then become a truth; and the holder, if found without visible means of subsistence, or associating with persons of bad character, would be held to have fallen into dangerous courses, and would be considered as about to relapse, and his licence to remain at large would be revoked.

The distinction between a good prisoner and a good man is well established in the minds of all who are conversant with the habits of convicts. It is generally referred to hypocrisy. The good prisoner who, upon his release, turns out a bad member of society, is held to have been playing a part; and too often the imputation is well founded. But it quite as frequently occurs that the relapse of the unhappy individual is caused by his finding himself forced upon assuming the reins of self-government, when his prison training has not only not qualified him for the task, but has thrown into disuse whatever power of this kind he may have taken with him into the gaol.

It is true all this is education,—education, as I submit, of the very best kind. But I am sure you will not object to the State affording education to the criminal, unless it can be shown that the benefit to the individual is productive of some injury to the community. Now, any such evil could only accrue if this education really weakened the corrective or the deterrent effect of punishment; but if the foregoing arguments are valid, the corrective effect of punishment is largely augmented, or indeed it may be said, altogether created, by this educational training; while, having regard to the vicissitudes of progress and retrogression which the prisoner must necessarily undergo, and which will not only be severe but of long continuance, it can hardly be doubted that their impression on his mind will be greater than that produced by any process of ‘short and sharp;’ as it will also be on that of the class, on whom whatever he may suffer is likely to have the greatest influence by way of deterrent. Sharp, such treatment cannot fail to be, and it will not only be sharp but long.

I now address myself to your objections. You appear to have no confidence in the labour test, and instances, you say, have been found, in which prisoners, evincing much power of labour while in prison, have abjured all honest industry from the moment of their discharge. Doubtless industry, as I have already said, is not of itself reformation. The habit of labour, however, removes one great difficulty. It endows its possessor with the faculty of self-maintenance, although it cannot be depended upon to prevent relapse if unallied with the faculty of self-government. Thus the high value which we set upon industry, is not merely because it enables the individual honestly to maintain himself if he be so disposed, but also because those who have the control of his prison life, may avail themselves of that industry, as a means by which he may be taught to govern himself. Again, I think this education may be defended on your own principles. Not only do you urge by precept, with all the power derived from your talents and your high position, and also by your munificent example, the duty of educating the young, but you seem disposed to go to the length of denying the right of the State to punish juvenile offenders whom it has not guarded from ruin by proper training. If, however, that notion be well-founded, when does the right of the State to punish a non-educated criminal begin? If it be wrong to punish him in his youth, because the gift of education has been withheld, how does he become responsible by effluxion of time? What has manhood done for him, except to add the chains of habit to those of ignorance? I must confess it seems to me that every reason which can be alleged to show the injustice of punishing the uneducated boy is strengthened in the case of the uneducated man; and I cannot but hail it as a most happy coincidence, that in adopting the best known means to arrive at the true end of punishment, the repression of crime, we do, in fact, bestow that education at last, which in the majority of instances, we have neglected to supply at an earlier and more natural stage.

But then you raise an objection which I cannot but honour, although I must not for a moment yield to it. You seem to think there is a want of fair dealing, as between the high and the low, in imposing on the latter a course of training which the former escape. It is a novelty so agreeable, to find the rich and the well-born evince this jealousy of the rights of those below them, that allied as I am by birth, and by many strong prepossessions, with the class of which you are the champion, I cannot but feel some reluctance to combat what I must nevertheless hold to be a fallacy. The rich, you say, are not very likely to commit offences which bring them under the animadversion of the criminal law, although they but too frequently indulge in conduct which cannot be reconciled, either with the rules of religion or morality. The consequences which you draw from these undeniable facts is, that we have no right to keep offenders belonging to the humbler classes under a discipline which shall give us security against their repeating their offences, because there is no correlative treatment for the misdoings of the higher classes. But if your argument have a just foundation, it must lead, I submit, to a much more sweeping conclusion than that which you have adopted.

The punishment which we propose to administer may be considered in two aspects; first, as turning the offenders from evil to good, which is a benefit, and beyond all doubt a benefit of the highest nature, to the individual; and next, as administering the pain which is necessarily incidental to such a process. Now it is not to pain, per se, which you object. That you are ready to inflict to as great an amount as is necessary to bring the deterrent principle into full operation. Your objection is pointed against what forms the benefit to the individual, and if the pain, which we cannot help administering, is greater than that which you would inflict, still even looking solely at the interests of the patient, he purchases, at the price of his additional pain, an inestimable blessing: while your treatment would thrust him from the prison doors, smarting under bodily suffering, his angry passions exacerbated, his thirst for guilty pleasures made intense by privation, and all his habits of mind and of body, if changed at all, changed for the worse. Surely, then, if this new right of equality which you have discovered, is to be established, it would much more reasonably confer a proletarian exemption from 'short and sharp,' than from education, and thus you would have to exempt the lower classes from punishment altogether.

The deterrent principle sacrifices the individual to the public; the reformatory principle though incidentally deterrent, yet repays the individual for his suffering, by bestowing upon him a gift, for which that suffering is well endured. The deterrent principle arms the executioner with the whip, the marking-iron, and the knife. The criminal is flogged, branded, deprived of his ears. The reformatory principle calls in the surgeon who, although he may cut deeper and inflict far more excruciating torture, has ever the benefit of the patient in view, and subjects him to no pain which is not to purchase for him a greater measure of comfort. Trust me, if you could consult your clients, and if they were cognizant of their true interests, it is against the executioner and not against the surgeon they would instruct you to remonstrate: the latter they would implore you to retain.

You express doubts as to the possibility of discovering and applying effective tests of reformation. Unerring tests, I admit, cannot be supplied, but neither can they be found in support of the verdict which has consigned the convict to prison. Moral certainty, according to Beccaria, is only a probability, but one so strong that we are constrained to act upon it.* If you would be satisfied with a probability, as high, if not higher, than the one upon which the prisoner has been stamped with the brand of conviction, such a probability can be afforded by daily record of facts pro and contra. The fate of a prisoner ought not to depend on a conclusion formed without precise data gradually accumulating through a series of months or years. But with those aids to the judgment of the authorities, with his prison life divided into stages of progress, each attainable by good conduct, and each to be forfeited by ill conduct, each relaxing some restraint until the last step into perfect liberty is but a slight modification of the state immediately preceding it, and with a license to be at large, revocable for a period sufficient to operate as a check upon even incipient bad courses, I see no insuperable difficulty to be overcome; that is to say in a large majority of cases. Some prisoners would never work their way out of prison, but they would be for the most part, of a temperament to suffer little from the restrictions to which, under a mild and enlightened system like that of Captain Maconochie, they would alone be subjected. There is a class of prisoners, a small one no doubt, yet larger than those unacquainted with criminals might expect to find, who are not wholly unconscious of their incapacity for self-government, and who are happier, or at all events less unhappy, in prison than at large. In prison they behave well, though, knowing their own frailty, they may not exert themselves much to obtain a discharge. Such prisoners need not be subjected to a very harsh discipline, and their lives may be suffered to pass away in a manner best suited, both as regards the State and themselves, to the infirmities of their nature.

---

* "Io parlo di probabilità in materia di delitti, che per meritar pena debbono esser certi. Ma svanirà il paradosso per chi considera, che rigorosamente la certezza morale non è che una probabilità, ma probabilità tale, che è chiamata certezza, perchè ogni uomo di buon senso vi acconsente necessariamente per una consuetudine nata dalla necessità di agire, ed anteriore ad ogni speculazione; la certezza che si richiede per accertare un uomo reo è dunque quella, che determina ogni uomo nelle operazioni più importanti della vita."—Dei Delitti e Delle Pene, § vii.

There is one suggestion in your remarks in which I heartily concur, although certain difficulties which would attach to its practical operation have hitherto prevented me from submitting it to public consideration. It is the expediency of calling upon the criminal to compensate those whom he has wronged by his offences. The great value of the suggestion consists in its obvious justice, which would reconcile the public to a long detention of convicts with a view to their labour furnishing them with the means of payment. And, having regard to the present state of the public mind on the subject of punishment, it might be desirable often to make the cost to the community and the individual injured, flowing from the convict's offence, the measure of his punishment. Charge him with the cost of his apprehension, prosecution, and imprisonment, including not only his lodging, food, and clothing, but also the expense of guarding and training him. Add to this, an indemnity to the party injured, and a debit would be raised, which it would require a considerable length of time to extinguish. It would, however, be necessary, frequently, to exercise the power of remission to a large extent, as the injury which he has committed is often one which the whole life's labour of the convict would not repay; especially if he should be weak in body, or unskilled in any profitable employment. But the Crown is in the daily exercise of such a power, and I do not anticipate any difficulty which a sound discretion would not readily dispose of.

With regard to the suggestions which I have thrown out, I know by experience how easy it is to meet them by objections of detail; and where the experiment is conducted by officers who have but weak faith in the principle of reformation, or who have not well considered what are the constituents of a reformed character, just grounds of complaint will but too often arise. The task of those with whose opinions I agree, is consequently one replete with discouragements. Ours is an experimental science, and yet we have no laboratory placed at our command. We must depend upon the phenomena disclosed by the manipulations of persons who are, sometimes avowed opponents of our doctrines, sometimes mere conformists to our views, and seldom more than half converts. Whoever has traced the fate of inventions reduced to practice by persons who had but little confidence in their value, will know how to sympathise in our struggles and our disappointments. Still, I believe we are making way, and I find here and there symptoms that light is peering into places hitherto in utter darkness.

Believe me, dear Sir,

With sincere esteem and regard,

Your faithful Friend and Servant,

MATTHEW DAVENPORT HILL.

C. B. ADDERLEY, Esq., M.P.

During the past quarter, Mr. Horsman, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, introduced a Bill into Parliament, by which he proposed to extend to Ireland the provisions of the English Juvenile Offenders' Act. This proposal was as unwise as it was ill-considered, and has caused considerable discussion and opposition in Ireland. The facts of the case and the grounds of opposition are already before most of our readers, at least before all who can aid in securing a just, suitable and safe measure for Ireland, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon the subject here, more especially as we have, in the number of this REVIEW, for June, 1855, devoted considerable space to the topic.

All our readers are acquainted with the history of the admirable Reformatory of which Mr. Bowyer is the Honorary Governor. We feel very great satisfaction in inserting the following Report of this Institution.

The North West London, heretofore called the St. Pancras, and Marylebone Preventive and Reformatory Institution.

On Tuesday, October 9, the commemoration stone of the new building of the above Institution was laid by Lord R. Grosvenor, in the presence of a very numerous assemblage of friends to the Reformatory Movement, who were accommodated in a piece of ground at the rear of 19 New-road, near Gower-street, North. The place was decorated with flags manufactured by the inmates, and the afternoon being remarkably fine, the whole scene presented a very cheerful appearance.

Lord R. Grosvenor arrived shortly after four, and was accompanied by the Rev. Canon Dale, the Rev. L. W. T. Dale, the Rev. H. J. Hatch, Captain Grant, Lieutenant Blackmore, R.N., Messrs. R. Ricards, H. Wilkinson, A. J. Baker, architect, and G. J. Bowyer, Hon. Governor, &c.

Lord R. Grosvenor read letters from the Archbishop of Canterbury and Sir B. Hall, regretting that the pressure of engagements prevented their attendance.

After a prayer from the Rev. Canon Dale, a hymn was sung by the inmates, and Lord R. Grosvenor performed the ceremony of laying the stone, amid loud cheers.

The Rev. Canon Dale in proposing a vote of thanks to his Lordship, said,—He thanked God such an Institution was rising in his own parish, an institution which asserted that none of God's creatures were so lost as to be consigned to despair, none who had fallen into crime from bad example, or want of instruction, but could be reached by the power of God. There was no depth of misery that could not be reached by the Gospel. He considered Reformatories and Ragged Schools, as the two safety valves by which those evil elements were got rid of which would endanger the social system. The Institution was also preventive, it excluded none, and provision was made for those whom evil example at home would otherwise train in a course that would lead to misery in this world, and in the next. (Hear.)

The Institution aimed at producing three things profitable to the soul: self-control, self-denial, self-respect. In education, self-respect ought to come first, but with those who had forfeited self-respect it was necessary to begin with self-control, and self-denial. All who had that regard for the welfare of the fallen, which was based on Christian love, nay, all who were possessed of mere human sympathy should support this Institution. The noble Lord had come at some sacrifice to himself, but he esteemed that consideration of no account when good was to be done. With all Institutions of a philanthropic and Christian character, the name of Lord R. Grosvenor would ever be associated. He should only embody the feeling of the meeting in thanking him for the honor he had done them, and he might say the honor he had done himself, in coming there. (Cheers.) But for the successful issue of these Institutions they wanted more than the assistance that could be rendered by his Lordship. They wanted men who would concentrate their energies on the one subject, men who did one thing and did it well, such a man, in short, as the Hon. Governor of the Institution. (Cheers.) Captain Grant having seconded the resolution, Lord R. Grosvenor said in returning thanks, that a large share of the energy and wealth of the nation was engaged in prosecuting a formidable war; but the country could find time for other things, and was occupied in promoting social reforms, among which he thought none more worthy of support than the Reformatory Institutions. The question arose, ought this to fall on private resources, ought not the cost to fall on the country at large? (A voice, certainly.) His opinion coincided with the person who said certainly, but what were they to do in the meantime? If the support of these Institutions was not thrown on Government, were they not to exist at all? All such reforms commenced with individual effort, individuals first tried what could be done, and then Parliament took up the matter. In the last Session a bill had been passed for establishing Reformatory Institutions by a public rate. It would be in operation in less than a year, and then no young person would be committed to prison, but would be sent at once to a Reformatory. But this undertaking is not only Reformatory, but preventive, offering succour to those who had not committed crime, but were on the verge of it. Birmingham had been foremost in making popular this subject, which had originated in Aberdeen; but in the Midland counties it had been more discussed than in any part of the kingdom. He was for money being spent in an economical way. People asked, "why give a criminal a better education than an honest boy?" The question was easily answered, on the ground of pounds, shillings, and pence. Criminals preyed on the public, some cost thousands to the public before closing their career. Therefore, it was better that he should be taught honestly at 5 per cent. of the cost of teaching him crime. (Hear.) Education was formerly thought injurious to the poor, this had been long given up, and we considered education should be general, but it was only of late years that we had extended it to criminals, and left off sending the young offender to a gaol where he infallibly became worse. He would refer to the police, as to the effect of these Reformatories in making neighbourhoods safe, which were formerly impassable. (Hear.) This Institution had effected great good—50 had left, and the subsequent career of the majority had been most satisfactory. The Reformatories throughout the country were said to reclaim 75 per cent. His Lordship proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Bowyer, who was a most indefatigable person. (Cheers.)

The Rev. H. J. Hatch, Chaplain to the House of Correction, Wandsworth, seconded the resolution, as he could speak from experience of the benefits resulting from Mr. Bowyer's exertions. He would mention a circumstance which had occurred to him that very morning. A lad who had been sent to prison for thieving, stated that his father had broken his leg, and was in Guy's Hospital, and he added, "please sir, father told me to get into prison till he came out of hospital." When a parent was so unmindful of his responsibility, it was a blessing to the community to remove the boy from his charge, and place him under instruction; but do what they would, they could never give the criminal the feeling of independence, which the honest man possessed however poor, therefore, the honest man was immeasurably superior to any benefit they could confer on the convicted criminal. (Hear.) Those assembled before him proved that all classes felt themselves interested in this important movement, and all such were indebted to Mr. Bowyer for his zeal and perseverance. (Cheers.)

G. J. Bowyer, Esq., said he felt grateful for the kind mention made of him. He had only done his duty, and had done it imperfectly. Lord R. Grosvenor had accused him of writing very often, but he had always found his Lordship ready to reply, and not unfrequently he had found, what he hoped their friends present would bear in mind, a cheque. (Hear.) The working classes were deeply indebted to his Lordship, and though his intentions had lately been misunderstood, he felt sure he had their welfare deeply at heart. In conclusion, he asked the support of the meeting, for there was still much to do. The new building would cost £850, of which only £450 had as yet been subscribed. (Cheers.)

"God save the Queen" was then sung by the inmates.

The Rev. Canon Dale announced that he would give all his parishioners an opportunity of contributing, by having a collection as soon as possible. (Cheers.)

The meeting then separated.

The architect of the new Building is A. J. Baker, Esq., of Barton Crescent, who kindly gives his services gratuitously.

On Wednesday, December 19, the new Building was opened by a public meeting very fully attended, which derives additional interest from the fact of its having been the last attended by that excellent man, Sergeant Adams, assistant judge of the Middlesex Sessions, whose lamented death took place a very short time afterwards.

The proceedings, as those of the last meeting, commenced with prayer by the Rev. J. H. Gurney, and a hymn by the inmates.

The chair was taken by the Hon. W. J. Cusper, M.P., who expressed his gratification that an Institution which commenced with so small a beginning had been expanded to such limits. In former times the only course was to punish crime, and when, as almost always happened, the criminal repeated his offence, increased severity was resorted to. Of late years there had been a vast improvement in our prisons; moral agency was brought to bear, which had been productive of the best results. In the solitude of prison, an opportunity for reflection was given, seldom afforded in the turmoil of life, and the better feelings exercised their due influence. The dictates of benevolence had been found to be the dictates of wisdom. When the criminals left prison there was often a great struggle in their minds whether they should return to former vices, or endeavour to elevate themselves to an honest, respectable position, but they were in circumstances which rendered it most difficult to follow the right path. He knew of no more pitiable condition than that of a man who came out of prison with a desire to reform, who had repented of the evil which he had committed, but who found every avenue of honest employment closed. There was a repugnance against the branded felon, and he was irresistibly drawn from the point at which he hoped to arrive, to the depths he desired to avoid. Unless he had a stronger will, and greater determination than most of his class, it was almost impossible for him to avoid resuming his former evil course. This was the moment at which this, and similar Institutions stepped in to his aid, and gave him a chance of getting on, providing a fold for these wandering sheep at the moment they were most liable to stray—(cheers)—and teaching them those trades which would enable them to earn their own living. It was a remarkable circumstance that the mass of our criminals were ignorant of any trade. (Hear.) They displayed ability and ingenuity in abstracting property, and it was the object of the Institution to divert those talents into a better channel, to change those who preyed upon society, into useful members of it. All might assist by purchasing articles of their manufacture. Moral and industrial training was their object, to comparative neglect of mere scholastic culture. (Hear.) The inmates were taught that there were some who cared for them; and that the love which was manifested in providing them with a home, and means of reformation, was but a reflection of the Divine Love. Thus, they were won not by fear, but love, the only way in which great and lasting changes could be wrought in the human heart. (Cheers.)

S. Cave, Esq., the Hon. Secretary said, that the recent great alterations had prevented his furnishing a complete report, according to his promise at the last meeting, (reported in the XIX or September number of this Magazine.) He hoped, however, before long, to show how far the Institution was self-supporting, not that it can ever be strictly self-supporting: the expenses being considerable, and the inmates being sent out to get their own living so soon as they become tolerable workmen: still in a wider sense it may be called self-supporting. An Institution which for a few pounds a head, turns thieves, who cost the country hundreds a year, into honest men, and prevents boys from becoming thieves—a society which turns wasps into bees; idlers and rogues into steady workers, may be called, looking to the country at large, more than self-supporting, a lucrative investment of public money. (Cheers.) We have proved that it is not impossible to reform criminals, and silenced objections on that score; and now we hear it said that society is improving, and that these efforts are superfluous: we hope it is improving, but it is in consequence of such efforts: these objectors forget the workers; society improves as the coral reef grows, by the secret toil of many unobtrusive laborers, whose number and whose efforts must be increased before it can lift its head above the waves of crime. (Cheers.) He called their attention to the building, it had cost a large sum, but there was no architectural beauty in it, it was a mere box with square holes in it, adapted for its purpose, nothing more; not that the committee were blind to architectural excellence, but because they grudged spending on embellishments, even the small sum which might save one sinner from the error of his ways. (Hear.) He adverted to the movement being taken up on a large scale by Government and Counties, and said he considered there was great danger of failure. The work could not be done by ordinary paid agents, a man must have his heart and soul in it; unless he had, the best system could be of no avail. He gave some statistics of the Institution, that since 1852, when they commenced with six inmates, 51 had left, of whom 5 had emigrated; 13 had been established in trade; 14 had joined army or navy; 4 had been provided for by friends; 7 had quitted prematurely; 1 had been dismissed, and 1 had died. There were at present 35, one being a ticket-of-leave man. (Hear, from Sergeant Adams)—of whom 3 were training as assistants for Reformatory Schools. The present building would contain 100, to defray expense of which a large sum was wanting, and he trusted the liberality, as well as the interest of the meeting would not suffer the undertaking to languish for want of funds. (Cheers.)

Mr. Sergeant Adams said, this was a subject of vital importance to the entire Empire. He thought people were now taking a correct view of the punishment of crime, and reformation of criminals. The two should not be confounded. The criminal should undergo the punishment due to the offence, before being admitted to the advantages of a Reformatory. He himself was peculiarly interested in these Institutions, the first of the kind having been established in Warwickshire many years ago by one of his name and family. (Hear.) Most people heard that he was opposed to the ticket-of-leave system. Nothing could be more absurd than turning men out of prison with a sum of money in their pockets, and a blemished character. Why, the first thing they did was to make up for their confinement by spending the money in jollification; probably with their old companions in crime; and at any rate they found the hope of honest employment cut off. No one would trust them. The learned Sergeant narrated anecdotes in support of his views; and concluded by saying, that if convicts who behaved well, were, instead, made to pass through the purifying ordeal of a Reformatory, it would be a vast improvement on the present monstrous system. (Cheers.)

Sir B. Hall said, they had met to prosecute an object which had been put forward of late years by philanthropic persons, but which had been originated in the metropolis many years ago, and had been stopped by circumstances on which it was unnecessary to dilate (referring to Captain Brenton's scheme, written down by the Times.) We were now living in an age of improvement of all kinds, scientific, social, moral, and political. Sergeant Adams had spoken of the county of Warwick, and he was glad to see that a meeting had recently been held by the influential Roman Catholics of the county, who had determined to establish a large Institution, to which £4,000 had been already subscribed, for the reformation of criminals of their faith. (Hear, hear.) He hoped the inhabitants of the large and wealthy Borough of Marylebone would vie with the Catholics of Warwickshire, and produce an Institution worthy of the district, and of the objects to which it was dedicated. (Hear.) He had often wondered how the wretched children who swarmed in the streets could ever be brought to maturity; and yet more, how any of them could avoid sin, or overcome the temptations into which they were so early led. One object of Reformatories was, to bring up these children in a way to make them abhor vice, and the other object to bring back into a better state those who had fallen. The great evil of the ticket-of-leave system was, that the men discharged from custody had no place to which they could go, but in an Institution like this they were sheltered for the time, and removed from former temptations. It had been said by the Secretary that men like Mr. Bowyer, who conducted this Institution from disinterested motives, were far more valuable than paid superintendants. In this he quite agreed, they were more valuable to the Institutions themselves, and they were more valuable in a wider sense, they formed a link between classes, and forced the lower classes to think well and kindly of those above them, instead of joining in the cry, which he was happy to say was daily lessening, against the gentry. The Right Hon. Bart. concluded by assuring the meeting that he would spare no exertions to further so valuable an Institution. (Cheers.)

R. Hanbury, Esq., said, that he was happy to advocate the cause of the Institution, having for some time had experience of the value of such projects, in one of his own in another quarter of the metropolis. (Cheers.)

The Rev. J. H. Gurney said, that some people averred that the war compelled us to look into the condition of the lower classes; there could be no greater mistake. It was during the long peace that so many Institutions for the improvement and reformation of the dangerous classes of society had sprung up. The absorbing interest of the war, as well as the taxes rendered necessary by its vast expense, had acted very injuriously on all charitable Institutions. (Hear.)

Mr. Curtis, the Rev. Mr. Hatch, and other gentlemen, having addressed the meeting, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, and the proceedings terminated.

On the 9th of February, a conversational meeting was held at the Reformatory, when a discussion took place in which S. Cave, Esq., Hon. Secretary, G. H. Oliphant, Esq., Barwick Baker, Esq., Mr. Leland, the Rev. H. J. Hatch, and others joined. The feeling of the meeting seemed to be in favor of compulsory education of neglected children, and of making the parents contribute towards the expense. Apprehension was expressed that paid agency might not prove so successful as voluntary effort, and it was therefore considered that government should support voluntary movements, rather than found Institutions of its own. Regret was expressed at the division which took place among the promoters of Reformatories at the conference, the day before, in consequence of a portion having objected to the admission of Roman Catholics into the Reformatory Union.

The Roman Catholics of England are becoming active in the Reformatory Movement, and of their most important meeting, held at Birmingham, the first week of December last, we have the following report from The Birmingham Mercury, of December 8th :—

“The Right Rev. Dr. ULLATHORNE, of Birmingham, was called upon to move the first resolution, which, after recognising the alarming increase of juvenile delinquents, and the principle of reforming juvenile offenders being preferable to punishing them, recommended the establishment of a school for the reformation of such Catholic youths as might be convicted of crime in the counties of Warwick, Stafford, Derby, Oxford, Leicester, Nottingham, Northampton, Salop, and Worcester. He observed that their fellow-countrymen had established, or commenced to establish reformatory institutions in not less than twenty-five counties, and it was therefore high time the Catholics also began operations. (Hear, hear.) They had amongst them a large class of poor, who were placed in a most exceptional condition, uprooted from their native homes by circumstances the most sad, and the most heart-rending, and thrown upon the broad world in search of bread and shelter. They came to this country in vast numbers, and wherever they came, from their poverty they were cast into the most miserable and contaminating parts of our large towns. That class of distressed brought with them their own feelings, their own traditions, their own habits, which were indeed very little understood amongst those amid whom they were destined to live. They were placed, as it were, in almost a state of repulsion wherever they went, for that faith which is their constant, their great, their one support and consolation, was alas, too often the very cause of the repulsion they found on every side. (Cheers.) They had no friend except their priest, and they were so separated that in many places they could not even find that friend. Their patience, their endurance, their piety, and above all, their reliance upon the providence of God which rules over the sad destiny of these virtuously heroic, are known only to God and to us. Out of this class there had sprung another—another had sprung out of their very poverty. There were orphans not a few, who had been made such by fever and by pestilence; there were fathers in America and Australia in numbers, whose children were here, perhaps with widowed mothers; there were fathers and mothers separated from each other in search of labour, and who never again found each other. Then there were those who were convicted, who were in our gaols, who were transported, and had made another class of orphans. Then there were a class who came themselves without any protectors. How often had he met, while walking on the public road, young women, with the freshness of innocence upon their faces, their shawls drawn over their poor heads, and their feet naked, asking their way to this town, or that, seeking some relative, and it had made his heart ache, when, after giving them a few words of advice, and passing them by, he thought how little they knew to what they were going. He did not include these in the crime class; but he said they were hastening to those places where they would find a crime class. There was still another class whom intemperance had made miserable. All these classes were thrown into the most contaminating quarters of our towns; their homes were rather dens of squalor and denudation, than properly speaking homes, nor had they any refuge even to obtain a little wholesome air, except streets filled with gin-shops. These were to be added as causes for the increase of crime amongst those of their communion. It must be remembered that, in addition to their own natural proportion of poor, they had an immense number of poor who came among them, who were most dear to him, and of whom he had said what he had said in apology and explanation. Notwithstanding all these causes, upon inquiry he found that the numbers of young delinquents convicted of crime, so far as he was able to ascertain, were far fewer than the general statements and reports put forth would lead them to conclude. He had made inquiries from the chaplains attending the gaols in the four counties in which he was particularly interested. In Stafford Gaol, so far as known to the chaplain, there had been in the course of last year 300 men who had declared themselves Catholics, six youths under sixteen, and one or two girls. At a great meeting held last year, Captain Fullford, the respectable governor of that gaol, stated that in the course of the previous five years, 20,000 persons had passed through Stafford gaol, giving an average of 4,000 persons per annum. In the gaol at Worcester, the number of Catholic men in the course of the present year, as far as known to the chaplain, had been fourteen; women, four; boys and girls, two or three. In the gaol at Warwick, as far as known to the chaplain, the number of Catholic men was sixty-three; women, thirty-five; boys, ten; girls, five. From Coventry gaol he had not received returns. In the gaol at Oxford, he believed there were very few Catholics, the chaplain wrote that there had been no boy or girl there to his knowledge, during the course of the past year. He now came to Birmingham Borough Gaol. The chaplain of this prison had visited during the whole period of his appointment twenty-four men, sixteen boys, and seventeen women; there were now under his care six men, four women, and no boys; during the whole of this year he had not seen more than eight men, five or six women, and only one boy. If these returns could be taken as proofs of the number of Catholic delinquents confined in the gaols of these counties, it would give an extraordinary low average; but he was convinced they showed no really accurate result. (Cheers.) They proved to how many Catholics they chaplain had been introduced, and they proved nothing more. In the Birmingham Borough Gaol, he found the rules, requiring that the chaplain should not see a criminal unless the prisoner asked for him, was most rigidly enforced; and in several cases he had reason to know, where parents had spoken to the clergyman, and he had consequently asked to see prisoners, he had received the answer that they had not asked to see him. (Hear, hear.) He had also reason to believe that in the course of this year, although the chaplain declared he had had but one boy introduced to him, there had been at least three or four youths in that gaol, Catholics, who had been sent over to the Reformatory Institution at Saltley, or other Reformatory Schools, without the Catholic chaplain having had an opportunity of seeing them. (Hear, hear.) From these statistics he came to the conclusion either that the Catholic criminals in these counties were very few indeed, which the public was not willing to admit. (Laughter.) Or that no opportunity was given to reform them. (Hear, hear.) He could form a fair idea of what the proportion used to be between Catholics and the other criminals of this country. He passed eight years of his life in the colonies to which our convicts were transported; and the average of Catholic criminals transported from England, as compared with others, was ten per cent. Sergeant Adams, in an able letter to the Times last week, stated the average number of young criminals in England, up to the age of fourteen, as compared to the whole body of criminals, was ten per cent.; the average between the ages of fourteen and twenty was fully fifty per cent.; that would give sixty per cent. to a crime class ranging up to twenty years of age. What he had laid before them he considered to be calculated to induce the strongest possible motives for carrying out the objects of the Institution they were met to promote. The actual number of Catholic poor in Birmingham could not be less than three or four and twenty thousand. The Birmingham police returns for 1854 shewed that the numbers summarily convicted or held to bail, were 783 males, 112 females, total 895; the numbers committed to sessions were 378 males, 126 females, total 504; committed to assizes, 46 males, 13 females; total 51. Of these the number under sixteen years of age summarily convicted and held to bail was 209 males, and 29 females; committed to sessions, 60 males, and 8 females. The Rev. Dr. read the education classification from the same return, proving ignorance to be a main source of crime; and then went on to say that, despite Shakspeare's famous question, he was of opinion that there was a great deal in a name. Although the word Reformatory was as modest a word as could be adopted for the general expression of the object of which they were speaking, yet he should not like a name, modest even as that, attached to an Institution of that kind. He would not have a name which in any manner indicated that a youth came from an establishment in which he had been confined as a criminal. (Hear, hear.) They knew well the truth of that proverb, "give a dog a bad name and hang him." The learned prelate, in support of his argument, referred to the excellent practice of never calling transports "convicts" or "prisoners" in Australia; to the titling of reformatories in France, "Colonie Agricole;" and in Scotland, "Houses of Refuge," or "Industrial Schools." He next adverted to the paramount importance of providing a good "head" for such an establishment; mentioned that the venerable abbot present had selected such a man, a British subject, from a similar association in France, which he had successfully conducted; and remarked that there must ever be by the side of the superior a chaplain selected from amongst hundreds, combining within himself the most generous self-devotedness, the most minute knowledge of human nature, and at the same time that rare power of winning and attracting boys. The indispensable requisites of outdoor employment; the essential elements of curing the physique, acting through the mind upon the body, as well as through the body on the mind, were ably enlarged upon. Of the utility of classification and probationary treatment, the learned prelate discussed at length, and proceeded to observe, that they had then to decide whether they would commit the unfortunate, unhappy criminal of their faith to others, or take the charge upon themselves. (Hear, hear.) They had to consider whether they would respond to the invitation held out by government to all religious sects: whether they could, by taking up this system, virtually put themselves into a position to win the confidence of the government, of public opinion, and of the magistrates, and having won that confidence, whether they should not be able to penetrate further into their gaols. (Hear, hear.) Whether they should not be able gradually to obtain their strict rights in this free country. (Cheers.) Whether they would show they had in them the benevolence, charity, and zeal which inspired their fellow-countrymen or not—they had to prove whether they were worthy of the opportunities put into their hands; whether they would leave their Catholic convicts to fester in gaols, or pass into other Reformatories, where they could never be internally reformed, for the Catholic heart could receive no other religion but the Catholic. (Cheers.) And if they were not in Catholic hands they would become hypocrites, and be thrown again on society worse than when they entered these Schools. (Applause.) He concluded by intimating that it was said the Catholics, by instituting Reformatories, were beginning at the wrong end; and by maintaining that this was not the case, inasmuch that Catholic education was in a satisfactory condition, and they were thus working at both ends. The Right Rev. Dr. resumed his seat amid loud applause.

The Right Rev. the Abbot of St Bernard's Monastery made a statement declaratory of his opinion in favour of the establishment of a Reformatory School, and that he and his brethren were willing to undertake the reformation of Catholic Juvenile Offenders. He entered into full details of the plan on which the Institution would be founded, said the building was in course of erection four miles from the Abbey at Charnwood Forest, would cost £966 10s. 3d. exclusive of painting, &c., and would accommodate 100 boys. (Cheers.) A lodge would have to be put up at a cost of £60, and it was necessary to purchase fifty acres of land, at a cost of £2500; the present quantity of land attached to the monastery, 230 acres, being not more than sufficient to support the community, and the 100 poor daily relieved. A total sum of £4000 would be at least required. The inspector of prisons had signified his intention to certify the Reformatory, as soon as it was ready for occupation, which would be in about three months. (Hear, hear.) And the Government would then give 5s. per week for the support of each boy. From this, the land to be provided, and no officials having to be paid, it was fully anticipated that the Reformatory would become self-supporting. (Applause.) The rules would be almost the same as at the Institution of La Grand Trappe; and the management would be vested in the Abbot."

From Northamptonshire we have the following Report, and we beg attention to the observations of the Rev. H. J. Barton, as they are of great importance to all; particularly to our friends in Ireland, who are only about to commence the establishment of Reformatory Schools.

Northamptonshire Society, for promoting and extending Education, in accordance with the principles of the Established Church.

(Extracted from the 'Northampton Herald' of Saturday, Feb. 16, 1856.)

The General Meeting of this Society was held on Tuesday last at the George Hotel, in this town. There were present, the Bishop of Sodor and Man, Lord Lilford, Rev. Lord Alwyne Compton, the Dean of Peterborough, E. Bouverie, Esq., Col. Cartwright, W. B. Stopford, Esq., W. Smyth, Esq., H. O. Nethercote, Esq., H. P. Markham, Esq., H. P. Gates, Esq., Revds. Henry J. Barton, P. Lee, Thos. James, Chr. Smyth, G. S. Howard Vyse, W. Woolcombe, H. De Sausmarez, R. Isham, D. Morton, F. M. Stopford, Hamlet Clark, J. H. Brookes. &c., &c., &c.

On the motion of Colonel Cartwright, Lord Lilford was invited to preside.

REPORT OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE.

The Minutes of the previous Meeting having been read, Lord Alwyne Compton read the following Report:—

"When the Northamptonshire Society for the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church determined, in August 1854, to discontinue its central schools in Northampton, to enlarge its objects, and, consequently, to adopt a somewhat different name,—the following were laid down as the chief points to be kept in view:—

- 1st. The introduction into rural schools of industrial instruction.
- 2nd. The establishment of a training institution for the masters of such schools.
- 3rd. The periodical inspection of such schools.
- 4th. The improvement of the grammar schools throughout the county, and establishment of additional schools for the middle classes.
- 5th. Reformatory institutions for young criminals of both sexes.
- And, 6th. Industrial feeding schools for the unemployed children in towns.

To which must be added, what has always been an object of the Society, viz., to make grants towards the building of parochial schools.

Your Committee have now to state how far these objects have been attained during the last 18 months.

The Society having resolved, at its last annual meeting, to proceed first with the Reformatory Schools, one of these (that for boys) has already been opened. Full particulars with respect to it will be found in the report of the Reformatory School Committee, from which it will also be seen that the corresponding institution for girls has been delayed, because the building to be used for that purpose is not yet available.

The first steps towards the establishment of the Training Institution for Schoolmasters at Peterborough have also been taken. It will be seen from the report of the Special Committee that the Lord Bishop of Peterborough has presented the Society with an acre of land, in an excellent position, near the cathedral; that a house has been taken as a temporary residence for masters; and that plans and designs for a practising school are in preparation, which it is proposed to build as soon as possible, so as to open the Training Schools this year.

The Committee regret that they cannot lay before the present meeting an estimate of the expense of the practising school.

The Inspector has nearly completed his examination of the schools in union with the Society, and his report will be laid before the meeting.* The Committee regret that it is not in their power to remunerate him adequately for his services to the Society. They propose that the Society should pay him £30 a year for the keep of a horse and his extra travelling expenses.

The Society has made small grants towards the building of two parochial schools, in the parish of Hargrave, and the parish of St. Peter's, Northampton.

With respect to Grammar and Middle Schools, it will be seen that the Special Committee have been in communication with the managers, in certain cases, as to the means of rendering such schools more efficient, and have also prepared a scheme for a self-supporting * Not laid before the meeting in consequence of having been wrongly posted.

---

Middle School in Northampton, but they have deferred carrying out their scheme in the hope that the Charity Commissioners' Inspector, who has lately visited the town, may render it unnecessary. Should this not be the case, this Society cannot employ its funds more efficiently in the cause of education than in opening such schools, which in a few years will be found to exert a powerful influence on the lower classes, as well as those who attend them.

Among the new rules to be submitted to this meeting is one for the appointment of corresponding members.

Your Committee trust that one effect of that measure will be greatly to extend the influence of the Society in the county, and to enlarge the subscription list.

They trust that their receipts in the present year will thus become sufficient to enable them to make the following grants from the annual income of the Society, for each of which a resolution will be proposed to the meeting, viz. :—

Inspector of Schools.....	£35
Paid Clerk .....	25
Building Parochial Schools .....	50
Towards support of Reformatory School .....	110
Ditto      Training School .....	110
General or contingent expenses.....	50

In the event of the hopes of the Committee being disappointed, it will be necessary to reduce the grants; the opening of the Training School must be deferred; the grants to building schools diminished; and the capital of the Society treasured upon for maintaining objects which are all essential.

This, however, your Committee are willing to hope is impossible.

The General Statement of the Income and Expenditure of the Society for the past year is as follows :—

	General Purposes.			Training School.			Reformatory.			Middle School.			Gross Total.
	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.	£	s.	d.
Received.	976	2	0	842	1	0	1231	19	0	20	0	0	3070	2	0
Paid.....	164	19	1				383	17	6				548	16	7
In hand ..	811	2	11	842	1	0	848	1	6	20	0	0	2521	5	5

TRAINING AND PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS.

The Report of this Committee was next read, as follows :—

The Society having determined to open a Training Institution for masters, at Peterborough, where they may be prepared for the management of Schools in rural parishes, your Committee, at their first meeting, addressed enquiries to the Committee of Council on Education as to whether they might hope for assistance in carrying out their object from the annual Parliamentary grant. They were informed, in reply, that such help could only be granted on the usual condition, viz. : their training the students in such a manner as to qualify them to hold Certificates, and giving them, in short, a higher amount of instruction than the Society had contemplated.

Your Committee, therefore, felt it necessary to examine anew the whole question as to the advantages and disadvantages of employing "certificated" masters in rural parishes. It cannot be doubted that a highly-educated teacher will increase the efficiency of any school he is placed over, provided that, in extending his knowledge, he has not neglected to pay full attention to the best methods of teaching, nor omitted to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the subjects usually taught in village schools. These dangers seem carefully guarded against in the scheme of examination for training colleges which the Committee of Council had adopted.

Such masters, however, are often objected to, either because they are too expensive, or because they are above their work. The first difficulty is removed by the minute of the Committee of Council for making grants for the support of schools in rural districts and towns with less than 5,000 inhabitants, such grants to be proportioned to the number of scholars in regular attendance. With the assistance thus given, a master holding a certificate may generally be obtained at an expense (to the promoters of a parish school) less than the hire of a labourer at 12s. a week; less, therefore, than could well be offered to any other trained master.

Moreover, it appears by returns which your Committee have received, and of which a summary is appended to this report, that the sums actually paid to masters in the county would, with capitation grants, &c., be amply sufficient for 'certificated' masters. And as regards the objection that such masters are above their work, the Committee trust this will not be the case with those trained in the proposed institution at Peterborough, with express reference to industrial and other requirements of village schools.

Your Committee have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the instruction given in the Training School should be adapted to the Government examinations. The Society will, by this means, be entitled to considerable grants to the school, amounting to between one-fourth and one-third of the annual expense, besides grants towards the building.

During the past year, the Lord Bishop of Peterborough has kindly presented to the Society, with the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, one acre of ground, in an excellent position, not far from the Cathedral, and on this site the Training School will be built. The precise position of the acre, forming part of what is known as the Vineyard Estate, has been fixed upon by the Committee, so as to suit the convenience of the Cathedral Grammar School Trustees, to whom they understand that an acre had, in like manner, been conveyed. The deed (if not done already) will be executed in a few days. Besides this, the Committee propose to rent one acre of land adjoining, so as to enable the students to work and receive instruction in gardening, and thus qualify them to manage schools where agricultural employment is combined with in-door lessons.

As it is highly desirable that the Society should proceed cautiously, they have determined, in the first instance, only to build a school-room (with class rooms attached), where the students may practically learn the art of teaching, and whither the boys of the new parish in Peterborough (about to be formed into a district), may be expected to come. The other buildings, such as master's residence, &c., they have determined not to commence till the Training School shall have been brought fully into operation.

To secure the satisfactory character of the buildings, they appointed a Sub-committee to act with a Committee of the Architectural Society of the Archdeaconry of Northampton, and to obtain plans and estimates from some competent architect, by which means they hope to avoid all unnecessary expense or unsightliness in the design.

They have also taken, as a temporary residence for the masters and pupils, a house adjoining the two acres of land, at a rent of £20 a year, which is underlet till the Society shall require the use of it.

The probable annual expense of the Training School will be found in the report of the General Committee.

The annual subscriptions of the Society are not, at present, sufficient to justify it in opening its Training Institution, even on the most moderate scale. Your Committee trust, however, that this may soon be remedied, as no real improvement can take place in the Parochial Schools save through the employment of duly trained masters. The supply of such masters from existing institutions is even now unequal to the demand for them, and in few, if any of them, are they prepared to take charge of schools where much stress is laid upon industrial teaching.

The Committee are glad to state that the number of Parochial Schools in the county continues steadily to increase. During the past year the Society has made small grants to two new schools, at St. Peter's, Northampton, and at Hargrave. When the house in St. Giles's-street shall have been sold, you will have more ample means at your disposal to assist in building schools where they are still required."

The Report on the Pecuniary Condition of the Schools throughout the County was then read as follows:—

"In the month of February, of last year, the secretaries, by direction of the general Committee, sent circulars to the clergy in the county, requesting information as to the schools in their several parishes, the number of scholars, the size and height of the rooms, the salaries of the teachers, and the sums paid by the children. From 143 rural parishes (as well as from the towns) answers were received from which the following tables are compiled:—

Size of Parish	No. of Parishes in the County.	Aggregate Population.	No. of Returns of Par. sent in.	Aggregate Population.	Schools Mixed, Mistress, Master, &c.	No. of	Average Population.	Average Attendance.	Salaries.	Average
Under 150	36	3,365	21	2,409	None - - - - - Mixed, Mistress - - - Endowed Grammar - - -	14 6 1	105 124 135	19	£ 5 to 25
Under 600	147	51,320	63	24,275	None - - - - - Mixed, Mistress - - - Mixed, Master - - - Mixed, or Boys and Girls Master and Mistress - - Mixed, Master, and Infant Boys, Mixed and Infant Other Schools - - -	12 20 10 15 3 1 2	272 272 406 463 399 450 418	24 29 47 79 140 47	5 to 35 12 to 61 25 to 51 39 to 100
Under 1,000	60	45,778	36	27,708	None - - - - - Mixed, Mistress - - - Boys, Master - - - Mixed, Master - - - Mixed, or Boys and Girls Master and Mistress - - Mixed, Master, and Infant Mixed, Master, Mistress, & Infant	1 2 2 9 17 2 2	796 709 667 730 797 875 822	40 36 50 65 100 104	17 to 31 25 to 37 30 to 80 21 to 30 32 to 85 32 to 100
To 1,500	28	32,684	16	18,148	No School (being established) Boys, Master - - - Mixed, Mistress - - - Mixed, Master - - - Mixed, or separate— Master and Mistress - - Mixed, Master, and Mistress and Girls endowed - - Several Mixed and Infant	1 4 1 2 6 1 1 1	1,443 1,201 1,277 1,107 1,185 1,069 1,231	59 38 61 88 159 210	30 to 75 27 to 35 46 to 100
Above 1,500 to 5,000	15	32,018	7	14,181	Boys only - - - - - Mixed, or separate— Master and Mistress - - Master & Mistress, and Infant	1 2 2 4	1,577 1,548 2,386	50 80 189	57 to 60 105 to 130
5,000 & upwards	4	45,606
	286	166,165	137	84,624
	390	210,770

In many of the small parishes, with no school, the children may perhaps go to an adjoining parish school.

Without going into lengthened calculations, it may be stated on the authority of these tables, that in parishes of less than 600 inhabitants with mixed schools under a mistress, it would be possible, with Government aid, to raise the salary of the mistress from £23 to £42 a year, for which a good certificated mistress may be obtained; and the same results would follow in other cases.

Again, if we suppose that in parishes of less than 150 inhabitants, no school is needed; that in other parishes with less than 600, there should be a mixed school, under a mistress; in parishes from 600 to 1,000, mixed schools under a master; in parishes from 1,000 to 1,500, schools under a master and a mistress; and in larger parishes, separate infant school besides, under a mistress, we shall find, from the numbers given in the above tables, the following results (as affecting the whole county):

		Masters.	Mistresses.
36 parishes under	150	—	—
147     "     "	600	—	147
60     "     "	1,000	60	—
28     "     "	1,500	28	28
15     "     "	5,000	15	30
		103	205

Or about 100 masters and 200 mistresses will be required for the rural parishes in the county. These the Society may, perhaps, hereafter be able to furnish from its training institution, though, in the first instance, it proposes to confine its operations to masters for rural schools.

We cannot conclude this report on the pecuniary condition of the schools in the county, without referring to the very gratifying condition of the schools in the town of Northampton, in which there are employed, according to the returns we have received for six parishes only, no less than 12 masters and mistresses, nine of them certified, besides pupil teachers, at salaries amounting altogether to upwards of £700 a year. At the time the Society commenced its operations in 1812, its central school was the only one in the town; and we hope that the training school at Peterborough may, in like manner, form a nucleus around which will spring up many efficient parochial schools, and that the work of education may advance under the auspices of the Society during the next 44 years, as it has done during those that are past."

REFORMATORY COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The following report was next read:—

"Your Committee have to report that, after agreeing to a series of resolutions for their future guidance, they advertised for suitable premises and land, with the intention of receiving boys under 16 from any gaol in the county (including the Soke of Peterborough), or unconvicted boys who have fallen into vicious courses.

Your Committee having failed in obtaining what was required, some of its members agreed to advance a sufficient sum to purchase a small farm of 34 acres at Tiffeld, near Towcester, the Society paying the interest upon the mortgage so far as it exceeded the rent. The tenant of the farm expressed his willingness to take as many acres as the Society had no immediate occasion for at the same rental as before, although he would lose the advantage of the barns and other buildings.

It is hoped an arrangement will be made whereby the society shall pay £50 a year for 12 acres of land and the buildings referred to, with the power of taking as much more of the remaining 22 acres as they may require, and of purchasing the whole at the original cost.

Having obtained the land, your committee agreed upon plans for building a school and school-house to accommodate a master and about 30 boys, which has been done in a most satisfactory manner by Mr. Dunkley, of Blisworth, for the sum of £383 10s.

Your Committee having made known the character of the proposed institution to the rector of the parish, and conferred with him on the subject, proceeded next to enquire for a master and superintendent, and they consider themselves fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Julius Benn, who has been highly recommended for his experience and zeal in a similar institution, and who, for the present, will take the entire management of the school under the Committee.

Your Committee have likewise to state that application was made at quarter sessions for the use of the militia store-house, in the town of Northampton, for a Female Reformatory School, and that the sessions have agreed to give up the store-house for that purpose as soon as a new one is built.

As regards their financial position, your Committee beg to refer to the report of the general Committee, by which it will be seen that, in answer to the appeal agreed upon at the annual meeting last year, the sum of £1,221 14s., donations, and £10 5s., annual subscriptions, have been received, which, they regret to say, fall far short of what was expected, particularly in annual subscriptions.

Your Committee also regret that they have experienced a further disappointment in their appeal to the Committee of Council of Education for grants towards rent, &c.

In conclusion, your Committee have to state that the school-house, having been examined by Her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons, and certified by the Secretary of State, is now opened for the reception of boys approved of by the Committee; and that, in addition to the three who were brought from another reformatory by Mr. Benn, one boy has been admitted from the parish of Kettering, his parents paying a shilling a week towards his support. The other three boys are considered to be in a hopeful state, and likely not only to exercise a beneficial influence on their companions, but to be capable of assisting in the work of the establishment, for which they are to receive 1s. a week each.

Rules have been agreed upon for the management of the institution, and a circular and forms of admission (which will be found with other printed documents, on the table) are to be sent to the clerks of the county and borough magistrates, and to those of the city and Soke of Peterborough."

REPORT OF THE MIDDLE SCHOOLS COMMITTEE.

The Middle Schools Committee's Report was next read as follows:

"Your Committee have held several meetings and discussed the question of a Middle School in the town of Northampton. But as one of the Charity Commissioners has recently been to examine the statutes of the Grammar School and other charities in the town, your Committee have determined to await the result of his enquiry. Should the Grammar School continue in its present inefficient condition, your Committee are prepared to lay before the Society a scheme for a day-school of a superior character, the payment to be £2 a quarter for each pupil. They would propose that a house should be taken capable of accommodating 200 day scholars. That, in the first instance, three masters should be engaged to superintend respectively the classical, mathematical and English education of the pupils, at salaries, rising with the number in the school, from £200 to £300 for the head master, from £150 to £200 for second master, and from £80 to £100 a year for third master, besides extra masters for French, drawing, singing and drill. That a certain number of pupils, (30, when the school is full,) should be elected after examination to free scholarships, and that when the school is thoroughly established, three exhibitions of £50 a year, to last three years, be given after examination to those who have been educated in the school, one being open every year. Your Committee are satisfied that such a school, under good masters, would be well attended, and it will be found on calculation that, if so attended, it would more than cover its expenses.

The Endowed School at Guilsborough has also been under the notice of the Committee, and they have reason to hope that (the legal difficulties having been removed) the Trustees will consent to act, and that the school may be made available for the children of farmers and others of the middle classes.

Your Committee have also conferred with the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, on the subject of the Grammar School at Brackley, and are led to expect that the college, either alone or in conjunction with your Society, will convert the present establishment into an efficient Middle School.

Mr. Markham enquired whether any communication had been received from the trustees of the Grammar School at Northampton?

Lord Compton said, that a request had been received that morning by the Middle Schools' Committee, to meet the Trustees of the school to discuss means for its improvement.

Mr. Markham mentioned that a letter had been received from the master of the school, professing his readiness to do anything in his power to forward the views of the Committee.

EXPENDITURE.

Lord Compton said it was necessary at that meeting to authorize the proposed expenditure for the year, and he would now lay the items before the meeting.

After some discussion, in which Col. Cartwright expressed his objection to making payments out of the Annual General Income of the Society, the several items were agreed to, as mentioned in the Report of the General Committee.

The Officers of the Society were next appointed.

It was resolved to petition the county magistrates for permission to hold the Society's annual meeting in the County Hall, and for the Committee to meet monthly in the Grand Jury room, or in the room of the Clerk of the Peace.

Col. Cartwright next proposed the cordial thanks of the meeting to their two excellent Secretaries. Though he had the misfortune to differ with them on the present occasion, no one appreciated the value of their labours more than he did.

Mr. Nethercote seconded the motion.

Mr. Barton rose to return thanks. He said—It would be affectation to say we are not sensible of the compliment paid to us by this meeting, as Secretaries. If I stood alone I should tell my friend Col. Cartwright that what he has said proceeded from the partiality of friendship; but I am thankful to say I do not stand alone, and I have the satisfaction now of giving honour where honour is due. When I remember the clearheadedness, the untiring energy, the singleness of purpose with which Lord Alwyne Compton has devoted himself to this great and good cause, it is impossible for me to speak of him as he deserves. But I am glad to see that his conduct is appreciated by this meeting, as I hope and believe it will be by the county at large. It has been said that if the Church of England is only true to herself she can never fall; and it may be said with equal truth that if the nobility of England are true to themselves her aristocracy can never fall (I use the word true, not in any narrow and bigoted, but in its best sense); and in alluding to my brother secretary I can point to one who fulfils both these requirements; and I hope I am not taking too great a liberty if I say that we have in this room at this moment another instance of the same kind. No one knows my native county without knowing what the Bishop of Sodor and Man has done for Lancashire in promoting the great cause which we are now advocating. And no one knows the Isle of Man without knowing that, in their present bishop, they have a worthy successor of the Wilsons and Hildesleys of former times. Nothing would encourage us more than his lordship's advice and approbation; and if it can only go forth to his own county that he approves of what we are doing it would be the greatest help to us. His lordship knows that we are no new Society; but he may not know, or he may not remember, what ought to be known—that from the year 1812, when it was first established, to the year before last the Northamptonshire Society expended not less than £21,888 in assisting to build schools and in promoting the cause of education. Neither are we in our extended form a bigoted Society, and in part proof of this I will read one of the rules of the Reformatory School—'If the religious persuasion of any of the boys differ from that of the Church of England, a minister of that persuasion, at the request of such boy, or his parents or guardians, may be allowed to visit him, at all proper and seasonable times, under such regulations as the Committee shall approve.' But it has been said, and I am sorry to hear that in one instance it has been hinted at to-day, that we are proceeding upon too extensive and broad a basis. In answer to this I shall, perhaps, save the time of the meeting if I may be allowed to read an extract from a letter which I sent at the beginning of the present movement to one of the most influential members of the Society:—'If we lose sight of the broad view we lose everything. The great object of the united educational movement will fall to pieces. And, instead of one great undertaking, supported by the influence of the whole county (lay as well as clerical), there will be three smaller undertakings, only one of which (the Reformatory) will succeed. The Middle School question will never quicken into life at all, and e Training Institution will again die out for want of lay energy and support. If a Reformatory School is wanted to diminish the numbers in the Gaol, a Training Institution is wanted to promote and extend sound religion and useful learning, so as to diminish the inmates of the Reformatory. And, above all, as a matter of life and death, security to the state, peace to society, and the moral regeneration of the masses of the people, a good and complete education for the middle classes is indispensably necessary. But all these must work together if any great good is to be done. The opportunity is now offered, and it may never be offered again, of combining the whole county for the purpose. There must be difficulties in every great undertaking, but it is un-English to flinch from them, and if I did not honestly believe that you would be the last to do so, I would not trouble you on the subject. Look for a moment at the immense advantage which the influence of a county gives. The ablest advice; the most experienced persons in every department are at its command. Without it, individual bodies are powerless, and the clergy especially are unable to carry forward their part of these educational schemes. The clergy, as a body, are not men of business; they never have been, and, perhaps, from the very nature of their office, they never ought to be. If, therefore, you deprive them of this lay assistance by not allowing the proposed union, you prevent what I believe would do more, not only for the morals, but for the religion of the county, than has ever yet been done for any county in England. How much truth comes out in the quiet discussion of any question before a Committee, and if you would only allow the clergy to be present on proper occasions, and yourselves be present with them from time to time, each would learn to understand and appreciate the other's motives, and truth, instead of prejudice, would be the result. Only keep the general Committee united; let it be combined with separate Committees for special purposes, and let the clergy and laity, for once, be welded together in so good a cause, and we shall be sure to succeed. By this combination we should realize what one of our judges pronounced with his dying breath to be the great want of English society—that 'sympathy' between the highest, the middle and the lowest classes which is of such incalculable advantage to all. I only wish I could state the case as it deserves, and I am sure it would present itself to your mind with irresistible force as an opportunity of doing good which does not happen once in a life, and on which the blessing of the Almighty must rest."

Lord Compton here expressed a hope that, before separating, they might hear something from the lips of the Bishop of Sodor and Man.

The Bishop of Sodor and Man immediately rose, but protested that he was never more taken by surprise than by the request made to him.

Not that he felt a want of interest in the cause of education, or in the advancement of that cause in his own native county, but that owing to his limited knowledge of the county, arising from his long separation, he did not feel himself in a position to express either approval or dissent regarding the proceedings of their Society. It was true he had a strong feeling upon the question of education—the question to which all his energies had been directed for years. He believed it was the question on which the vital interests of England depended, and he was thankful to see that question taken up with such vigour in Northamptonshire.

He would speak upon another point. However energetic the clergy might be, they would find that they would not be able to move so efficiently as was desirable unless they were encouraged and urged on by lay cooperation. He believed, too, from practical experience—and perhaps they would think that he was giving utterance to a bold opinion—that the world was all wrong upon the question of education. He feared that too many were looking to the knowledge of the country instead of the piety of the country, as a means of directing the people in the path of wisdom, forgetting that the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom, and thinking rather through wisdom to lead to the fear of God. He hoped, therefore, that in Northamptonshire they would adhere to the principle which inculcated the love and fear of God, and invoked the aid of true religion to direct every effort for the promotion of education.

There was another point. They would not effect their purpose of rearing a moral and God-fearing population unless they trained their teachers in the fear and love of God. Their efforts, therefore, must first be directed to the training school. It was a most important thing to be careful as to the religious principle of those whom they selected to teach. He would not admit that teachers could be over-educated, but unless secular knowledge could be given them so as to promote humility and piety in their hearts, by which to influence people not so much by their worldly wisdom as by their piety and humility, the knowledge obtained by them would prove to be rather a curse than a blessing.

On the motion of Mr. Barton, it was unanimously resolved, “that the thanks of this meeting be given to F. S. Percival, Esq., the Treasurer; to H. P. Markham, Esq., Clerk of the Peace; and to J. Mercer, Esq., Treasurer of the county, for their valuable services in promoting the interests of the Society.”

Mr. Bouverie proposed, and the Dean of Peterborough seconded, a vote of thanks to the noble Chairman, which was cordially given and responded to, and the meeting separated.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of the Salisbury and Winchester Journal.

SIR,—In a letter recently addressed to Sir E. Kerrison, one of the members for Suffolk, by the Rev. Henry J. Barton, Rector of Wick, Northamptonshire, and published in the local and some of the London papers, the following most important passage occurs:—“I may further remark that though reformatory schools have been established in other counties, I believe Northamptonshire is, as yet, the only one in which the whole question has been taken up; in no other has been combined with them ‘the more noble and necessary duty of endeavouring to prevent crime rather than reform the criminal.’”

Now I would earnestly desire to direct the attention of every inhabitant of Wiltshire, and particularly of the magistrates who will next week meet at the Quarter Sessions, to this important extract.

I confess that I have looked with much misgiving and fear upon the active movement that has been made during the present year among us for the establishment of a reformatory school. But I could not help doubting my own judgment when I saw Mr. Barton's name among the gentlemen who met at Hardwicke Court, as I know him well to be a man of Christian benevolence, practical experience, and sound judgment, equal to any one in the whole of the united kingdom. But this explanation of his more extended views and feelings has fully confirmed my former opinion, and I cannot but regret that no allusion was made to them in the account that lately appeared in your paper of the meeting, as I feel certain he must have pressed them with his usual zeal and force on the notice of the gentlemen who were assembled at Mr. Baker's.

In the present state of our county I cannot but look upon the establishment of the proposed reformatory school as a direct inducement to and premium upon crime, for I will ask any practical man, if every ploughboy in the county would not benefit his condition by getting into this establishment, where he would be provided with every comfort and advantage, and, after a certain period, returned back again into society in a better and higher position? And as there will be but one road by which he can arrive at these advantages, if he fail to discover it for himself, his friends and relatives will soon point it out to him.

Would it not be a work much more acceptable to God, and much more beneficial to man, to endeavour to direct all this zeal and liberality to "the more noble and necessary duty of endeavouring to prevent crime?" For look over the length and breadth of this great county, and I declare, I do not know a single rural parish where the social condition of the labourers is satisfactory, or the means for education anything approaching to efficiency. There may be such—but I do not know them. I know many where there is no day-school of any description, and one instance where in five parishes the schools are only kept in existence in their present wretched and almost useless condition by the liberality of one single individual. And I could name one parish, and that too belonging almost entirely to one of the most active promoters of this reformatory movement, where the social condition is such that the cottages are an outrage upon common decency, where no attempt has ever been made to teach a single ploughboy in the parish to write his name, and where they would have been equally unable even to read if it had not been for the little that has been done for that purpose by the dissenters.

Would it not then be much better to make the improvement of this wretched and deplorable state of things the subject of a county movement? Let every gentleman who has taken part in this reformatory movement, exert himself to the utmost, by his own liberality, and by his influence over others, to establish really useful and efficient schools on his own property, and in his own locality. An example would thus be set, and a spirit stirred up that, I do not doubt, would rapidly spread through the whole county. Nothing is wanted for this noble work but the means, and if it is to be done efficiently, they must be given with no niggard hand. Really good education, like all other valuable things, can only be had at a costly price. But it is worse than folly in the professing friends of education, if they are really sincere in their professions, to hesitate for one moment about the cost. For while you remunerate your teachers at a rate below the wages of common labourers, and even then neglect to provide them with the necessary books and other requisites, you cannot expect to obtain it. In your paper of the 15th inst., there was an advertisement for a schoolmistress for a country parish, and offering a salary of eight pounds a year. This, I fear, is too just an example of the liberality of other country parishes. And what must be the result of such a system as this? You must of necessity get a person who is unable to teach properly the most common rudiments, and to such a person you entrust the entire control and management of the education of a whole parish. You are then surprised at the results, and pretend to regret that reformatory schools have become necessary.

It is a common thing to hear the professing friends of education ask with exultation, "Have you read such or such a pamphlet on education?" But it is a very rare thing to hear any one speak with commendation of the only efficient step that has, as yet, been taken in this county in the cause of education—the establishment of the training school at Salisbury, for mistresses, by the late Bishop, and its sincere and zealous support by the present Bishop, both before and since he was raised to the bench; and I believe it has only been by great exertions, on the part of a few individuals, that this excellent establishment has been kept in existence. These controversial writings, instead of promoting, only retard and mystify the great question of general education; and I believe that too many of them are put forth only to divert attention from the really important point, how the means are to be provided for a really efficient system of parochial education. To say that the difficulty is a religious one, I do not believe it to be true. I have never known an instance in all my experience, and it has been considerable, where the parents of children, for whose benefit our national schools are intended, ever refused to send their children from religious scruples, when the school was conducted in any degree approaching to usefulness and efficiency. And I know an instance at this moment, where an improvement having been made in the management of a school, all the dissenters in the parish immediately sent their children with alacrity and gratitude. When these objections are made, it is by a different and higher class of persons, and I do verily believe that in most cases they are put forth to keep alive a spirit of controversy, and to divert public attention from those heavy pecuniary sacrifices that must be made, either by voluntary contributions or general assessment, if we are ever to have a really useful and efficient system of parochial education.

But how proud and happy would it make me, if this county would really take up this great question with sincerity and zeal. I believe that a reformatory school would then be unnecessary. And that the few cases of depravity which would even then occur in the present corrupt state of human nature, would be better met by an improved system of prison discipline, and by a legal power being given to the constituted authorities to commit for a longer period those criminals under a certain age, whom they should consider it advisable to subject to a full course of such discipline.

I shall deeply regret if these observations should cause pain to any individual. But I think it a subject on which every inhabitant of the county should fully and freely express an opinion. I cannot, for a moment, doubt the motives by which the promoters of this movement have been actuated. But I would earnestly entreat them to pause, and reflect seriously, before they proceed further. And with the zeal, the talents, and activity that some of them possess, I believe they will see that a higher, a nobler, and much a more useful course of duty lies open to them.

I am, Sir,

Your faithful servant,

G.

In the Illustrated London News, of March 1st. 1856, there appeared a portrait of a very remarkable man, William Driver, the Manager of the Home for Out-Cast Boys, accompanied by an account of that Institution, of which we have, in former Records, given some most interesting details.

About twelve months ago, the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland sent two of their excellent School-Masters to visit some of the English Reformatories, and when those gentlemen had returned we asked one of them—from whom did you gain most valuable and original information?—and the prompt reply was—"from Mr. Driver;" and, oddly enough he added, "I don't believe in Nash, although I have read Mr. Martin's Place of Repentance." This young man's estimate of Mr. Driver is not, we think, too high; and the following letter, from him, which, through the attention of the Recorder of Birmingham we are enabled to insert, is of great interest, and value, in its suggestions:—

Home for Outcast Boys,

Belvedere Crescent, Lambeth,

February 18th, 1856.

Dear Sir,

I need not, I am sure, apologise for addressing you upon the subject of this letter. You have already had from Mr. Whitehead some foreshadowings of the success of our industrial department. But at the time when he wrote to you, describing his occasionally unclerical costume and occupation in our work-room, he was not in possession of the results of our last month's labour. Our arrangements are anything but complete, and our average skill is as yet rather low. Nevertheless our earnings even now are satisfactory. We have now dispensed with all professional assistance, and manage our own affairs. Our numbers had, for reasons of economy, been unavoidably decreased from thirty to fifteen. We did think of keeping to this latter number for some months, but we find it impossible. Our work so increases, that to do it we are compelled to admit more boys. Here is an example of that "life in itself," which since your letter to Mr. Whitehead has become one of our stock sentences.

It is, as you have said, of great importance to have a business which can be speedily learned, and this is certainly the case with ours. It is not necessary, however, for all the boys to be equally proficient. There is a degree of skill which it is indispensable that some of the inmates should possess. I have a scale of proficiency in which I represent the highest skill by a symbol—say 12: lower degrees of skill, I represent by other figures from 1 upwards, altering the figure which represents each boy's skill according to his progress. I find that if I have two in fifteen at 12, the rest may be anywhere between 1 and 12. A boy can be made useful directly he comes in, and then he improves till he can take the place of those who leave.

Our goods are all manufactured to order, and such is the demand, that we can scarcely keep one small house supplied. We readily find customers, and our dealings with them being strictly matters of business, we are expected to send our work in as well as they have been accustomed to have it. In this we are perfectly successful, and the praise of our employer acts upon the boys as a very powerful motive to exertion. Sometimes we have to execute an order very quickly to a given time, and the boys take great pride in getting it done. Any appearance of slackness is a damper to them, just as much as it is to those who are working for their living. In fact, we find them most willing and capable, and—with the opportunity of spoiling valuable materials—careful. We now reckon our profits at nearly 20 shillings a boy per month, and we hope to increase them when we get somewhat clear of the difficulties in which we have got entangled in time past.

There are many details which would be interesting to you had I time to go into them. I have chiefly wished in this letter to let you know how we stand at present, and what appear to be our immediate prospects. Another pen, more used than mine to such discussions, will before long deal with the principle involved in our system of work.

I beg respectfully to reciprocate the kind wishes expressed towards me in your letters to Mr. Whitehead,

And am,

Dear Sir,

Your's obediently,

WILLIAM DRIVER.

M. D. HILL, Esq.

We have received a most admirable, and valuable publication—Reports of the Governor, Chaplain, and Surgeon of the Leeds Borough Gaol, for 1855, but at too late a period to make extracts from it. The Report of the Chaplain, the Rev. G. B. De Renzi, is a most able one, and contains some of the best, and most useful tables we have seen, always excepting those of the Rev. John Clay.

The twentieth report of the Inspectors of Prisons in England is just published. It has reference to the prisons in the southern and western districts, and mentions some disgraceful cases of mismanagement. At Brecon, one of the prisoners was so depressed in spirits from long confinement that he was excused from hard labour at the request of the inspector. In the Cardiff county gaol, the accommodation is most inadequate, and the prisoners are all associated together, without any work, in the most demoralising manner, in utter disregard of the law. At Haverfordwest gaol, the greater humanity of the French law of imprisonment for debt is forcibly called to mind, when it is found that an old man of seventy years of age is incarcerated in a noisome prison for a debt of £124 and interest. The gaol of New Radnor is a disgrace to the nation, and, although it ought only to be used as a house of temporary detention, prisoners have been kept there a whole fortnight. The "airing yard" was found to be occupied by two donkeys and a large hog, it being, too, evidently their ordinary abode. At the new prison of Wells there is no convenience for prisoners seeing their legal advisers in private—"a defect" (remarks the report) "of very serious magnitude." At the Exeter county prison, the barbarous practice of cutting the prisoners' hair too short is condemned by the inspector. At the Exeter city gaol, the system is abominably defective; and rather adapted "to foster than to repress the growth of crime." At Plymouth the large accession of prisoners for refusing to go to sea after signing articles is noticed, and at this gaol a prisoner contrived to escape through a hole twelve inches long by six and three-quarters broad. At Tiverton, a debtor complained of the chaplain for refusing him the privilege of having one of his own books to read. This work, so dangerous in the eyes of the chaplain, turned out to be Milton's Paradise Lost, whereupon the inspector reversed the rev. gentleman's opinion.

Charles Knight has published hundreds of good, interesting, useful and valuable books, but we venture to assert, that amongst these publications there is not one more interesting than that issued in his Weekly Volume, and entitled The Lowell Offering,—composed of the writings of the Factory girls of the Manchester of the United States—Lowell. We beg attention to the following circular, which we have received through the kindness of one of our most energetic and practical philanthropists, and a female one also, now living :—

FACTORY REFORM, AND THE EMPLOYMENT AND EDUCATION OF ORPHANS, THE DEAF AND DUMB, AND THE DESTITUTE.

With a view to the Establishment in Great Britain, of an improved system of Factory Economy, an Institution is projected, the great and leading feature of which, is to combine with the ordinary factory, an establishment for the board, lodging, instruction, and training of the Female Workers.

An approach to this has been for the last forty years carried on at Lowell, in New England, U.S. It has been found to work well, and is attended with very good results—social and commercial—but it has not yet been carried out in Great Britain, where the factory system has been so much condemned, and where the workers, after the hours of labour, dismissed from the premises and dispersed without guidance or control, often become anything but creditable members of society, and the course of their lives is, too frequently, a training in improvidence and vice. Under such circumstances, when the workers become the mothers of other workers, the evil gathers in intensity, the factory system becomes productive of misery to thousands, is a cause of constant physical and mental deterioration, a great social evil, and a national disgrace. Whereas, by such an organization as would regulate the conduct, economize the earnings, and accumulate the surplus, improve the leisure time, enlighten the intellect, train the mind, and provide generally for the comfort, recreation, and welfare of the workers; the factory system, instead of being a byword, would become one of the brightest ornaments of the country, and stand almost unequalled amongst institutions having for their object the welfare of mankind.

By the establishment of organized homes for Female Factory Workers, an opportunity will also be provided for the maintenance and training of Female Orphans, the Deaf and Dumb, and the Destitute generally, by the labour of the parties themselves, who will be taken at an early age and apprenticed to the Institution. When it is considered what a constant and energetic effort is requisite to obtain donations and annual subscriptions, (often by the most pitiable appeals to the compassion of society), to accomplish these objects, how precarious is such support, and how very far short the most successful efforts prove to meet the necessities of the case, it must be admitted by all, that if some plan could be carried out that would permanently enable the destitute, not only to maintain themselves, but to improve their condition, such plan would be one of the greatest blessings that could possibly be conferred upon society.

In addition to the organization of a well-regulated Establishment for the residence, board, and lodging of the female workers, separate suitable Houses will be provided for the married and single male workers.

It is intended to carry on, as a Special Department of the Institution, the Instruction and Training of the workers in their leisure time, mainly by the personal efforts, or under the superintendence of Ladies who may volunteer their gratuitous services, assisted by such well-educated parties as may have been reduced in circumstances, and to whom a comfortable home would be a desideratum. A portion of the Establishment will be appropriated as apartments for those Ladies who may wish to reside there: and when it is seen that Ladies will volunteer to help their fellow-beings amidst disease and death in foreign lands, it is presumed that many will be found who will lend a helping hand to train and elevate the youthful Orphans and Destitute of their own sex at home: and from this contact of highly educated Ladies, who may volunteer their valuable services, with the workers of the factory, the best results may most assuredly be expected.

As one successful self-supporting demonstration, that these objects may be secured, would do more good than a thousand theoretical treatises on the subject, it is proposed to establish near the junction of the West-Riding Railways at Monkhill, Pontefract, Yorkshire, a MODEL FACTORY, for the manufacture of such textile fabrics as may be determined upon by the Direction, chiefly aiming at carrying out that part of the foregoing system, which relates to the employment of Orphans and other destitute persons. The Capital to be raised in part by shares under the limited liability act, and (to meet the views of those parties who would wish to assist the project, but who might object to become commercial partners in a manufacturing establishment), in part by loans or preferential shares, bearing Interest at the rate of £5 per cent per annum, but not more, previous to any dividend being paid to the ordinary shareholders, who would however receive the residue and have the management in their hands.

A Prospectus will be issued as soon as it is ascertained to what extent co-operation can be obtained. Communications from parties who are interested in the project, or who would assist in its promotion, are desired by the originator, Wm. Wood, Monk-hill House, Pontefract, formerly managing Partner of the Wilton Carpet Factory, and First Inventor of the Self-acting Pile Carpet, and Velvet Power Looms, etc., who, from the great interest he takes in the proposed Institution, offers his gratuitous services in the Direction, and will subscribe Five Thousand Pounds to the Capital, from an intense conviction of the immense benefit that would accrue to the parties employed, and also with a full belief in its great commercial success, from having the regular services of steady, well fed, well clothed, and well-trained hands, working under the most favorable circumstances.

MONKHILL-HOUSE, PONTEFRAC.
February, 1856.

Might not English Lowells be formed through such agency as this Prospectus indicates?

We have, in a former part of this Record, referred to Patronage Societies, and have endeavoured to place the history of these Institutions before the reader ; but, through the attention of a lady much interested in this subject, we are enabled to insert the following translation of the paper of M. Jules de Lamarque, on these Societies, read before the International Reunion of Charity, and printed in the June number, 1855, of Les Annales de la Charité :—

Patronage of Young Détenus, and of Juvenile Libérés.

Government and private benevolence had no sooner extended their solicitude towards the Juvenile libérés, than the law of the 5th of August placed them under the patronage of the State. The first Society of Patronage, was formed in the year 1822, and in the year 1847, the Minister of the Interior, through the interposition of his numerous agents and the Municipal Authorities, made enquiries relative to the conduct of the Juvenile Détenus at their places of residence, in order to be enabled to state the results of the moral and useful instruction they had received in the houses of Correction. In fine, the directors of these establishments, had also exercised a species of patronage in procuring them situations as workmen or servants, and have received the most interesting and flattering account of several of those boys they had brought up.

We shall now glance rapidly over these three modes of patronage, and explain their results.

The number of young criminals who leave annually those establishments of correctional education, is very considerable ; during the Summer of 1852, there were 1162, without reckoning the boys who had been sent in by their parents for correction. We can understand from this how necessary it would be to arrange work in which they could be employed, and even to organize something new.

The Government had taken from the Council of the State a draft of the public administrative rule, which will undoubtedly enable them to reap the benefit of the three systems which form the subject of this work.

SOCIETIES OF PATRONAGE.

These Societies have been up to the present, but few in number.

We find the most important of them in the great centres of our population in Paris, Lyons, Strasbourg, Rouen, Toulouse, &c., &c. Space would not permit our describing each of these institutions separately. We will therefore limit ourselves to that of Paris, under the superintendence of M. Béranger (de la Drôme). This institution, which has served as a model to other analogous societies, was founded in 1833, at the instance of M. Ch. Lucas, who has had the honor of founding several institutions of patronage. The statutes were arranged by a company uniting several members of the Institution, who, like their worthy president, M. Béranger, (de la Drôme) held high positions in the official world.

The Society apprenticed the boys who left the house of correctional education, at the expiration of the term of their imprisonment, and the Juvenile détenus to whom the Government gave provisional liberty, in order to prove what progress they made in virtue. These boys are replaced under strict watch, when it is proved that their conduct has not been correct. The former are called definitive libérés, and the latter provisional. The Society proposed this arrangement for the purpose of habituating their pupils to an honest and industrious life, and in order to prevent them relapsing.

The members composing this body, are divided into subscribers, patrons, and donors; these are accepted without limit, in order to extend as far as possible their sphere of action. The subscribers are only called on for the sum they promised. The title of donor is acquired by giving 100 francs annually to the Society. The patrons have the most difficult task to perform, as their employment chiefly consists in procuring situations for the juvenile libérés.

The office of patron is held for three years. The Society have an asylum where all juvenile libérés are received, who, during this period have either fallen ill, or are unable to work. This asylum is placed under the immediate control of a general Agent, M. de Grellet-Wanning, a man of unalterable devotion, who resides in the Rue Mézères, No. 9. He says Mass every Sunday at an Altar placed in the Assembly Hall.

The Society is under the immediate direction of a board, assisted by an Administrative Council, and aided by three Committees, of material and funds, of management and enquiry.

The board is composed of a president, vice-president, of a secretary general or treasurer, in whom rests in fact the executive power of the Society.

The Administrative Council is composed of 12 members, deciding on all matters useful or advantageous to the Institution, which is submitted by them for approval to the board, or to one of the members of the Council. The duties of president and of vice-president, as well as those of secretary general, or treasurer, have been carefully defined. The three Committees are each presided over by a vice-president, whose duty it is to see that the funds are well employed, taking care that the boys are provided for after their final liberation, and making enquiries in order to afford the Administrative an opportunity of placing a young provisional détenu at liberty, and entitling him to seek for reward. In fine, the General Assembly is convoked annually to render an account of the working of the Society, and every six months to hear the reports of the patrons on those confided to their care. In these re-unions, the Assembly nominate counsellors to the vacant places. They introduce modifications in the laws, whenever they find cause. Finally, they bestow rewards on the patrons who merit them.

A paid agent is employed—who accounts to the Treasurer for the recovery of, and expenditure of monies received, takes charge of the minutes, keeps the register, prepares the questions, and makes enquiries relative to the management of the Superiors, and furnishes to the patrons every information necessary for the accomplishment of their mission. The general agent is also employed in procuring situations for the libérés, and trying to arrange with the head workmen the most suitable places, and also to supply for the time the absence of a patron who is ill or stays away. Finally, he is bound to prove monthly the presence of each boy in the place marked out for him by the patron.

The Society negotiates with different contractors, who supply them with everything they require to clothe the libérés.

The patrons are admitted after every possible precaution is taken to guarantee their good conduct to the Society. Their duties are inscribed in a hand-book ad hoc, and they cannot take charge of more than six libérés at a time.

The president represents the entire Society, he corresponds with the established authorities, and it is to him that the demands made by the different public functionaries in the interest of the board are entrusted.

The strictest and most watchful surveillance is exercised over all the libérés, but particularly over those who are still under the restrictions of the clause 66 of the penal code, who have been intrusted to the board as provisional libérés. Those latter are never lost sight of by the patrons, and when they exhibit idleness or disobedience towards their masters, the patron, without waiting for a more serious fault, is bound to represent their misconduct to the president.

This man decides with the board whether the charge is of a sufficiently grave character to require immediate re-incarceration. But even in case the matter has been arranged, the patron is not released from his obligation towards his pupil, and is bound to re-instate him by virtue of a ministerial decision. All the acts of the Society are inserted with the greatest care in the register kept by the agent. The principal is kept in a large book, comprising at once the moral and financial account of each boy, where they have deposited as correctly as possible the history of his life, the information received relative to his family, the progress he has made in advancement, and all the expenses he has occasioned the society.

Then follows the general register of all the members who compose the body, under the title of patrons, donors or subscribers, pointing out the assessments of each, and comprising an annual account, mentioning the date of payments.

Another register comprises the names of all the patrons employed, and of the boys under their care. A third points out the changes, either by getting in or removing any of the furniture belonging to the board.

Those registers are the ground work by which can be proved the receipt of subscriptions, the expenditure of the funds, and the supplying of all kinds of food. Putting money in the savings' bank in the children's name, and the place where the cash is kept, are entered in two different books,

Another very important book points out to you, three months beforehand, the young détenus who are about to leave the houses of correctional education in the neighbourhood of Paris, and the names of the Commissioners who will be employed to institute an enquiry into the conduct of those boys; there is also an account given of the acceptance or refusal of patronage by the libérés.

The minutes of the sittings of the Council of Administration, of the Committee appointed to procure situations, and of the six months' assemblies, are entered in another book separate.

A register in which is copied the correspondence with the administration, the bar, the prefect of police, and other functionaries; finally, there are several secondary registers which complete the vocabulary of the agent's book.

We see, by what has gone before, with what care the Society takes note of the working, and the means necessary to ensure success. The asylum in the Rue Ménières, which was founded in the year 1848, has been very useful to the juvenile libérés, particularly during this time of commercial and political panic which we have had to pass. But it has also made considerable sacrifices to the board for its appropriation, and the support of the boys contained there. These sacrifices have been exclusively beneficial to the juvenile libérés, and whilst their expenses were observed to increase, the salaries of the clerks* continued the same; the right assumed towards them by the asylum was to increase their work, and make them labour more diligently.

The resources of the Society are comprised in the collection of taxes, which the juries award for their advantage, of the subsidies granted by the Corporation, and the prefect of the Seine, of the legacies bequeathed to them, and of the 70 centimes allowed daily by the minister of the interior, for the support of the provisional libérés.

They receive, besides, from the exchequer of this department a claim to any unusual taxes 51,450 francs.

In fine, the Government in order to acknowledge the services rendered by this Institution, has established it legally by a Royal Ordinance, dated June 9th, 1843.

Since the month of May, 1833, the period of its foundation, up to the 31st of December, 1853, the Society has protected 2,155 boys,† definitive or provisional libérés.

252 had renounced all patronage, 124 had been abandoned as incorrigibles; 112 are dead; 964 had ceased to be guardians at the end of three years; 144 provisional libérés had been re-entered into the house of correction; 506 had relapsed into crime, 88 of whom had belonged to the category of temporary libérés, 16 had been placed in hospital as lunatics, the remainder ran away.

During this period of 20 years, the Society received the sum of 457,265 francs, 55 cents; its expenses had been 381,824 francs, 89 cents. They had thus in their possession at the end of 1853, 75,440 francs, 66 cents; an important sum, which bore testimony to the good management of the board, and at the same time of the useful assistance it rendered not only to the Government, but also to * These clerks are—a responsible agent at 1,400 francs; an agent for providing situations, 800 francs; a register and schoolmaster, 900 francs; an inspector, 900 francs; a housekeeper at 300 francs, and the porter got 360 francs.

---

† These boys go as penitents to the monastery de la Roquette.

private individuals. The receipts of the Society had been 25,947 francs, 33 cents; in 1854, the expenses had arisen to 25,342 francs, 10 cents, for 294 juvenile provisional or definitive libérés, every boy had therefore cost at an average about 89 francs. In this account had been entered all kinds of expenses, the salaries of the clerks of the asylum, and a sum of 3,371 francs, 10 cents, employed in the recent building, and repairing of the establishment in the Rue Mézières. Amongst the 294 boys patronized by the Society in 1854, 65 were very well conducted; 127 well conducted; 24 wished to leave; 13 were badly behaved; 1 ran away; 23 relinquished the patronage after being submissive for some time; 7 had been given up altogether as incorrigible; 10 had been re-imprisoned in the penitentiary of la Roquette; 20 had relapsed into crime; 4 were dead. Whilst subtracting from the total number 294, the 23 boys who had renounced the patronage, the 7 who were abandoned as incorrigible, and those who ran away, there remained 263 young persons of whom only 20 had relapsed into error, that is to say, 7.60 in 100, this proportion was 75 to 100 before the establishment of the Society.

During the same year 1854, the average number of patrons staying at the asylum were 14 daily, and those supported in the establishment were 17. The average number of boys who assisted at the re-unions every first Sunday of the month were 80. These numbers prove the utility of this institution.

There is another Society in Paris deeply interesting, which is engaged in protecting young girls from the department of the Seine; détenus libérés and destitute—founded by Madame de Lamartine, and Madame la Marquise de la Grange, who was born at Caumont-la-Force. This institution, from 1841, up to December 31st, 1853, extended its care over 178 Juvenile détenus; 102 had got situations through its influence, ten relapsed into error; and 66 had escaped from their surveillance. Annexed to this establishment is a quarter set apart for correctional education, in which Madame la Marquise de la Grange is endeavouring to introduce all the improvements calculated to elevate the mind.*

The Society for the patronage of the Juvenile libérés of the Rhone deserves especial notice, having tried to take under their guardianship subjects of a class unfortunately too numerous, young mendicants or vagrants, who though not condemned, are nevertheless a scourge to the country. The last accounts returned, published by the Society in 1847, shewed that from 1840 to 1846, they had taken under their care 22 vicious boys who had not been sentenced, or even tried, 16 whose moral state required the strictest surveillance; they had been confined at the asylum of d' Oullins; six others were placed as apprentices to trades-people; eight of these were well conducted, whilst the other eight gave frequent proofs of idleness and insubordination; three remained with the masters; one returned to his family. These twenty-two boys cost the Society 9810 francs, 20c, or 445fr. 91c. each.

From 1836, the period of its foundation, to the 31st of December,

---

* Madame Lechevalier, Inspectress-General of Prisons, has taken a very active part in the working of this Society.

1853, the Society of Juvenile libérés of the Rhone, have protected 305 of these youths, 279 are in situations, and 26 not engaged.

These two classes have furnished 68 relapses, which establishes between the discharged, and those who have fallen away, a proportion of about 22 to 100.

ADMINISTRATIVE PATRONAGE.

Let us see how this patronage is exercised, which has been instituted by a ministerial decision, February 17, 1847. From the time that the Juvenile libéré leaves the house of correction, the Director of the establishment furnishes a report to the minister of the Interior, in which he points out the moral and religious character of the boy; the order of his intellect, the trade to which he has been brought up, the place where he desires to fix his residence. The Prefects are obliged to transmit, a resume of these documents to the Mayors of the communes where the Juvenile libérés have fixed their abode, and these functionaries have in their turn to make known every six months to the heads of the government how these boys conduct themselves, their habits, and the way by which they gain their livelihood. The corporation (or common council) collect most carefully the information required from them. But a patronage whose only aim is to observe the acts of a young libéré without assisting him at the period of his liberation, is all but visionary.

On the other hand as the Mayors communicate generally with the libérés through the intervention of the Police officer or the Forest Keeper, who do not give to their office all the circumspection requisite, the position of these boys is ere long understood, and their employers are anxious to get rid of them, thinking that having them in their service, places them under the surveillance of the authorities.

Orders have been given it is true to the prefects to endeavour to remedy these serious disadvantages, and more cannot be done in the absence of a law to remedy this evil by enabling them to employ more efficacious means. Be it as it may, such are the results of administrative patronage during the year 1853. The mayors had received information relative to 861 libérés, of whom 124 were young girls. 197 boys and 68 girls escaped the patronage by changing their names and concealing their residences. They retain the management of Satisfactory—304 boys and 36 girls.

Doubtful—97 boys and 12 girls.

Bad—52 boys and 5 girls.

49 boys and 3 girls have relapsed.

They have had 38 enlistments in the Army and Navy. The relapses (deducting those who ran away,) have been 9 to 100 boys, and 5 to 100 girls.

ESTABLISHMENTS OF PATRONAGE.

When leaving the establishments of correctional education the young détenues are supplied with suitable clothes, and assistance for their journey. The directors of several of the colonies have found it necessary to watch over the lives of those boys, who being orphans, could not receive in the bosom of their families that protecting care and counsel, necessary to sustain them in a good course. Amongst the establishments inhabited by the greater number of their libérés, we will cite the colony of Mettray; the House of Correctional Education, Bordeaux, directed by M. l'Abbé Fissiaux; and that of Toulouse, the founder of which has organised in this city a Society of Patronage.

From 1841 to the 31st of December 1853, the colony of Mettray has rendered assistance to 953 libérés, who had sprung from that source; 18 had removed themselves from under their kind control; 307 had obtained situations through the influence of the establishment; 157 entered the army; 6 were kept as servants in the establishment; 4 entered religious houses; 61 entered the navy; 68 were taken as military recruits; 231 returned to their relations; 103 relapsed. After deducting the 18 that ran away, we find the relapses have been 11 to 100.

The libérés who go to Paris from Mettray, receive the protection of the Chief Agent, M. Paul Verdier, who engages in this work of devotion with a zeal and self abnegation beyond all eulogy.*

There are innumerable conventual establishments to which the State confides young female détenus, protecting in their asylums those who at the period of their liberation find themselves without homes, or means of employment. The principal are the Solitude of Nazareth, near Montpellier;† the Refuge du Dorat in la Haute Vienne; the convent of the Good Shepherd at Angers, and the communities which belong to them.

A recent inquiry has been made relative to 12,464, the number of juvenile détenus, who from 1837, to 31st Dec. 1853, left the Institution of Correctional education, either publicly or privately. Of this number we cannot point out more than 528 relapses; but as it would be impossible to discover what had become of the greater number of those boys, who concealed their track by changing their names and residences, in order, either to commence a new mode of life, or to continue in their old habits, it is more than probable that the greater number of those boys have contributed to increase the population of our penitentiaries. As for the young girls, their fate on leaving has been more dark and deplorable. Are not these facts sufficiently startling to prove the absolute necessity of an obligatory patronage, which is at once aiding and preventive, especially after pointing out the services rendered by this Institution, incomplete as it still is.

JULES DE LAMARQUE.

DOCUMENTS TO CONSULT.

Law of the 13th June, 3rd July, and 5th August, 1850, on the education and patronage of juvenile libérés.

Statistics of prisons and penitentiaries.

Criminal Statistics

---

* M. L. Alcan deserves equal notice, his position is that of obtaining situations for the libérés of Mettray.

† See the notice we have given to The Solitude of Nazareth in the Annales of the 1st. of Nov. 1853.

Treatises on the Penitentiary Systems and Societies of Patronage, by M. R. Allier.

Report on a Project of Transportation, by M. Louis Perrot.

The Condemned Libérés, by M. A. E. Cerfberr.

Francois Perrin, or the Trial and Re-establishment of a Libéré, by M. Léon Vidal.

Report of Madame de Lamartine, on Young Female Libérés.

Account given of the Society of Patronage, Paris, by M. Béren-ger de la Drôme.

Description of the Moral and Material Condition of Juvenile Détenus, by M. Bucquet.

Account given of The Solitude of Nazareth, by M. l'Abbé Coural.

Before closing this Record, we think it right to state, that the Smithfield Institution, Dublin, for Exemplary Prisoners, and which we have already described, has been frequently visited by the Lord Lieutenant, who has expressed himself much pleased with the entire plan adopted.

We understand that some of the inmates have been sent into town as messengers, and have conducted themselves in a most satisfactory manner.

We sincerely trust that the plan of instruction, by lectures, will not be changed : it must be borne in mind, that no man can be supposed to remain longer in this Institution than two or three months ; therefore ordinary school teaching cannot be attempted : besides, each man must have been at least nine months in a separate prison, and a year or two in the associated prison ; in each of these Institutions he ought to have learned the ordinary school teaching, and therefore he should have, during his few weeks of seclusion at Smithfield, a chance of learning something that may show him, easily, and popularly, the great and small wonders of the world above and around him.

At page lxxiii of this Record, we gave the history of the foundation of THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION. Since writing that portion of our paper, we have learned that the gentlemen, whose names follow, have become members, those marked with a star being Roman Catholics :—

Marquis of Northampton.

Lord Brougham.

Lord Shaftesbury.

Lord Howe.

Lord Leigh.

Lord Lyttelton.

Bishop of Gloucester.

Bishop of Manchester.

Bishop of Lichfield.

Lord Ward.

Lord Grosvenor.

Lord Robert Cecil.

Lord Ravensworth.

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

Sir John Pakington.

Sir Stafford H. Northcote.
 C. B. Adderley, Esq.
 T. B. Ll. Baker, Esq.
 Robert Hall Esq. Recorder of Doncaster.
 M. D. Hill, Esq. Recorder of Birmingham.
 Rev. Sydney Turner. (Red Hill)
 Miss Carpenter.
 W. Morgan, Esq. Birmingham.
 Lady Noel Byron.
 G. H. Bengough, Esq.

E. B. Wheatley, Esq., Cote
 Wall, Mirfield.
 * Lord Petre.
 * Lord Edward Howard.
 Captain Walter Crofton, Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland.
 * John Lentaigue, Esq., D.L.
 Director of Convict Prisons in Ireland.
 Captain Knight, Director of Convict Prisons in Ireland.

From the third number of The Law Amendment Journal,<sup>2</sup>
 Thursday, March 6th. 1856, we extract the following :—

THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

An important meeting of this Union was held at the rooms of the Law Amendment Society on Saturday last. At this meeting it was determined that the Union should have the permanent use of the rooms, and that the office of Joint Honorary Secretary should be held by Mr. G. W. Hastings, the Secretary of the Society. Any information that is desired on the subject of Reformatories, or on the plan and working of the Union, may in future be obtained at 3, Waterloo Place.

We anticipate much advantage to both of the Societies by their joint occupation of these rooms, and by their adoption to a certain extent, of a united action. Many members of the Union are members of the Society, and this double membership will no doubt rapidly increase. Moreover, the Law Amendment Society is adopting no new course in thus aiding the Reformatory Movement. Some years ago, before any Reformatory Unions came into existence, the good cause which they now advocate had been urged upon the public through the members of our Society. Mr. M. D. Hill, Mr. D. Power, and others, have frequently drawn our attention to the subject. A report on the best legislative measures for promoting the reformation of Juvenile Criminals was some time since issued by one of our Committees; and the Society was duly represented, by an authorised deputation, at the Conference held at Birmingham. It is, therefore, as approved labourers in the same field that we now join forces with the National Reformatory Union.

The promoters of the Union have already been very successful in obtaining support in all quarters; they hope for still further aid; and the catholicity of their views, their readiness to receive all

---

* This Journal is published, weekly, by the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law, at their office, 3 Waterloo Place, and is presented gratis to its Members, and sold at three pence per number to all other persons; the number for Thursday, March 13th, contained, by Authority, Lord Brougham's Speech, on Judicial Statistics, as delivered in the House of Lords.

suggestions and information, and their determination to start with no preconceived dogmas, but honestly to elucidate principles from the widest collection of facts, will no doubt recommend their objects to the public generally.

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

This Society, which has lately increased greatly in numbers, and has been re-formed upon a wider basis, held a meeting on Saturday last, the 1st of March, at the rooms of the Law Amendment Society. The objects of the meeting, as announced in the circular, were "to receive the report of the sub-committee, and to consider the further organisation of the Society."

Mr. T. B. Baker, founder and manager of the Reformatory at Hardwicke, in Gloucestershire, was called to the chair.

Among the others present were—Viscount Ebrington, M.P., Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., Lord Lovaine, M.P., Hon Mr. Liddell, M.P., Sir Stafford Northcote, M.P., Sir Thomas Winnington, M.P., Mr. Adderley, M.P., Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Baron Alderson, Prebendary Fane, Rev. Sidney Turner, Mr. F. Hill, Mr. D. Power, Mr. G. W. Hastings, Mr. Bowyer, manager of the New Road Reformatory, Rev. W. Hatch, chaplain of the Wandsworth House of Correction, Captain O'Brien, inspector of prisons, and many others.

Sir Stafford Northcote read the following report from the sub-committee:—

The sub-committee appointed at the last general meeting of the Union beg leave to report, that they have drawn up and circulated a short prospectus explanatory of the objects of the association, and that they have received the adhesion of a large number of influential persons, including most of those who have taken an interest in the Reformatory Movement. The number of those who have already signified their intention of joining the Union amounts to upwards of 150.

The sub-committee have obtained permission to use the rooms of the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law for their meetings; and they recommend that the Union avail itself of this permission, both because the rooms are in a convenient situation, and because the secretary and clerks of that Society will be able and willing to give material assistance to them.

The sub-committee consider that the time has now arrived for electing a president, committee, and other officers for the direction of the Union, and they recommend this subject to the attention of the present meeting.

As soon as the committee shall have been appointed, the sub-committee think that attention should be directed to the following points:—

The formation of Local Sub-unions.

The collection of Statistical information.

The establishment of a Patronage Society.

The appointment of a Committee of Correspondence, which should include the principal managers of schools in various parts of the country.

It was moved by the Rev. Sidney Turner, and seconded by Mr. Justice Coleridge, and carried unanimously, that the report now read be received and adopted.

Sir S. Northcote then moved, "that a deputation be appointed to wait upon H. R. H. Prince Albert, to request His Royal Highness to accept the Office either of Patron or President of the Union as he may think best."

The Hon. Mr. Liddell, M.P., seconded the motion, which, after a short conversation, was agreed to.

Some discussion then ensued as to the persons who should be named on the deputation, and a list of noblemen and members of Parliament was proposed, on which several modifications were suggested.

Mr. Justice Coleridge advised that the deputation should be composed of those individuals who had hitherto worked in the formation of the Union, and who were practically acquainted with its nature and objects.

This proposal was received with approbation; and it was finally arranged that the present sub-committee, with the addition of Mr. Sidney Turner, should form the deputation, and that they should have power to add to their number any nobleman or gentleman whom they might wish to accompany them.

The subject of the appointment of the Vice-Presidents was then discussed, and after some conversation it was agreed that the following noblemen and gentlemen should be appointed, and that the general committee of the Union should have power to elect additional Vice-Presidents.—Lord Brougham, the Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. Baron Alderson, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Speaker of the House of Commons, Lord John Russell, Lord Petre, the Marquis of Lansdowne.

Sir S. Northcote then said that, as to the appointment of Honorary Secretary, it was desirable that there should be one for London, and one for the provinces. Mr. G. H. Bengough had hitherto acted as honorary secretary, and he had consented to do so still as far as the country was concerned; Mr. G. W. Hastings would undertake the task in London—an arrangement which would be advantageous to the Union, as Mr. Hastings resided on the spot, and would be always ready to give information.

Mr. Bengough and Mr. Hastings were then formally appointed joint Honorary Secretaries.

Mr. Dudley Marjoribanks was elected Treasurer.

It was then agreed that the Union should enter into an arrangement with the Law Amendment Society for the use of their rooms when required. The terms on which the arrangement should be made were left to the sub-committee of the Union on the one hand and to Mr. Hastings on the other.

A long discussion then ensued as to the appointment of the general committee, and at length it was moved by Lord Ebrington, M.P., seconded by Mr. F. Hill, and carried—"That the general committee consist of 25 members; and that the sub-committee add such names to their own as may, together, make up the 25."

It was also resolved.—“That the principal managers of the town and country Reformatories (being members of the Union) be corresponding members.

“That the sub-committee be requested to communicate with the committees of all certified Reformatories, asking each committee to nominate a corresponding member.

“That corresponding members be ex officio members of the general committee, in addition to the 25 elected members.

“That the committee be authorized to invite foreigners who take an interest in the Reformatory cause to become corresponding members.”

Mr. Adderley, M.P., moved the appointment of a sub-committee to consider the bills on Reformatories now before Parliament, the one relating to Scotland, the other to England. This was agreed to.

A vote of thanks was given to the Chairman, and the meeting then adjourned till Saturday, the 15th of March.

We append the names of the General Committee of the Union:—

Adderley, C. B., Esq., M.P.
Baker, T. B., Esq.
Bowyer, G. J., Esq.
Carleton, Hon. R.
Cecil, Lord R. M.P.
• De Vere, S. E., Esq., M.P.
Dunlop, A. M., Esq., M.P.
Ebrington, Viscount, M.P.
Forsyth, W., Esq.
Gladstone, W., Esq.
Hill, Frederic, Esq.
Kerrison, Sir E. Bart., M.P.
Leigh, Lord.
Liddell, Hon. H. G., M.P.

Lovaine, Lord, M.P.
• Manning, Rev. H. E.
Miles, W., Esq. M.P.
Milnes, R. M., Esq., M.P.
Northcote, Sir Stafford B., Bart., M.P.
Pakington, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Bart., M.P.
Power, David, Esq.
Stuart, Capt. W., M.P.
Turner, Rev. Sydney.
Ward, Lord.
Winnington, Sir. T. E. Bart., M.P.

As we were putting this Record to press, we received a number of The Leeds Mercury, of Tuesday, March 11th, 1856, containing the following most valuable Lecture, by the Recorder of Doncaster, on the Treatment of Adult Criminals. We need scarcely recommend this Lecture to the attention of our readers; Mr. Hall's name must be quite sufficient to secure most earnest study from all who have read his two Lectures reprinted in former numbers of this REVIEW:—

On Friday evening, March 7th, Robert Hall, Esq., barister-at-law, read a paper at the Mechanics' Institution, Leeds, on “The Mode of Treating Discharged Criminals, and on the Ticket-of-leave system.” The audience was numerous, and included several of the leading gentlemen of the borough, as well as some from a distance. The chair was occupied by the Rev. G. W. Conder, President of the Institution.

Mr. Hall, at the commencement of his long and able paper, alluded to the state of the earliest prisons in Christian times; and also during the last century—quoting from Houson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, and Foster's Reports on Crown Cases, from which it appeared that the prisons of both those periods were in a most filthy and offensive condition. It must not, continued Mr. Hall, be supposed, however, that Christianity had no witness to bear testimony against this crying and persistent violation of Christian principle, for there were on record two very notable instances of such momentary and ineffectual intrusions into the gaol regions, before Howard commenced his labours, the first by a committee of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, about 1701-2, the second by a Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry, which sat and reported in 1728-9. But it was not until the great sheriff of Bedford began, in 1773, that course of exertions in the cause of the sick and captive which terminated only with his life, that any permanent improvement was made. After alluding to Howard's visit to the prison at Knaresborough in 1776, which was in a horrid state, and passing a high eulogium on the labours of Howard, Mr. Hall referred to the supposed deterrent effects of the suffering which criminals then underwent, and observed that though the hearts of the ordinary tenants of our prisons were neither innocent nor quiet, many of them were philosophical enough to make the best of the "austere comforts" of the House of Correction, and even to regard the prison roof as a not altogether ineligible shelter from winter and rough weather. These, he was sorry to say, were the results of modern experience. The men of eighty years ago, whom they were in the habit of looking down upon with such sovereign contempt, were aware a priori that some compensation must be sought for the less deterrent character which they were impressing upon prison treatment; and in the year 1779 the Legislature passed a remarkable Act of Parliament, which was the real foundation of all their systems of prison discipline. The loss of the American colonies deprived the Government of the long accustomed channel for the disposal of convicts, at the very same time that the public conscience was beginning to take alarm at the sanguinary character of our criminal code, thus increasing the numbers of the offenders who had to be dealt with in a manner consistent at once with the public safety, and those sentiments of humanity which were beginning to make progress. Criminals must not be put to death; they could not be sent abroad; what was to be done with them? It was thought that they might perhaps be corrected and reclaimed by imprisonment at home, and the framing of a system was confided to Mr. Howard, Sir Wm. Blackstone, and Sir Wm. Eden. In reading one of the preambles of the Act, they might suppose themselves to have before their eyes the last expressions of the deliberate judgment of the De Metz, Davenport Hills, Duquetiaux, and Sydney Turners of their own generation. The title of the act was, "An Act to explain and amend the laws relating to the transportation, imprisonment, and other punishment of certain offenders." The preamble to which he alluded was prefixed to the fifth section, and was as follows:—

"And whereas if many offenders convicted of crimes for which transportation had been usually inflicted, were ordered to solitary imprisonment, accompanied by well regulated labour and religious instruction, it might be the means, under Providence, not only of deterring others from the commission of like crimes, but also of reforming the individuals and inuring them to habits of industry."

And the act contained a most minute series of provisions for the building of penitentiaries, the employment of convicts on public works, or other employment consistent with their sex, age, health, and ability to labour; the utmost possible application of what was called the separate system; suitable clothing and dietary; and a staff of governor, chaplain, and superintendents, under the supervision of committees and inspectors. Nor did the framers of this act overlook the necessity which constituted one of their great present difficulties—the necessity for making some provision for the prisoner on his discharge. He was to be provided with decent clothing, and a sum of money for his immediate subsistence, so as such sum should not exceed £3, nor be less than 20s., in case he had been confined in the penitentiary for a year, and so in proportion for any shorter term. Then came a proviso, the speedy restoration of some equivalent for which the statute book was much to be desired—"And any such offender so dismissed at the end or other determination of his said term, who shall procure any reputable master of a ship, or tradesman, or other substantial housekeeper, to take him into service, or provide him with proper employment for one year then next ensuing, the same to be approved by such superintendent or superintendents, and who shall serve accordingly, shall be entitled at the end of the year to another sum of money equal to that which was allowed him at the time of his dismission." It was impossible to overrate the importance of the principle thus enunciated. If efficiently carried out, it would have constituted a complete system of what was called "patronage," by the prison authorities for the period of a year, and, with the support of private benevolence, might have enabled them to have pointed with pride to the Reformatory institutions of their country, as showing that England was amongst the first, instead of being, in fact, amongst the last, of the nations of Europe, to open a way for the repentant criminal to return to the paths of honesty and virtue. The scheme was wrecked because successive commissioners could not agree about a site. Meanwhile private piety and benevolence were at their post—the Philanthropic Society, that earliest of Juvenile Reformatories, was established in 1785, and there was no lack of writers to enlighten the public conscience by their discussions on the subject of the punishment of crime. The principles of the penitentiary act had, as early as 1781, been extended to Houses of Correction; and in 1790 the county of Gloucester completed a penitentiary on the same system. If Mr. McCulloch was well founded in his statement that, under the operation of this system in the Houses of Correction at Petworth and Horsham, and the penitentiary at Gloucester, re-committals had nearly disappeared, it was high time that they instituted an inquiry into the reasons why the results obtained by modern science were so much less satisfactory than those which crowned the labours of Howard, Blackstone, and Eden, when the science of penalty was still in its infancy. The act was repealed in 1827, having been virtually superseded by the Prison Act of 1823. The allowance to discharged prisoners was reduced—the maximum from £3 to £1, and the minimum from twenty shillings to five shillings, and the premiums on a year's good behaviour in service were altogether omitted. Meanwhile the enterprise of British navigators had discovered fresh fields for transportation, and whilst the principle of probation was abandoned, if it had ever been practised in their prisons, it was gradually introduced in their penal colonies. First, power was given to the governor to remit or shorten the term of transportation; then he was empowered to suspend or remit them conditionally, or, in other words, to grant them tickets-of-leave, under which the convicts enjoyed liberty, conditional on their good behaviour, obtained employment where they could, and lived on their earnings, and had the power of acquiring and holding property; then a restriction was introduced, prohibiting the grant of those tickets-of-leave until the convict should have served a certain number of years, having some proportion to the term of his sentence, four years on a sentence of seven, six years on a sentence of fourteen, eight years on a sentence for life; finally, the principle was developed into the very remarkable system of which he gave some account in his lecture on Tuesday, under which these periods of service were for the most part passed in the penitentiary and penal works, good conduct during the service being rewarded by a further shortening of the service, and by the grant of conditional liberty almost immediately on arrival in the colony, with a small accumulation of his prison allowances for the purposes of immediate subsistence.

Had there been time for fully working out this system, they would have been able to try the effects of allowing a period of probation under favourable circumstances. Unfortunately the colonists refused to let them work out the experiment. The Government was compelled to give way, and they must now provide for criminals at home. There was no use in blinking the question: when death and banishment were both inadmissible, provision at home was the only alternative. Let them be candid, and not join the cry against the system actually introduced until they established the possibility of adopting some other. Some persons thought at the time and still thought, that the system of penal colonies was abandoned too lightly, as there were tracts enough where new ones might have been planted—at all events for the 6,000 convicts who were actually under sentence of transportation; but the legislature perceived that besides the difficulties which might have been occasioned by the sort of Monro principle which some of their existing colonies were disposed to apply to the whole of the particular continent on which they happened to be located, such an expedient would have been only an adjournment of the question, as in a few years the new colonies would have had their non-convict population expressing the same determination not to let their countries continue to be the common sewer of the mother country. The Government then had to consider what they should substitute, and as they had still one colony that would receive their convicts, all that was absolutely required was an enactment authorising the Government to substitute conditional liberation at home for conditional liberation in the penal colony. Instead of that, however (and probably for political rather than social reasons), they invented a new name for punishment by imprisonment; they abolished transportation entirely as regarded by far the greater number of the cases to which it was applicable; they substituted for what they were pleased to call penal servitude for terms of four, six, and eight years, which were made to correspond with the usual terms of transportation, and the principle of conditional liberty before the expiration of the sentence was expressly extended to persons under sentence of penal servitude, as well as to persons under sentence of transportation, the only difference being that whilst the liberated transport was kept on his good behaviour for several years, the shortening of the term restricted this temporary control over the convict sentenced to penal servitude to a few months, or at the most a year. Why was this? He feared that the terms were shortened for the very purpose of relieving the prison authorities from the burthen of looking after the discharged convicts from the moment of their discharge. Startling as the fact might be, it was a fact, that, in the very teeth of the act of Parliament, the prison authorities refused, save in exceptional cases, to apply the provisions for conditional liberations to convicts under sentence of penal servitude: these were to be kept to the end of their sentences, under the full artificial restraint of penal discipline; and were those, without further probation or sense of continued responsibility, to be turned adrift without a hand to help them, with felony indelibly imprinted on their characters, and with their little accumulation of allowances, which used to be paid them on arrival in the colony, given them in one gross sum at the moment of their discharge? Did it never occur to official sagacity that it might be well to reserve part of that sum, or to hold out some additional sum, as the reward of a year's good conduct after discharge? He believed that official sagacity would have scouted the idea, and he believed that official sagacity had stood smiling on one side, whilst the Legislature was cheating itself with the notion that it was applying the principle of temporary probation to the class of offenders for whom the ordinary punishment by imprisonment was not severe enough, and to whom the present punishment by transportation could not be applied.

The result was, that though there had been a great hubbub about the ticket-of-leave system, that system, in the sense in which it was understood by sound reasoners on the subject of penal institutions, had never been applied. There were no tickets-of-leave; but, instead thereof, they had had orders of license. The name had no existence, neither had the thing, at least not for the purpose for which they had fondly imagined that it was invented. He did not mean to say that the authorities had, in no cases, kept their eye upon the subsequent conduct of convicts discharged subject to revocation on misbehaviour, but he was not himself aware of a single case; and he heard so many complaints of ticket-of-leave men being at large without any ostensible means of living honestly, and taking so large a share in the more serious crime that was committed in the respective localities, and he found so strong an impression on the minds of practical men that the order of licence was, in fact, revoked only on subsequent conviction, that he was quite satisfied that, taking it as a whole, they had not that system of intermediate probation which the legislature contemplated, whatever the compilers of the act might have done. He was satisfied that, taking the actual working of the system as a whole, the condition which was set forth on the ticket of leave itself was an idle threat. That condition was as follows:—

“The power of revoking or altering the licence of a convict will most certainly be exercised in case of misconduct. If, therefore, he wishes to retain the privilege which by his good behaviour, under penal discipline, he has obtained, he must prove by his subsequent conduct that he is really worthy of her Majesty's clemency. To produce a forfeiture of the licence it is by no means necessary that the holder should be convicted of any new offence. If he associates with notoriously bad characters, leads an idle and dissolute life, or has no visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood, &c., it will be assumed that he is about to relapse into crime, and he will be at once apprehended and committed to prison under his original sentence.” This was a correct exposition of the idea on which the system was supposed to rest, and the manifest grievance was, that the idea was either not acted on at all, or not fully carried out. He was not prepared to say that if it were fully carried out it would be successful. On the contrary, though he was satisfied the idea was the right idea, he was also satisfied that to give it any chance of being carried out successfully a great deal more remained to be done by the legislature—a great deal more required to be done by the administrative authorities—a great deal remained to be done by private benevolence. Though in granting, under the act passed in the time of Howard, £3 to a convict on discharge, and £3 as a premium for good behaviour in reputable service for a year, the legislature put forth a germ which might have been developed into the most complete system of what was called patronage, yet the form of the proposed encouragement was not a happy one. It was not unreasonable to give the convict a sum of money on his discharge, but the sum was too large to entrust him with without some assurance that he would use it properly, and the subsequent premium was open to the palpable objection of giving him an unfair advantage over the honest labourer. The difficulty, such as it was, might be easily overcome by a slight alteration in their prison arrangements. In some of the model prisons of the United States the convict was credited with the full value of his labour, and debited with the expense of his imprisonment, and when industrious and well-behaved, he was often entitled to a substantial balance on his discharge.

In the prisons of the French Government the prisoners had an interest in their earnings, and were allowed to purchase a few luxuries,—it was made available also for fines on misbehaviour, and the balance was paid the convict on his discharge. Something of the same kind existed in the prisons at Ghent and Munich. In England, the convict had no interest in the value of his labour, but in some cases a small good conduct allowance was made, which was said to him on his liberation. The system of allowance did not appear to have been much carried out. Now he would give the convict a direct interest in the shape of a proportionate share of the value of his labour; abolishing all allowances for good conduct, except perhaps that of a slight increase of the prisoner's provisions.

He would allow the prisoner to spend a small portion of his earnings in the purchase of slightly superior dietary. The fund, of course, should be available for fines on misconduct, and the balance should be paid by degrees in procuring the prisoner, on discharge, employment or the means of emigration, the ultimate balance being kept back for a while, and paid over only as the reward of continued good behaviour. This would remove the objection of rewarding offenders out of the public purse. He had already intimated his strong opinion that the great majority of convicts were not qualified to pass all at once from the artificial and highly protective system of the prison into the free license of ordinary life. He should object to the crowding of discharged convicts together in a refuge, which was merely a continuation of a well-regulated prison, but to provide places at which the discharged convict might find work and continued instruction at a reduced rate of wages, whilst waiting for regular employment or emigration, was, he was satisfied, one of the most important purposes to which private benevolence could address itself.

The men might work together under the surveillance of an overlooker, but they must not be barracked together in their houses of rest or recreations; it was something more like ordinary life that was required—reputable lodgings within the visitor's round would supply the mode of life which the case demanded. This would only be an intermediate state; and a new country offered so many advantages for the successful commencement of a new life that they all turned to it as a matter of course, as the best and most natural expedient, the best because the most natural. They must not look to it as a solution of the difficulty, as many convicts would not go, and if it were carried to any extent new colonies might refuse to receive them. It was quite clear the Government must have nothing to do with it, and even private associations must act with great delicacy. After all that could be done in the way of emigration, it was employment in this country that would ever be the necessity to be provided for in the majority of cases. How was that to be accomplished?

Alluding to the Worcestershire Prisoners' Relief Society,—the object of which was to bring discharged prisoners under the notice of the clergyman of their parish, who was supplied with from 3s. to 5s. a week until he got the convict employment—he said they might assume that all cases taken in hand by the society were cases in which they had perfect confidence; but to be thoroughly efficacious—to produce any sensible impression on the mass that was well nigh overpowering them, such a society must extend its aid to cases in which there was indeed hopefulness, but not perfect confidence. This might be effected by means of the system of guarantees. The discharged prisoner might be aided until he got employment in the ordinary way, and then a guarantee might be given for him to his employer. Such societies might be entrusted with the small balance due to the convicts under the system he had suggested. Let the severe majesty of the law stand behind these societies, and recall to the prison, which was their only proper domicile, those who, notwithstanding all their opportunities, associated with notoriously bad characters, led idle and dissolute lives, and having no visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood, refused to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. What, it might be asked, were men of this description to be virtually imprisoned for life! Yes, unless it should please God to change their hearts, so that they could be restored to society without danger to their neighbours or to themselves. In conclusion, he called upon the working classes not to refuse to work with a convict to whom employment had been given; he again alluded to the labours of Thos. Wright of Manchester, and then reverted to the ticket-of-leave system as now administered. In his own name, as an individual, and in the name of the advocates in general of improved convict discipline, he entirely repudiated the ticket-of-leave system. It was no system of theirs—it was a direct violation of every principle by which the conduct of the administrative authorities to those unfortunate persons ought to be governed.

Colonel Jebb admitted that the total number to whom this system was applicable was 6,000, of whom he did not flatter himself that more than 75 or 80 per cent. would abstain from crime.

Only fancy a system which calculated on letting loose 1,500 persons convicted of such grave offences as to have been sentenced to transportation, and who would certainly relapse into crime. The only precaution which was taken was, that the balance of their allowance was kept back for three months, and could not be obtained unless the applications were backed by some reliable person. But for those 6,000, at least, some place of transportation ought, at any cost, to have been found or founded; the punishment of transportation ought to have been discontinued gradually and not suddenly; the hanging about large towns ought to have been specially prohibited; places of honest employment in remote districts ought to have been specially provided; and the penalties declared in the license ought to have been rigidly enforced. He pointed out and urged the duty which every man had to perform in the labour of reformation, and concluded, amidst loud plaudits, a paper which had been excellently received by the entire auditory.

The President spoke in terms of warm commendation of the paper which had been read, and said he hoped, as they had present amongst them many gentlemen well acquainted with the subject treated of that a valuable discussion would ensue. In order, however, that everything might be done in order, he called upon

The Mayor (T. W. George, Esq.) to move a vote of thanks to the lecturer. (Applause.) His Worship eulogised the paper as being most admirable, and briefly proposed, with great pleasure, the vote.

W. St. James Wheelhouse, Esq., seconded the vote, but declined to discuss the questions treated of in the paper, as he preferred the strangers present giving their opinions upon these very important topics. (Hear, hear.)

J. H. Shaw, Esq., at the call of the President, opened the discussion. He said he was not disposed to dissent from the substance of any portion of the paper, though he might dissent from some of the details. For example, he hesitated about going the length of Mr. Hall as to the necessity of discontinuing the system of transportation; indeed, he had the strongest opinion that removal to another country, either as transport or an emigrant, under a system calculated to reform the criminal, was the best possible course for the offender himself, for the country, and for the whole population. The ticket-of-leave system was the worst that had ever been introduced. (Hear, hear.) And though he was not going to say anything against the appeal made by Mr. Hall, he must remark that he looked with respect upon that feeling of the working classes which led them to object to mixing with convicted criminals; and he looked upon that feeling as a great safeguard to the virtue and morality of the working population. (Hear, hear.) Among criminals who were really penitent there was almost always a desire to emigrate, and it would be well if that desire could, under proper regulations, be gratified. (Hear, hear.)

D. Lupton, Esq., did not altogether agree with Mr. Shaw in regard to returning to the transportation of criminals; at least, he was of opinion that they had no evidence of its working beyond the fact that we got rid of our convicts, and that some of them succeeded very well in the colonies. The colonies, too, had only done what all Englishmen would have done, in refusing to take the offscourings of our population; and said very properly that if this country would not train its population properly when young, it must pay the piper, and keep its adult criminals at home, somehow or other. There were grave objections to the ticket-of-leave system—among others, that the worst criminals were the best prisoners. Their cunning taught them that good behaviour in prison was the only means of procuring their liberation at an early period. There was in Wakefield gaol at the present period a man who had been forty times convicted, and was well known to all the gaol authorities in the kingdom. He was a most incorrigible thief, but a most exemplary prisoner; and his admirable conduct in gaol was always procuring his liberation. (Hear, hear.) The system adopted was entirely fallacious. The only test now was that of good conduct in gaol; but the Government authorities ought not to take that as a test at all; but to obtain, in every case, from the chaplains and governors of the several prisons in which the convict had been confined, a report of his real character. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Paige or the Rev. Mr. De Renzi would know a convict's real character, which all his cunning and art would not conceal from them, however many marks of good conduct he might obtain. (Hear, hear.) He objected, also, to the system of sentencing prisoners to a period of penal servitude with the intention of not carrying out that sentence to the full extent. When a sentence was once pronounced, it ought to be rigidly adhered to and carried out, unless under some extraordinary and very special circumstances. Of course there might be some exceptional cases, in which it would be right to allow a man to apply to his friends to become security for his good behaviour during the remainder of the term that he would have been in gaol; and it was well to remember that it was the rarest thing in the world to have such sureties broken. There was a kind of honour among thieves, that they did not like to bring men into trouble who had been bound for them. The system of guarantees, therefore, might in exceptional cases, act most beneficially. (Hear, hear.) He mentioned a fact which might interest some. Out of 91 Government convicts in the Leeds Borough Gaol in 1854 and 1855, he found that only 26 were married men; and he had no doubt that when a man had a wife and children they were a kind of pledge of good conduct towards society. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Lloyd Jones said, the conduct of the colonies in regard to our transported felons was precisely the conduct of the people of this country in regard to the ticket-of-leave convicts—they refused to receive them. (Hear, hear.) Something had been said about the working classes refusing to associate in their workshops with discharged convicts. There was a strong and a praiseworthy reason for this. Working men not unfrequently had employed beside them, their own children; and though they might have no insuperable objection to working side by side with a liberated criminal, from a philanthropic desire to give him a chance of retrieving himself, yet they could not, and very properly would not, consent to have their children subjected to the contamination and evil influences inseparable from having felons associated with them in their workshops. (Hear, hear.) He had great hopes of reformation when they caught their criminals young; but he confessed that he had no great faith in the reformation of old and confirmed criminals. (Hear, hear.)

The Rev. G. B. De Renzi said that holding, as he did, the position of chaplain of the borough gaol, they perhaps felt themselves entitled to hear something from him; and he certainly felt as strongly as any now could do upon this question. Neither, he believed, had any person had better opportunities of seeing the difficulties which beset a criminal on his discharge from prison. It was utterly impossible to exaggerate these difficulties. A prisoner had been convicted of felony, undergone a term of imprisonment, and came out of gaol homeless, friendless, and with character lost. He was actuated by an earnest desire to pursue an honest life in future; but on seeking employment, the first question asked him was—“Where did you work last?” He admitted that he had just been released from prison; and instantly the employer’s back was turned upon him. The prison discipline induced a desire to live better, if he had a chance; but he soon found that every man’s hand was against him; and was it to be wondered at that he turned his back against every man? (Hear, hear.) That was a pressing difficulty, and how was it to be overcome?

Another difficulty was this:—Mr. Hall proposed that each prisoner should be allowed a per centage upon the profits of his labour while he was in prison; but it was almost impossible to find profitable labour for prisoners. If a debtor and creditor account were kept, the prisoner, as a rule, would not only not be able to purchase little comforts, but would find the balance actually against him. (Hear, hear.) Again, some descriptions of labour were more profitable than another. The man who worked at shoe-making or tailoring, would earn much more than he who picked oakum or wool; yet the latter might be more industrious and deserving than the former. Unless they established some uniform rule, therefore, they would be acting unfairly. He had, in a published document, recorded his deliberate opinion of the impolicy of the ticket-of-leave system. Correct in theory, it was impossible to carry it out in practice. Were they, for example, to have the ticket-of-leave convict constantly watched by a policeman? If they adopted this surveillance, then there was an end to any chance of the man's obtaining and retaining honest employment. (Hear, hear.) He bore testimony to the desire of Government to carry out the conditions; and mentioned an instance which came to his knowledge of a ticket-of-leave man resorting to the expedient of teaching a female to plunder, and living upon the proceeds of her robberies. He reported this case to the Government, and the man's license was at once revoked. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the good conduct marks required to be supplied to well-conducted convicts by the Chaplains, he thought it right to say, that while he had always given the marks truthfully, yet he had always appended to them such observations as he thought were required to convey the truth to the Government. Sometimes, after giving all credit for good conduct while in prison, he appended such remarks as this:—"I have no faith whatever in this man; I believe him to be a thorough thief, and if released from prison would steal again." (Hear, hear.) With regard to what had fallen from Mr. Shaw, he believed that emigration was almost the only way likely to be attended with success, to deal with discharged criminals. (Hear, hear.) His experience had been, that the men in whom he had the greatest hope had almost always the greatest desire to emigrate; whilst those who had no real desire to reform had a repugnance to emigrate. (Hear, hear.) He agreed with Mr. Hall that convicts should not be suffered to go at large unless they found sureties for their good behaviour; and he thought it would come to that by and by. He also concurred with Mr. Jones as to the desirability of catching the criminal young, and dealing with him in the early period of his career. But there was something required beyond Reformatories—the providing of employment for youths who left those institutions. (Hear, hear.)

E. B. WHEATLEY, Esq. (Mirfield), said the subject brought before them that evening was not his special subject, which was to dip a little net into the sea of crime to take out the small fry. (Hear, hear.) Within the last twenty-four hours, it had been his painful duty to pass sentence upon some of the characters treated of in the paper. One of them had committed a crime apparently with no other object than that of being apprehended; and his observation to the constable was—"I am stalled of being as I am." He feared that that man was a type of a large class in this country. Much had been said about tickets-of-leave and transportation. In regard to the latter punishment, if they sent their convicts to a desert island, like Norfolk Island, they established a hell upon earth, and created a population too infirm ever to be trusted alone: while by sending their convicts to a colony already populated, they were inflicting an injury they were not justified in inflicting upon any community. Otherwise he was of opinion that the best thing they could do to enable a man to re-establish himself was to send him to a new sphere, to a country where he and his antecedents were unknown. (Hear, hear). With respect to the ticket-of-leave system, he believed it no longer existed. He had been informed that instructions had been given not to recommend any other convicts for tickets-of-leave except females. (Hear, hear). His opinion was, that Government was most sincere in its desire to do all that it could do; but unfortunately its hands were tied with "red tape," and it must proceed according to certain prescribed rules. (Hear, hear). Now, they must in these cases have the action of man upon man, and it was impossible to make men good by a system. They would do no real good with their criminals until individuals had established a system of "patronage," as in France, and honest men would take an interest in penitent criminals. (Hear, hear). That system of "patronage," however, must not be carried forward by Government. It must be worked by the action of private and philanthropic men. The French Government had, in 1847, taken up the patronage system, and worked it for a time; the result was so disastrous that in three years they abandoned it. The fact was, they employed the police to look after the liberated youths from the Reformatories, and when the employers became aware in this way that the boys had been convicted they discharged them. (Hear, hear). In this way, as the reports showed, more boys from Mettray were lost to society during the two or three years the system was in the hands of Government than from all other causes put together. (Hear, hear). If a system could be framed by which persons might come forward and send out criminals for some probationary period, the colonies would receive them; and employers in England would, as a rule, receive reformed criminals under a system of patronage and guarantee. As he had already said, in France Government patronage has been an utter failure, while individual patronage was most successful; and so, they might reasonably anticipate, would it be in England. (Hear, hear).

The vote of thanks having been carried by acclamation, Mr. HALL briefly replied, and the company separated at a quarter-past ten o'clock.

WORKS ON REFORMATORY TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS.

- ondary Punishments, by Richard Whateley, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin. London: Fellowes, Ludgate Street, 1832.
- marks on Transportation, by Richard Whateley, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin. London: Fellowes, Ludgate Street, 1834.
- me in England, by Thomas Plint. Gilpin (now Cash), 5, Bishopsgate Street, 1851.
- me in England. Eclectic Review, Dec., 1848: Ward & Co., Paternoster Row. Price 2s. 6d.
- the Principles of Criminal Law. London: William Pickering, 1846.
- fe of Sarah Martin. Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row.
- ocial Evils; their Causes and their Cure, by Alexander Thomson, of Banchory. Nisbet & Co., Berners Street, 1852.
- eport of a Conference on Preventive and Reformatory Schools, held at Birmingham, Dec., 1851. Longmans, 1851. Price 1s.
- eport of a Second Conference on Juvenile Delinquency, and Preventive and Reformatory Schools, held at Birmingham, Dec., 1853. Longmans, 1854. Price 1s.
- Reformatory Schools in France and England, by P. J. Murray, Cash, Bishopsgate Street. Price 1s.
- Prize Essays on Juvenile Delinquency. Smith, Elder & Co., 1853. Price 5s.
- Juvenile Depravity: Prize Essay, by the Rev. Henry Worsley. Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate Street Without, 1849.
- Inquiry into the Causes and Extent of Juvenile Depravity, by Thomas Beggs. Gilpin, 1849.
- Reformatory Schools; and Juvenile Delinquents, by Mary Carpenter. Cash. Price 6s. each.
- Reports of the Surveyor-General of Convict Prisons, by Colonel Jebb.
- Crime, by Frederick Hill. Murray, 1853.
- Prison Discipline, by Rev. John Field. Longmans, 1847.
- Results of Separate Confinement, by Rev. C Burt.
- First Report of the House of Lords on Criminal Law. Parl. Blue Book, 1847. Price 6s. 6d.
- Second Report Ditto Ditto. Price 2s. 6d.
- First, Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth Reports of the House of Lords, on Gaols and Houses of Correction, 1835.
- Report of Select Committee of House of Commons on Prison Discipline, 1850. Price 9s.

- Place of Repentance, by Samuel Martin. Nisbet & Co., Berners Street, 1853. Price 1s.
- Reports of the Preston House of Correction, by Rev. John Clay. Clarke, 37, Fishergate, Preston.
- Reports of the Chaplain of Durham County Gaol. Durham: Auz Humble, Sadler Street.
- Reports of the Durham Refuge for Discharged Prisoners. Durham: George Walker, Sadler Street.
- Charge to the Grand Jury of the Borough of Birmingham, on the Reformatories of Stretton-on-Dunsmore and Mettray, by M. D. Hill, Recorder, Michaelmas, 1848. Charles Knight, 90, Fleet Street.
- Two Charges to the Grand Jury of the Borough of Birmingham on the Prevention of Crime, Oct., 1850-51. By M. D. Hill, Recorder. Evans and Abbott, 29, Clare Street, Bristol. Price 2d.
- Charge to the Grand Jury on the Conduct of the Birmingham Gaol, Oct., 1853. London: Longman & Co. Price 4d.
- Charge to the Grand Jury on the Connection between Disease and Crime, March, 1854. London: Longman & Co.
- Charge to the Grand Jury on the Abuse of Intoxicating Liquors, &c., Jan. 1855. Cash. Price 6d.
- The Management of our Criminal Population. Edinburgh Review, Oct., 1854.
- Correction of Juvenile Offenders. Edinburgh Review, April, 1855.
- Report on Criminal and Destitute Juveniles. Parl. Blue Book, 1852. Price 6s.
- Report on Criminal and Destitute Children. Parl. Blue Book, 1853. Price 5s. 6d.
- Treatment of Criminal Children; Report of the Society for the Amendment of the Law, 1854. London: 3, Waterloo Place, Pall Mall.
- Irish Quarterly Review, from June, 1853, to March 1856. London: Simpkin and Marshall. Price 2s. 6d.
- Report on Agricultural Colonies, by M. Demetz, translated for the Irish Quarterly Review. London: Simpkin and Marshall.
- Colonie Agricole, &c., de Mettray. Rapports Annuels. Paris: Rue des Moulins, 11.
- The Family System, as pursued at Mettray. A Letter from M. Demetz to the Editor of the Journal des Économistes; translated for the Midland Counties Herald, Feb. 7th, 1856. Herald Office, Union Street, Birmingham. Price 3d.
- Notice of Mettray, by M. Cochin, translated by Rev. G. Hans Hamilton. London: Whittaker & Co. Price 1s.

Mettray ; a Lecture, by Robert Hall, M.A. Cash, Bishopsgate Street, 1854. Price 1s.

Visit to Continental Reformatories ; a Lecture by Robert Hall, M.A., reprinted from Irish Quarterly Review, June, 1855. London : Simpkin and Marshall.

Report of a Visit to Mettray, by Thomas Paynter and Rev. Sydney Turner. London : 1845.

A Visit to Mettray. Chambers' Journal. Nov., 1855.

Mettray, the Exemplar of Reformatory Schools ; a Letter to C. B. Adderley, Esq., M.P., by M. D. Hill, Feb., 1855. Cash. Price 3d.

Practical Suggestions to the Founders of Reformatory Schools, by the Recorder of Birmingham. Cash, 1855. Price 6d.

A Visit to Mettray ; a Lecture by E. B. Wheatley, M.A., 1855. Brooke, Dewsbury.

Essays, Speeches, &c., on Reformatory Schools ; edited by Jelinger Symons. 1855. London.

Reformatory Schools. Quarterly Review, Dec., 1855.

Mettray ; a Letter from Lord Leigh. Hatchard, 1856.

Mettray ; from 1839 to 1856. Cash. Price 6d.

Reformatory Schools for Ireland ; P. J. Murray. 1856. Dublin : Kelly, 8, Grafton Street. Price 6d.

Management and Cost of Prisons. Law Review, Nov., 1850. Price 5s.

Crime and Criminal Offenders, by Sam. Richardson. London : Jarrold and Sons, 47, St. Paul's Churchyard, 1855. Price 1s.

Transportation not Necessary, by C. B. Adderley, M.P. London : John W. Parker, West Strand, 1851.

Punishment is not Education, by C. B. Adderley, M.P. Parker and Son. Price 6d.

Norfolk Island, by Captain Maconochie. Hatchard, 1847. Price 1s.

Reformatory Discipline in County and Borough Prisons, by Capt. Maconochie. Gilpin, 1851. Price 1s.

Account of the Prison at Valentia, by Capt. Maconochie. Gilpin, 1851. Price 1s.

The Moral System of Prison Discipline, by Captain Maconochie. Harrison, 1854. Price 1s.

Prison Discipline, by Captain Maconochie. Harrison, 1856. Price 1s.

Die Verhandlungen über Gefängnisreform oder Die Einzelhaft mit ihren Folgen ; von G. M. Obermaier. Munich, 1848. London : Williams and Norgate.

Prison Discipline, by G. M. Obermaier, Governor of the Munich State Prison ; translated by M. Rehbann, with a Prefatory Notice

- by Alexander Baillie Cochrane. London: Ridgway, 169, Piccadilly, 1853.
- A Visit to the Great Prison at Munich, by the Rev. C. H. Townsend, the Zoist, Jan., 1856. Hall, Virtue and Co., 25, Paternoster Row. Price 2s. 6d.
- Our Present Gaol System Deeply Depraving; by Joseph Adshead. 35, George Street, Manchester, 1847.
- The Employment and Management of Convict Prisoners. A. Allardice. 1854. London: Orr & Co., Amen Corner. Price 1s.
- Principles of Criminal Legislation; by George Combe. 1854. London: Simpkin and Marshall. Price 2s.
- A Letter to Benjamin Hawes, Esq., M.P., from Mr. Sergeant Adams, Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions. 1838. London: Hatchard & Son, 187, Piccadilly.
- The Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Prisons, 1836 to 1855. Parl. Blue Books.
- Debates on the Ticket of Leave Bill. Hansard, Vol. 129, 3rd series. 1853.
- A Letter to C. B. Adderley, Esq., M.P., on His Review of the Charge of the Recorder of Birmingham, on the Subject of Tickets of Leave. By M. D. Hill. London: Parker and Son, West Strand. Price 6d.

QUARTERLY RECORD
OF THE
PROGRESS OF REFORMATORY SCHOOLS AND
OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF RE- FORMATORY SCHOOLS AND OF PRISON DIS- CIPLINE.

In our Record, in the last, XXI, Number of this REVIEW, page cxxx, we referred to THE LAW AMENDMENT JOURNAL in terms of very great approbation, and from that number then before us, to that now last issued, May 20th, we have proofs more than sufficient to support our former opinions.

In the number of The Journal for April 24th, we have the following account of the three Scotch Reformatories most frequently named—the Aberdeen Schools are, of course, to be judged by their own peculiar, and most able reports:—

MEMORANDA OF VISITS TO INDUSTRIAL AND OTHER SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND, IN MARCH, 1856.

By a Member of the National Reformatory Union.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, GLASGOW (ROTTEN ROW).

In this school the great majority of the children are those sent thither by the magistrates, under Dunlop's Act, for being in a state of destitution; the remainder are admitted from charity, for the same reason. All the children are fully fed, and those sent by the magistrates are lodged as well as fed: the diet is porridge and milk for breakfast and supper, and Scotch broth or pea-soup and bread for dinner. From the healthy and hearty appearance of the children, it would appear that the food is sufficient. The building of the institution, though old, is roomy and in a high, airy situation; and there is a playground adjoining.

The master, Mr. Wilkie, kindly accompanied me over the establishment. The boys were employed in making paper bags for grocers, &c., and in picking cotton waste: they seemed to be working with spirit. The master informed me that there was no difficulty in obtaining work for them—that indeed twice as much work could be obtained as the children could do. The girls whom I saw were employed in sewing and knitting; and I learned that they do the housework and make the clothes. Trades are not taught in this school. I was informed that it was not considered desirable to make shoemakers or tailors of the children, since the journeymen in those trades are generally in a low moral position.

The religious instruction consists of reading portions of the Scriptures; no catechism is used. A large part of the pupils have been the children of Irish Roman Catholic parents, yet half of the school has been reared in no other faith than the Protestant one. On Sunday there is a large attendance of the young persons at the Church, and I was told that the school is a very successful one in the religious training of its pupils.

girls' school, informed me that great pains are taken to find situations for the pupils when they are of an age to quit the institution. Factory work is objected to, as leaving the children too uncontrolled. It is thought undesirable also that the lads should be employed as errand boys, since they would be so much in the streets, and have unoccupied time on their hands. For the girls, domestic service is preferred, particularly in the families of working men or small tradespeople, it being found that the position of servants in gentlemen's families is too great a rise for them. The boys are chiefly apprenticed to trades, such as carpenters, smiths, &c. : a large number have been taken into shipbuilders' yards, the owners of which are friends of the institution. A supervision over the pupils is kept up for some years after they leave the school ; and when out of work they are, I believe, permitted to return to the school till they can obtain employment. One condition is made with the persons to whom the pupils are intrusted, viz., that they shall cause them to attend a Protestant place of worship. The children have generally turned out well, and some of them have risen to a respectable position.

REFUGE FOR BOYS (DUKE STREET, GLASGOW).

This establishment is in an open, airy situation, on the east side of Glasgow ; the building is large and roomy, though in a style of architecture of more pretension than is, perhaps, suitable to an institution of this character.

The boys have all been convicted of offences, and are sent here to be detained for seven years, if necessary, for their reformation. I was informed, however, by Mr. McCallum, the superintendent, who kindly showed me the institution, that it is rarely necessary to keep a boy for more than four years. Many of the pupils have been in prison. Mr. McCallum much prefers that they should be sent direct to the institution without having been in gaol. The pupils are taught trades, such as tailoring, shoemaking, carpentry, &c. The trades are taught by men who also, I believe, superintend their pupils at other times and sleep with them at night. These men are workmen thoroughly skilled in their crafts, and are paid full wages. The consequence is, that the pupils become really good workmen, and are able at once to gain a livelihood on leaving the institution. I saw some ladies' boots and shoes, which were very well made. The proceeds of the work, I was informed, pay the cost of the raw material, the wages of the teachers, and leave a surplus, which is devoted to the general expenses of the establishment. No part of the earnings is given to the pupils.

The lads were plainly but neatly dressed in the usual working garb of Scotland, and seemed to be well fed. The diet, I learned, was of the ordinary Scotch character, viz. : porridge and milk for breakfast and supper, and barley broth or pea-soup with bread for dinner.

There is a steam-boiler which supplies steam for heating purposes, and also to an engine drawing a fanning apparatus which ventilates the house. This is intrusted to the care of two of the boys.

When I visited the institution, it being near the dinner hour, most of the boys were in the play-ground, which is spacious and airy: some of them were being instructed by a drill-serjeant in the sword exercise. Upon the ringing of the dinner-bell all who were in the play-ground formed into columns at the word of command, and marched in good order into the dining-hall. The military discipline, Mr McCallum informed me, is considered useful as accustoming the boys to prompt obedience, and saving much time in proceeding to work, meals, &c.

When the pupils leave the establishment great pains are taken to provide them with situations at a distance from Glasgow. The majority emigrate to Canada. Many of the owners of vessels trading from Glasgow to that country take the lads out gratis, two in each ship. The institution furnishes them with an outfit and a bag of biscuits towards their provisions; and they are expected to make themselves useful on board. On arriving in Canada, they are received by persons friendly to the institution, who procure them employment. Of those who do not emigrate, many are apprenticed to shoemakers and other artizans in the country, and some have gone into the army and navy.

It is calculated that 85 per cent. of the boys who leave this establishment ultimately turn out well. This, however, is upon the assumption that those whose career is unknown are going on aright; Mr. McCallum, however, believes that any who went wrong would be heard of. This success is probably in a great measure to be attributed to the removal of the pupils from Glasgow, which prevents their associating with their old connexions.

There is also a refuge for girls in Glasgow, but I had not an opportunity of inspecting it.

The combined effect of these institutions, and the industrial schools, has been to reduce crime to a considerable extent. In the last year, though the price of provisions was high and trade not good, the number of prisoners in the gaol of Glasgow was one hundred less than in the preceding year.

EDINBURGH UNITED INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL (SOUTH GRAY'S CLOSE.)

This school is conducted in a large roomy old house in an enclosed court, formerly the dwelling of a nobleman. I arrived a short time before the dinner hour. I went through several rooms where the children were engaged in industrial employment, particularly shoemaking and tailoring, while some of the younger ones were making paper bags and bandboxes. I learned that the shoemakers and tailors were allowed a small portion of the proceeds of their labour, as a penny per pair for shoes, &c. Those who had attained to some skill had learners under them (called apprentices), some one, some two, and even three. The work done by the apprentices is placed to the credit of the boy-teacher. The boys working at trades were in different rooms, each under the care of a master. The children appeared to work with spirit.

The account of the industrial department, I find, shows a balance of loss; but as the clothing consumed by the children themselves is not credited, the real loss, if any, will be trifling.

girls' school, informed me that great pains are taken to find situations for the pupils when they are of an age to quit the institution. Factory work is objected to, as leaving the children too uncontrolled. It is thought undesirable also that the lads should be employed as errand boys, since they would be so much in the streets, and have unoccupied time on their hands. For the girls, domestic service is preferred, particularly in the families of working men or small tradespeople, it being found that the position of servants in gentlemen's families is too great a rise for them. The boys are chiefly apprenticed to trades, such as carpenters, smiths, &c.: a large number have been taken into shipbuilders' yards, the owners of which are friends of the institution. A supervision over the pupils is kept up for some years after they leave the school; and when out of work they are, I believe, permitted to return to the school till they can obtain employment. One condition is made with the persons to whom the pupils are intrusted, viz., that they shall cause them to attend a Protestant place of worship. The children have generally turned out well, and some of them have risen to a respectable position.

REFUGE FOR BOYS (DUKE STREET, GLASGOW).

This establishment is in an open, airy situation, on the east side of Glasgow; the building is large and roomy, though in a style of architecture of more pretension than is, perhaps, suitable to an institution of this character.

The boys have all been convicted of offences, and are sent here to be detained for seven years, if necessary, for their reformation. I was informed, however, by Mr. McCallum, the superintendent, who kindly showed me the institution, that it is rarely necessary to keep a boy for more than four years. Many of the pupils have been in prison. Mr. McCallum much prefers that they should be sent direct to the institution without having been in gaol. The pupils are taught trades, such as tailoring, shoemaking, carpentry, &c. The trades are taught by men who also, I believe, superintend their pupils at other times and sleep with them at night. These men are workmen thoroughly skilled in their crafts, and are paid full wages. The consequence is, that the pupils become really good workmen, and are able at once to gain a livelihood on leaving the institution. I saw some ladies' boots and shoes, which were very well made. The proceeds of the work, I was informed, pay the cost of the raw material, the wages of the teachers, and leave a surplus, which is devoted to the general expenses of the establishment. No part of the earnings is given to the pupils.

The lads were plainly but neatly dressed in the usual working garb of Scotland, and seemed to be well fed. The diet, I learned, was of the ordinary Scotch character, viz.: porridge and milk for breakfast and supper, and barley broth or pea-soup with bread for dinner.

There is a steam-boiler which supplies steam for heating purposes, and also to an engine drawing a fanning apparatus which ventilates the house. This is intrusted to the care of two of the boys.

When I visited the institution, it being near the dinner hour, most

That a more favourable financial result is not obtained is to be attributed to the youth of the children, who leave the school so soon as they are deemed competent to fill private situations.

I went into the kitchen, which was very clean, and saw the dinner prepared. It consisted of Scotch broth, of a nourishing palatable description, with brown bread. The children breakfast and sup on porridge.

It was interesting to see them at dinner. They were placed at tables containing about 13 or 14 each. At the head of every table is an elder boy or girl, whose duty is to count the number at the table, and if any are away, to account for their absence.

I did not happen to be present at the hour when religious instruction is imparted, but I learned that the clergy of each denomination attend and teach the children of their creeds in separate rooms. This plan, I understand, has met with perfect success. While it ensures to the children a thorough religious training, experience shows that it is unaccompanied by any tendency to sectarian discord.

There are at present more than one hundred inmates in the school, of which about two-thirds are Roman Catholics. A large number of children have at different times left the school for various situations in which they have been placed, and have mostly turned out well.

The combined effect of this school, and of a larger one which has been for some time established on principles similar, except as respects the religious instruction, has been absolutely to annihilate juvenile mendicancy in Edinburgh, and very greatly to diminish the number of the youthful inmates of the gaol.

To the observations here made, with reference to the Edinburgh United Schools, we can add our fullest testimony. These Schools must be approved, not alone for their successful action, but likewise for the complete unity of purpose with which all sects and creeds have worked in their support. An excellent History of the Schools has been published, and this little work, with the eight Annual Reports now before us, are printed in the Institution by the pupils.

Major Arthur Mair, of Edinburgh, one of the most active and earnest friends of these Schools, thus writes to us :—

“ One principle is, I believe, peculiar to our School—it is equality of religious creeds. We have one hour (10 to 11, A.M.) appointed for religious instruction, when the different sects retire to separate rooms to receive their religious instruction, from the Teachers of their own faith : for the remainder of the day they all work together, in the fear of God, and in the love of one another, at least this is our aim, and we believe our endeavour has been blessed. We are chiefly composed of Presbyterians, Episcopalians, and Roman Catholics. We have worked together now for eight years most unanimously, and the children who have left us in the course of that period have generally behaved well.

If you will carefully read the reports, I think you must come to the conclusion that we have done something to simplify the religious difficulty. From the very commencement, we have acted by one another, in a true and honest spirit, and though we are always most happy to see the clergy of every denomination coming amongst us, and taking an interest in our children, yet we have studiously avoided having any of them on our Committee. The venerable old Bishop Carruthers is the only exception, and he was a man any school might have been proud of having at its head.

We have constantly on our platform at the general meetings Clergy of every creed. We have frequently the Clergy of the Church of England, the Presbyterians and the Catholics, instructing the children, of course in separate rooms, but at the same hour; daily from 10 to 11 o'clock. It is open to all, and I frequently pass during that hour from one to another, to see what is going on; but mind, each department is under the sole supervision of its own religious instruction Committee, and they, by the constitution and rules of the school, cannot be meddled with by any persons but members of their own Church. For the one hour this distinction is made; we then join harmoniously together, and I am sure I never during the day think for a moment what is the creed of any particular child. We all acknowledge the same God, and there are general rules of guidance which cannot give offence. One of our teachers is a Presbyterian, the other is a Catholic—our Superintendent is of the Church of England—our Pupil teachers are Catholic or Protestant as it happens, so are all the servants of the Institution. I never think of asking to what sect they belong. We have a man to teach the shoemakers, I know he is a Catholic.

I do not know what the Tailor is, or the Turner, or the Bookbinder, or the Printer—but I know we have never had a word of difference or of unkindness amongst the children or the Teachers. May not we then hope that the blessing of Heaven may rest upon our endeavours and that we may be the honourable means of bringing up children, who through life will obey the great command, to love as brethren.

We also have a housekeeper and a woman under her. For some years the head woman was a Catholic, but we found it very difficult to get a woman of the class we required, and so were driven to take a Protestant, but the under woman is a Catholic. As far as I can judge, this school has been and is working on a true and faithful principle.

From the Hardwicke School, we have the following, being the Third Report issued by Mr. Baker:—

Since the Report of the Gloucestershire Reformatory School, which was published last year, so much has occurred that I must touch but briefly on the leading points.

The rapid spread of the system throughout the whole of England has exceeded the hopes of its supporters. There is now probably not one large county which will be without a Reformatory School in action by the end of this year. So far as we can judge, all the counties, and all the towns with populations of less than (say 50,000), will be provided for as soon as the Schools have had time to grow to the necessary size. This may probably take from one to two years after the opening of the School, and will not bear to be hurried; but I have every hope that within three years nearly every county may feel as Gloucestershire alone can as yet—that there is a locus penitentiae for every boy whom the Magistrates in their discretion consider to require the treatment of a Reformatory School.

Another point of great importance is, that the Act of last Session, for enforcing the payment of some part of the maintenance of such children (by their parents), has at length come into operation. Many parents have willingly consented to pay; but a short time ago the first contested case, as I believe, in England, was tried at Bristol: and the parent, a man earning large wages, was sentenced to pay 3s. 6d. a week. We have every hope that this will soon be carried out thoroughly, and that all parents, even the very poor, will be compelled to pay, at least as much as the child would have cost them had he been honest. This at any rate they can pay. If they can pay more, they should be made to do so. It has been for a long time a sad injustice that the parents of a criminal child should actually be benefited by his son's crime. But to come to the more immediate matters of our own School.

The first and most important observation is, that we have lost the active services, though not the name, nor, I believe I may say, the warm interest, of him by whose energy and devotion our School was first called into existence: and so well organized that it can now proceed without his help. After originating this School, and giving much assistance to the organization of that for Devon and Cornwall he has now undertaken the charge of that at Kingswood, near Bristol, which will, I trust, ere long make a clearance of all the worst juvenile criminals of Somersetshire; a range of utility of which any man might feel proud.

During this year the average number of our boys has been increased by more than a third of the number of last year. This, however, must not be taken as a proof that crime is increasing. Of thirty-six committed to us in the year, nine have been received from other counties, and thirteen more were cases sent to us on the first conviction, and who appear rather to have been boys momentarily led astray than hardened offenders.

Indeed a strong change has been perceptible in the general character of the boys received. The sharp, clever, highly educated, (in the usual acceptation of the term), but determined thief,—who has run his evil course for some years and been often convicted, and is able and willing to corrupt others,—has given place to a set who appear to have erred from a want of knowledge rather than a determined propensity. Rough and uneducated from the wildest parts of the country, rather than from the towns, many of them appear more or less deficient in reason. I remember one who had once or twice perpetrated acts of serious mischief rather than serious crime; who, though apparently only extremely stupid on most points, could not for long be taught any ideas of time or distance. Another was reported to have been always a well-behaved boy until he had a violent attack of scarlet fever, since which time he had been often annoying the neighbourhood by shouting and screaming, and being convicted of a second theft was sent here. A third we received, a poor wretch, who, though by no means untaught, appeared utterly weak both in body and mind, excessively tall and thin, he appears quite unable to resist the temptation of stealing anything he can eat, from bread to horse-beans, on which latter luxury he once gorged himself sufficiently to produce a serious illness. Now, although this is not exactly the class of boys for whom the School was intended, yet I by no means complain of their being sent to us, as we have room for them, because our object is to do as much good in any way as we can, and we find that these boys with fresh air, very good food and as much hard work as they are capable of, improve rapidly, and become apparently strong, healthy and honest in a short time. But the proportion of sharp, clever town thieves, who used to constitute nearly the whole of our numbers, has diminished greatly.

In the year we have received thirty-six boys; twenty-seven from our own county, and nine from other counties. Of our own twenty-seven—three are from Gloucester, eleven from Cheltenham, and thirteen from different parts of the county. Of the town boys, only four have been of the class who are employed in corrupting and instructing others; five others have been very bad boys, two middling, and three I believe only led astray by momentary temptation. At one time, indeed, the youthful marauders of Cheltenham appeared to be scared, and for a time gave up their evil courses. One or two, I am sorry to say, have since returned to them, and, until they can be caught, the mischief will be again rapidly spreading.

With regard to what we more strictly call the reformation of the boys, (although this is a term I never like to use in the past tense, as we cannot possibly say that any boy is reformed), we have received in the whole, up to last Christmas, ninety-four boys, of whom

Absconded	...	...	...	...	5
Removed without our consent	...	...	...	...	3
Apprenticed	...	...	...	...	7
In Trade	...	...	...	...	8
In Service	...	...	...	...	3
At Sea	...	...	...	...	6
Emigrated	...	...	...	...	1
Returned to their Friends	...	...	...	...	6
Gone to other Schools	...	...	...	...	31
Now in the School	...	...	...	...	24

94

Of the thirty-one whom we have put out in the world, either as apprentices, in trade, or the like, three have since been dishonest,—two of them under very strong temptations, and the third was unwisely allowed to leave the school much too early. Four others have turned out idle or in some way unsatisfactory, and have been discharged from their places, but are now working honestly. The other twenty-six are still going on satisfactorily.

The fact of thirty-one boys having been removed to other schools also requires some explanation. In commencing a School, great difficulty is often found in getting what may be termed a good moral tone. Where all are wild it is difficult to tame any, but when once the majority of the boys have acquired habits of at least order and discipline, any new comers insensibly adopt the same, and the training is comparatively easy.

Acting on this idea, I suggested to the Managers of Schools of several Counties, the taking a certain number of boys, who have been half-trained in some older establishment, to form a nucleus for the new School. I engaged, when such boys were taken from me by any manager, to receive half the number of newly-convicted boys in return.

This suggestion has been largely adopted; and I have sent in the last six months, twenty-eight boys to other Schools, all of whom I believe are, on the whole, well reported of. This has been a great assistance to us for the present, and for some little time longer it will continue to be so; but I must remind the gentlemen and farmers of our county, that ere long it will be necessary to find places for our reformed boys. This will be no heavy burden if all will endeavour to help. If one place is found in each parish once in ten years it will probably amply suffice.

But if all are utterly careless of every consideration except that of getting rid of criminals from their own neighbourhood, without caring for what may become of them, no care or expense laid out on a Reformatory School can be of any avail.

With regard to our money matters, we have also much to remark upon, as was shewn in our former Report. The total cost of the School for the first three years was £1,328. 19s. 2d., exclusive of the prime cost of building, but inclusive of purchase of Stock. Now, had we received from the first the government allowance of 5s. a week (which is now granted), it would have repaid us £620. 15s. of that money. The grants, too, from the Privy Council would have amounted to about £70. Again, we must deduct in fairness the crops in hand, at the end of the year 1854, and the price received for produce sold. This will reduce the current expenses of the three years, and will give the following result:—

	£.	s.	d.
Total Payments of Twelve Quarters	1328	19	2
De duct Valuation of Stock-in-hand, } November, 1854 .....	298	8	3
	1030	10	11
Had we received 5s. a week from } Government for each boy, }	620	15	0
	409	15	11
The cost would have been.
But Produce sold .. £77 2 6½ } Privy Council would } have given about } 70 0 0 }	147	2	6½
Leaving as the cost of three years . .	£262	13	4½

The Farm accounts have been but roughly kept, as I could never see any certain way of arriving with accuracy at the cost of cabbages, potatoes, &c. consumed in the house. We merely, therefore, give an account of that portion of the produce which is actually sold.

The past year has from many causes been one of unusual expense. The price of Provisions may be reckoned, at least, at one half more than the average previous years.

The large number of Schools arising in all parts of England has caused a great demand for Schoolmasters and Bailiffs. This I have been anxious to supply as far as I could, and have had a considerable number of men training in the School to act as Masters or Bailiffs elsewhere, amounting to an average of three extra masters throughout the year. I am happy to add that, besides many masters of other Schools who have spent from a few days to a fortnight here, and many who have come for a short time and given it up, six men trained here have gone to other Schools, five of whom have hitherto given satisfaction. The cost, however, of the (average) three masters' board can hardly be estimated at less than, say £20. each.

There have also been an average of about five boys unpaid for by Government, having been received unconvicted before the allowance for convicted boys was granted. These may be roughly estimated to have caused a deficit of £65.

The increase also of the value of Stock on the Farm (consequent on the increase of the number of boys and acres) from £298. 8s. 3. to £476. 10s. accounts for £178., making altogether £443. more than might be expected in ordinary years, which renders the less hopeless our deficiency of this year of £283.

We must, however, acknowledge the receipt of some extraordinary donations, but for which the deficit would have been far greater. The money value of these has been considerable,—the testimony they give of the opinions of the donors has been far more. I allude particularly to £50. from Charles Bathurst, Esq., and £25. from R. S. Holford, Esq.

When, however, we consider that in nearly every County in England £700. or £800. has been raised for this purpose at the very outset, (in many far more), while in this county the subscriptions (exclusive of the Managers) amounted to somewhat under £260. in the first three years, and £163. 14s. in the present year—I cannot but hope that now that the system has ceased to be considered as a wild experiment, and has been proved, by God's help, to have hitherto succeeded and borne good fruit, the whole deficit of this year may not be left to be made up by

Your obedient Servant,

T. B. LI. BAKER.

At the Birmingham April Sessions the Recorder delivered the following Charge, which is just now most important, when most ill-advised and ignorant would-be legislators are endeavouring to subvert the Ticket-of-Leave System, because it has been carried out with a haste and an ignorance little inferior to that which they, themselves, display in opposing it.

For the report of the Charge, and of the presentment of the Grand Jury, we are indebted to Aris's Birmingham Gazette, of April 21st, and to The Midland Counties' Herald, of April 24th:—

The proclamation against Vice and Immorality having been read, the learned Recorder addressed the Grand Jury as follows:—Gentlemen, I am sorry to have to inform you that your duties will be very heavy on the present occasion. The calendar, which is not quite made up yet, consists of 136 prisoners; probably the number brought before you will not be much less than 150. The interval between the Sessions has been considerable, no doubt, but in the Parliamentary Session before the last an Act passed which it was expected would have the effect of lessening considerably the number of prisoners committed for trial at Assizes and Sessions. I refer to the Act extending the power of summarily convicting for felony, which had up to that time been limited to young persons, extending it under certain circumstances, which I must not stop to enumerate. And true it is that there have been many such convictions in this, as in other towns; but whether the effect will be permanently good, or is at this present moment such as to diminish materially the number of persons committed to Assizes and to Sessions, may well be doubted, because it has been found by experience that whatever gives facility to the prosecution of offenders multiplies the number brought before tribunals, whether summary tribunals or juries, to have their cases considered. It is quite a distinct question, and one I do not now enter upon, whether the number of offences is increased or decreased; but certainly the number of offenders brought into Court, as is proved by experience, is augmented. It is increased for this reason, that forty or fifty years ago any person who prosecuted a criminal did it at his own expense. I well remember when a boy a friend of my father's being robbed on the highway near to this town, and being shot at; his life was thereby put in danger and his property taken from him. He prosecuted the robbers as soon as they were apprehended; but he had to pay the costs of their apprehension, and the costs of their prosecution, and his bill amounted to 90*l*. It cost him, therefore, 90*l*. to be robbed and to be shot at; and the result was, that the offenders, being young, were treated mercifully, and in the course of eighteen months were again in the town of Birmingham, passing him in the street, entertaining, it is to be supposed, no feelings towards him which it would be very comfortable for him to contemplate. It is not much to be wondered at that, when the tax of prosecution was so enormous, prosecutions were comparatively rare, and persons have from this hastily concluded that as the prosecution was rare, crime was rare; but to gentlemen of your sagacity it will appear at a glance that the one fact does not by any means necessarily follow the other. The Legislature found it necessary to give facilities for prosecution (and the main facility was to pay the costs of the prosecutions from some public fund), considering it highly unjust that when the community had not been sufficiently strong, or sufficiently vigilant, to guard one of its members from robbery, but that in consequence of their inability to guard him he had become a private sufferer, it was very wrong to increase that suffering by making him pay a large amount to protect that public which had not protected him. Nothing could be more fair than such reasoning; but in the very difficult subject of criminal jurisprudence it is scarcely possible to take a step, however right the direction may appear, which does not draw after it consequences quite unexpected, and very little to be desired. Certainly the consequence of the payment of the expenses of prosecutions is to bring cases into this Court which a wise and humane discretion would overlook, and give the offender another chance. The severity of punishments has to some extent that effect. Humane persons (and humanity I am glad is spreading amongst us) shrink from exposing a delinquent, for an offence which they consider slight, or caused by some overwhelming temptation, or committed by a young person without experience, to a severe penalty; thus the very severity of the punishment often acts as a protection against those who are guilty of crime. But the course of legislation has been now for many years gradually to lighten punishment; and the course of the public mind has been even more rapid than the Legislature, so that punishments as they stand on the law books cannot be inflicted in this Court. For instance, I cannot usefully, and even there may be doubt if I can justly, inflict punishments which are heavier than those that would be inflicted on the same individual by the discretion of Judges or other Recorders in other places. Of course any great inequality of that kind makes it a matter of accident, not of guilt, how much a man is punished; as it would follow that a man would be punished severely, not because his offence is great, but because it is committed in a certain jurisdiction; and punished lightly, not because his offence is trivial, but because his crime occurred in a district where a lenient scale of punishments obtain. Punishments which might appear to this Court expedient, if they go beyond that scale will, of course, be mitigated by the authorities at the Home Office, to whom her Majesty the Queen entrusts that part of her prerogative which enables her to pardon or mitigate the sentences of prisoners. Thus, there are two currents in motion, operating continually to lessen punishment; and the Legislature now and then steps in and makes a very great change, of the character to which I have referred, in the extension of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, because there is a limit to the punishment which Magistrates can inflict, much below the limit applying to Assizes and Sessions, and the consequence is that many prisoners are brought here who would not have been brought. The prosecutor says to himself, "If this person were to be punished by transportation or very long imprisonment, or taken before a large public body and exposed to shame, I should shrink from bringing him before the Court, or from having him apprehended; but he will be placed before Magistrates, will be at once subjected to punishment, without waiting for trial, and his punishment must be a light one, because Magistrates have not the power, if they have the disposition, to make the punishment heavy. I think, therefore, it would be better for all that he should be sent to prison." But what is the result? He is subjected to a slight punishment; he is not in custody long enough for any system of reformation, however well devised, to produce any impression upon him; he has no motive for attempting self-reformation with a view to shorten his imprisonment, for it is already so short that it cannot be lessened by any such process. Meanwhile he has lost his position in society. He was one of the honest and respectable portion of the community; he has passed the Rubicon; he has entered into the criminal class. He had a horror of a gaol; he has entered the gaol; he finds it not so dreadful a place as his imagination pictured it. The shame of having been in gaol he cannot shake off. What is his position on his discharge? He was not able to resist temptation when it was comparatively easy to resist it; he now finds himself outlawed, and repelled by society; that position which he was not able to maintain while it was easily maintainable, he has now to recover in the midst of all difficulties. This is his prospect on the one hand. On the other hand he has formed connections—he has learnt that there are means of maintenance which will preserve him from the necessity of excessive toil; which, if they are pretty sure to bring upon him great evils, those evils are in the future and prospective, while his wants and desires press upon him on the instant, and with tyrannical power. What wonder, then, if he soon falls? What wonder if he quickly finds himself again engaged in acts of dishonesty, and if he is by and by brought before us again? I am not entering into any speculation, or indulging in any effort of the imagination, in saying this. What I have told you is, every word of it, the fruit of a bitter experience, gathered in Criminal Courts, during a period of nearly forty years.

I have told you the calendar consists of 136 prisoners. I have before me what you might well suppose another calendar, and a tolerably large one. It is not so, but is a list of persons who have been convicted, with a short note of each conviction. I find that very nearly sixty of the 136 have been formerly punished, some of them many times. There is a case of an individual (I will not mention his name, because I have no desire to prejudice you against him), twenty-three years of age. It is recorded against his name, that on the 27th of October, 1849, he was summarily convicted for refusing to work at the Workhouse, and sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment; July, 1851, for wilful damage, one month's imprisonment; 1852, for stealing thirteen pounds of lead, twelve months' imprisonment; 1853, misbehaviour in the Workhouse, fourteen days; the same year, for an assault, fourteen days; same year, for running away from the Workhouse with the clothes of that establishment, one month; the same year, for insolence in the Workhouse, twenty-one days—four convictions, therefore, in 1853; at the January Sessions, 1854, he is convicted of uttering two counterfeit half-crowns, and imprisoned two years; on the 24th of July, in the following year, he is sentenced to three months' imprisonment, for assaulting an officer of the Gaol, and now he is here for another offence. That is his history from 1849 to 1856. I shall not detain you any further except to express the conviction of my own mind, which I feel gaining strength year by year, month by month, day by day, for a very long period, that the only principle of administering punishment which does not involve absurdity when it comes to be carefully investigated, is this: when once a criminal is convicted, keep him until he has given him cogent proof that he is reformed, and if he never give such cogent proof, keep him till the day of his death—let him be released by death alone. All this may sound exceedingly harsh to those who have not been called upon to investigate and study the subject: but I believe it is capable of being proved to be the principle most consistent, not only with the safety of society, but with the good of the individual; because what can be (if we look at it either as members of society or as Christians) a greater misfortune to a man than to be put on a course which leaves him almost by an inevitable necessity to go on offending against the laws of God and man, from year to year, during the term of his life! Do we not do him, as well as society, a benefit by keeping him in custody, and thus prevent him sinning against God and man? I ask your excuse for having troubled you at this length. It was not my intention to have uttered ten words when I began to address you. I have been led on by the great importance of the subject, an importance which, if it even could be exaggerated, is so by the fact that the Legislature is now about to enter on an examination of the great question of punishment. I wish that that examination may be so conducted as to lead to such changes as shall make it less painful than it now is to preside in a Criminal Court; for the feeling uppermost in the mind of every person who, like myself, is called upon to adjudicate in criminal matters, must be that they are engaged in the execution of laws, and in the administration of penalties, which, to speak in the most cautious terms, are far less efficient for all good purposes than anyone could wish to see them who has the welfare of his country at heart.—The Grand Jury then retired.

Appeals.—There were various Appeals against the Borough and Parish rates entered for hearing, including many by the London and North-western Railway Company; only one, however, was entertained, that of Gillot v. the Guardians and Overseers of Birmingham.—Mr. Field for the appellant. Mr. Spooner and Mr. Wills for the respondents.—It appeared from Mr. Field's statement that the appellant complained of being over assessed for premises in Graham-street, and also that it was unequal as compared with other properties in the parish. In reply to a question from Mr. Spooner, Mr. Field stated that he had the notice of appeal, but not the necessary recognizances to prosecute.—Upon this admission, Mr. Spooner said they could not proceed, as the local Act clearly required that the recognizances should be entered into.—In this opinion the learned Recorder concurred, and ordered the rate to be confirmed.—The other appeals were resited.

The trials of the prisoners were then proceeded with. The following is a summary of the sentences:—Penal servitude: Four to six years, fifteen to four years.—Imprisonment: Four to two years, eight to eighteen months, two to fifteen months, fifteen to twelve months, four to eleven months, one to ten months, four to nine months, fourteen varying from eight to four months, seven to three months, and the remainder from three to two and one month, a fortnight, and a week. Two were found guilty and discharged; ten not guilty; three no bills.—The business of the Sessions did not terminate until Thursday.

In the course of Wednesday, the Grand Jury handed in the following presentment to the Recorder:—

"The Grand Jury beg to represent to the Court, they have observed with deep concern that the majority of the numerous cases which have come before them at the present Sessions are re-committals after previous convictions for various offences, and by very young persons; also, among other cases, there are tickets-of-leave men, one having in his possession many picklock-keys, and another keeping a notorious house of ill-fame. They also particularly notice there are many cases of persons charged with uttering, or being in possession of base coin, who, being prosecuted by the Authorities of her Majesty's Mint for the minor offence of uttering, are thereby only liable to short periods of imprisonment, although they have been many times convicted of similar offences and other descriptions of crimes. The cases of servants and workmen robbing or defrauding their employers appear to be on the increase, which the jury believe is attributable to the ineffectual operation of the law, as preventive of such offences. But, while expressing their belief that the criminal laws at present in force (or as administered) are insufficient for the prevention of crime, the reformation of criminals, and the due protection of property or life in this country, the Jury do not shrink from suggesting what, in their unanimous opinion, may be probable remedies.

"1.—The Grand Jury are of opinion that sufficient means do not at present exist (but ought to be provided by a national system) for the proper moral and religious training of the young before they become educated in crime.

"2.—For the reformation of children convicted of crime, they are of opinion that their detention and moral and religious training in such establishments as are now sanctioned by law, and their parents being made liable for their maintenance, is the most probable way to reclaim them, and that punishment should be applied (under proper control) to the idle, disobedient, or refractory.

"3.—The jury suggest that those twice convicted under sixteen years of age, should be placed and trained under more strict and exclusive control, and for sufficient time to prove, by their conduct, their fitness to be once more entrusted with liberty.

"4.—They think that all young persons up to twenty-one years of age, and three times convicted of crime, ought to be adjudged unfit to be at large in these kingdoms, and ought to be transported to a colony, exclusively appropriated for their reception, and be compelled there to labour towards their own maintenance, and be trained until they prove by their good conduct their fitness to be at liberty to return to their native land, or to go elsewhere.

"5.—The Grand Jury are further of opinion that all persons above twenty-one years of age, three times convicted of crime, ought to be adjudged unfit to be entrusted with the liberty enjoyed by the honest and industrious inhabitants of the British dominions; and, that they should be exiled for the term of their natural lives to a distant colony especially chosen for their safe keeping, and prevention of their evil influence on civilised society, and there be compelled to labour for their maintenance; and the Jury are of opinion that their labour may be made profitable under such severe toil as rigor, tempered by humanity, may suggest."

The Recorder, in reply, observed that some of the topics touched upon by the Grand Jury might create differences of opinion which that was neither the time nor opportunity for properly discussing. At the same time, many of the suggestions which had been made were deserving of and would receive great attention, as coming from the Grand Jury of this borough. "With reference to those persons under ticket-of-leave," continued the learned gentleman, "I have been in correspondence with the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I have pointed out that when persons are sent with tickets of leave into large towns, they come back into their old temptations; they find harbourage; are enabled to secrete themselves, and pursue their former course of life almost with impunity. I learn from Sir George Grey that a change in this respect has already begun to be made. I have to inform you, in consequence of the enquiries which have been made in regard to the course of life followed by ticket-of-leave men in this town, that those persons have taken the alarm, and have nearly to the whole number departed elsewhere. It would be certainly but a slight public advantage that they should go from one town to another; and although you, as inhabitants of Birmingham, might rejoice to hear that they are no longer in the town, you would surely not be so selfish as to congratulate yourselves at the expense of other large towns. But if the same vigilance is exercised in other large towns as in Birmingham, not interfering with them when they are honestly employed, but in careful watchfulness over the course of life they actually do adopt, it would be found that those who are dishonestly disposed will for the same reason as they left Birmingham leave other large towns. If ticket-of-leave men, or any other persons pursuing a dishonest course of life, could be prevented from congregating in large towns, we should find from this sole effect a great diminution of crime, because there are many appliances required to carry on crime profitably; one of those appliances is the existence of the capitalist—the receiver; he cannot be found in small places. Another is the power of at once hiding among those fastnesses which we know to our cost exist in such numbers and to such an extent in this town, where by means of their companions they can secrete themselves, and stolen property at any moment passing from one to another thus prevents the identification by the officers of justice. All these appliances require a large population, and if by any means we could prevent thieves congregating together in large towns, without any other improvement in the law or those administering it, you would find a serious diminution of crime. Whether it will be accomplished or not is more than I can venture to predict. The whole subject is one replete with difficulties. We scarcely ever make improvement in one direction, till we find ourselves, like tinkers, making holes in another part of the article upon which we are operating; but still it is so essential to the peace and comfort and the safety of society, that we should do our best for the repression and diminution of crime, that we must not be thrown back by disappointment, but labour on in the hope that at length we shall be able to do something more effectual than we have hitherto done. I am glad to find you give in your adhesion and approval of the change made in the law in reference to the treatment of the young. I must say I felt it for many years in my professional and official life to be a national disgrace that we so treated our young offenders that by neglect and not being cared for by their natural parents, or by the State, who, when their natural parents desert their offspring, should adopt them, they have been suffered to grow up in the pursuit of crime. We never interfered with them to check them until the young untaught, who had not the means of learning his duty to God and man, was brought to answer as a responsible being for offences which too often he had not been warned to avoid, but even trained, either by his companions or parents to do. Much has been done, much more remains to be done, to remove this evil from our laws, manners, and habits. I am glad to find in this respect, at all events, we are on the right course; and I do trust, by and by, we shall find out the right course with regard to adults. I am obliged to you for the attention you have bestowed upon this subject. It is one upon which we shall make no progress until the interest in it and the knowledge of it are widely diffused among the people."

Captains Crofton, Knight, and John Lentaigue, Esq., the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, have just published their second Annual Report, from which we make the following extracts:—

In pursuance of the Act 17 & 18 Vic., chap. 76, we beg leave to submit our Annual Report on the state of the Convict Prisons in Ireland for the year 1855.

The ordinary reports of the Governors, Chaplains, Medical Officers, and Schoolmasters, are appended in the usual manner.

Accommodation

The accommodation for convicts in the Government Prisons on the 1st January, 1856, may be estimated as amounting to 3,490.

GOVERNMENT PRISONS.

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Number in custody on the 1st January, 1856,	2,590	619	3,209
Accommodation on 1st January, 1856.	2,860	630	3,490

COUNTY AND CITY GAOLS.

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Number in custody on 1st January, 1856,	39	214	253

Grand Total of Gaols in Ireland, 2,742.

The accommodation for female convicts has been much increased since our last report, and is now sufficient for 630.

NUMBER OF CONVICTS SENTENCED DURING THE YEAR.

TRANSPORTATION.		PENAL SERVITUDE.
14 and 15 years	21	4 years,	420
Above 15 years	—	6 years and above 4,	54
Life,	12	10 years and above 6,	9
		Life,	2
Total,	33	Total,	485

Total number of Convicts sentenced in Ireland in 1855, . 518

Disposal of Convicts.

Removed to Bermuda, per ship "William,"	300
Discharged—having completed their sentences at home,	632
Ditto ditto ditto at Bermuda and Gibraltar,	188
	820
Total,	1,120

Employment of Convicts.

They have been employed on the Public Works at Spike Island, Haulbowline, and the Forts at the mouth of Cork Harbour, or at Trades in the other prisons.

We are much gratified in being enabled to report that we have succeeded in establishing a proper system throughout the Convict Establishments; and what we foreshadowed as our intentions in our Report of last year, we have, as far as possible, carried out. Adult male prisoners, with very rare exceptions (caused by physical inability to undergo separation), are transmitted as soon as possible from the County Gaols to Mountjoy Prison, where they are subjected to nine months' strictly separate imprisonment; they are then employed either on Public Works at Spike Island and the Forts at Cork Harbour, or at trades at Philipstown, Newgate, and Smithfield. We have erected an iron moveable prison at Philipstown, capable of holding 250 convicts, who will be employed in extending the prison buildings. Some of these will be transferred from accommodation suitable for invalids, and enable us to remove prisoners of that class from the different establishments where they have been unavoidably detained. We have also altered and provided for the warming of eighty cells in the old gaol, so that 330 prisoners, on removal from separate confinement, can now be accommodated at Philipstown, on the most improved system of prison discipline, viz., separate sleeping cells.

We have, in every possible manner, endeavoured to separate the juveniles from the adults, and regret that a difficulty in obtaining a suitable site for a Juvenile Penal Reformatory, has delayed our making the progress we should have desired. A bill is, however, immediately to be brought before Parliament, for the purpose of enclosing the Commons of Lusk (situated about ten miles from Dublin), for this purpose; and we now trust that we shall shortly be in a position to proceed with the necessary works. We still retain the juvenile convicts at Mountjoy and Philipstown Prisons, and have reason to believe this is the best arrangement we could have made, both as regards the prevention of further contamination, and the inculcation of industrial habits. In our last Report we complained of the inefficient state of the Educational Departments of the Convict Depots, and stated the importance we conceived should be attached to them in this country, recommending at the same time they should be placed under the inspection of the National Board of Education. Experience has proved that we were correct in our opinion; the report of Mr. M'Gauran, the Head Schoolmaster at Mountjoy Prison, showing, that after a very careful examination of the prisoners at that establishment, he found that 96·2 per cent. were almost without any education at all; a fact, we submit, calling for every exertion to render the educational machinery as perfect as possible, in order to open the minds of the prisoners, by a system of training as well as teaching.

Sensible of the very great importance of establishing a proper system of education in the prisons, through which, unfortunately, thousands of human beings must pass, who are in turn subjected to its influence, we are gratified at being enabled to state that, although much of the past year has been taken up in arranging schoolrooms, classifying prisoners according to their attainments, appointment of schoolmasters, &c., a great desire has already been evinced by the prisoners to receive instruction; and this is more remarkable, as proceeding from some advanced in age who, at the commencement of the year, attended school with the greatest reluctance. This applies both to males and females, and we believe so desirable a result has been achieved through great exertion on the part of the teachers. Lectures have been established and attended with visible success; the great stumbling-block to improvement has been the low and depressing opinion that prisoners in general hold of their own qualifications, believing it to be impossible that they are susceptible of improvement. The exertion required from the instructor to remove an impression so detrimental to progress, can be of no ordinary kind, as his constant labour should be that of illustrating and picturing out to the minds of the instructed; but this is no light task, and few there are, however gifted they may be in knowledge, who can really give effect to this desideratum of all education, but more especially that of the pauper and criminal.

Mr. Coyle (an Inspector of the National Board of Education), has recently visited the Dublin Convict Prisons' Schools, and made many valuable suggestions, which we feel confident will advance the cause of education; it is by the constant visits of the Inspectors, and adopting their suggestions from time to time, that we may hope to render the Prison Schools what they should be—one of the primary elements of reformation.

We have been under the necessity of making many changes amongst the prison officers, which, we feel convinced, will tend to the furtherance of prison discipline and reformatory treatment throughout the service. The establishment of fines amongst the warders, and a clear understanding that an officer proved to be under the influence of liquor, will not be retained in the service, have produced the beneficial results anticipated. We believe that there are very few officers now in the service who would not feel they had disgraced themselves, if guilty of conduct formerly too common.

The probation of six months, to which each warder is subjected on joining the service, has been found to work well; many who entered with an idea that there was nothing to do, have found out their mistake, and resigned; others who have evinced their unsuitness for prison officers, have not had their appointments confirmed.

We anticipated that on the commencement of the new system, whilst in a transition state, both as regards officers and prisoners, many subjects of jarring, disappointment, and discontent, would be likely to arise and cause troubles in the prisons; this was the case to some extent, and called for the exercise of great discrimination and firmness on the part of the local prison authorities.

We regret to state, many violent and turbulent offences having occurred in the early part of the year, it became necessary to resort to severe punishments, which, however, were carefully watched by the medical officers; these occurred principally during the disorganization of Philipstown Prison.

We are happy to state, however, that the system is now thoroughly understood and appreciated by officers and prisoners, who are aware that although the evil-disposed will assuredly receive the treatment their conduct merits, those who have chosen a different course will meet with every encouragement.

The system of classification, although a task of great labour, works well, and will amply compensate the public service the additional time required to carry it out; its importance, through the facility it affords of individualizing each prisoner, cannot be easily exaggerated.

The juveniles can at present be scarcely treated as satisfactorily as could be wished. Further contamination is prevented, and education and industrial occupations, as far as trades are concerned, are promoted as much as possible; but we have no land attached to the prisons, and cannot expect really satisfactory results until the erection of the "Juvenile Penal Reformatory," when prison construction, and the various occupations of farm labour, will aid properly selected officers in bringing about the reformation we seek to produce. We rejoice to find it is the intention of the Irish Government to bring in a Bill for the "reformation of juvenile offenders." We have long felt the importance of commencing the reformation of criminals at an early age, and before they are as hardened in crime as the majority are who come to the convict establishments. Parental responsibility, duly enforced, will do more to check the training for crime, which unhappily too often prevails amongst the class from whom these children emanate, than any other measure that has been proposed. There are many alterations we should wish to see in the English Act: amongst others, we should prefer the age of admission to be restricted to juveniles under fourteen, instead of sixteen. We should prefer that a stipulation should be made, that the imprisonment to which a juvenile is to be subjected before he is committed to a reformatory, should be "separate;" but we must hope that experience in the practical working of these institutions will suggest beneficial changes, and thankfully accept what we consider will be the means, under Providence, of reducing the criminal population.

With regard to female convicts, we have devoted much attention to carry out the plans proposed in our last year's Report concerning them, and have observed a manifest improvement in their general demeanour and conduct. This we attribute in some measure to the efforts made by our teachers to open their minds by education, and to engender habits of self-control. Many, instead of sullenly brooding over their past life, now look forward with hope to the future. Even women advanced in life, who have spent most of their career in prison, and who at first would not attend school, and seemed incapable of understanding the advantages of education, are now amongst the most assiduous in their classes. A difference in their conduct is already apparent; they are more orderly and obedient to the rules, and make efforts to exercise that self-command, the want of which has so often led them into crime. We trust that, under the new arrangements in the prisons, and a system of Refuges and patronage on discharge, which we are now advocating, many convicts formerly considered irreclaimable, will finish their career as good members of society.

On the subject of education, Mrs. Lidwill, the Superintendent of the Cork depot, expresses herself as follows:—

"I find that the effect of school instruction has been, in most instances, to, as it were, awaken the minds of the prisoners, and improve their natural comprehensions, to make them more docile, more easily brought to see the value of cleanliness and order, and to inspire them with a considerable feeling of self-respect; many of them seem by education to have become better able to comprehend the folly and wickedness of their previous lives, and experience a strong feeling of repentance. I have observed, too, that as they make progress in school education, their conduct in the prison proportionately improves; and that some who have come from the county gaols, with very turbulent characters, and apparently of very violent dispositions, have become, under the influence of education, conformable to discipline."

Mr. Sinnott, the Governor, and Mrs. Rawlins, the Superintendent of Grangegorman, both dwell on the importance of this training. Prisoners are subjected, on conviction, to four months' separate confinement, as far as the accommodation at our disposal will admit, after which they are removed to the industrial classes, and employed in works suitable to their sex. The system of badges and gratuities works particularly well as applied to the female convicts, and calls forth good qualities which would otherwise have lain dormant. Mr. Synnott says—

"Classification and the badges have already proved to be of great moment, and are well calculated as auxiliaries in producing happy results, and a further and more steady developement of individual merit."

Mrs. Rawlins states—

"The prisoners in the higher classes have exhibited much anxiety to keep their position, while those in the lower endeavour, in many instances, to raise themselves, and have tried to overcome dispositions which bring them into blame, as well as to apply themselves to work and the means provided for their improvement."

Up to the end of 1853 all female convicts were sent to Australia, where, on their discharge, they had an opportunity, in a new country, of finding an honest means of livelihood; and the individual, if unreformed, did not fall back into the stream of society in this country to contaminate it by her example. Transportation having comparatively ceased as a punishment, and with it the means of disposal of female convicts in another country, it is necessary to provide prison accommodation for the number to be maintained in Ireland: a new prison is in progress of erection at Mountjoy, Dublin, in which we hope to concentrate the whole of our female convicts, and preserve, throughout the entire establishment, a proper course of prison discipline. In the meantime, we have endeavoured to relieve the country prisons to some extent by increasing the accommodation at Cork Depôt, which now holds 370 prisoners, notwithstanding which great and just complaints are still made by Boards of Superintendence and Inspectors of County Gaols of the improper location of convicts in their prisons, to the great and manifest detriment of discipline, order, and management. For this reason, as well as the time having arrived for carrying out the system of tickets of licence, we considered that arrangements were necessary by which the numbers of females in the depôts should be reduced, and the county gaols relieved from prisoners not properly belonging to them. To effect this, it is necessary that some provision should be made for the gradual absorption into the community of such convicts as would be entitled, under existing rules, to tickets of licence.

Great difficulties present themselves in the final disposal of female convicts. A man can obtain employment in various ways in out-door service, not requiring, in all cases, special reference to character, and at work which is not open to females in this country. A woman, immediately on discharge from prison, is totally deprived of any honest means of obtaining a livelihood. Persons of her own class will object to associate in labour with her, even if employers were willing to give her work; and the well conducted portion of the community object to receive into their families, as domestic servants, persons so circumstanced, without a stronger guarantee and proof of their real and permanent reformation than would be afforded by a prison character.

Refuges for female prisoners on discharge from prison, in which their good resolutions can be tested, and provision made for a continuance in virtue, are now established in different parts of the Continent, where transportation not having been used as a punishment, the reformed female convict returns to her place in society; and the community, after she has been subject to proper tests, is willing to receive her. We are convinced facilities must be afforded for the separation of the well-disposed from the evil-minded, and for turning the qualities of the former to a good account. This, we conceive, can only be done in this country in establishments so managed as to produce reformation of the inmates, and at the same time afford to society such assurance of that reformation as will be received with confidence by those who are likely to give them a means of earning their bread by honest industry. We believe that if the plan here proposed is carried out in its integrity, much will be done, not merely in the disposal of our convicts, but also in the diminution of crime generally in the country. In the treatment of criminals, when the primary object of punishment is accomplished, and reformation is presumed to be effected, the means are still required of testing that reformation, and of affording the former delinquents the necessary opportunity of showing their fitness to be restored to society.

In the Convict Dépôt, before the individual becomes eligible for a ticket of licence, the crime has been expiated, and reformation apparently effected; but that reformation has still to be tested, and the public mind must be satisfied and have complete confidence in the value of the test to which she is submitted. A Government institution would answer for a mere refuge, but not as a medium through which the individual will be re-established in society; for under any rules, it will be looked upon as a prison, and on the discharge of the inmates, the same difficulties will be felt as at present in our Convict Dépôts. For this reason, instead of increasing the existing Government prison establishments—a plan attended with much expense, delay, and difficulty—we proposed, in December last, to the Irish Government, that convicts whose conduct has been exemplary should be drafted into existing private charitable institutions willing to receive them, where the disposition of each inmate would be studied, and the certificate of character founded on that study, together with recommendation which would then be considered sufficiently satisfactory to obtain her employment; the prisoners, in all such institutions, should be under the general supervision and inspection of the Convict Directors. By this means accommodation would be left in the Government prisons for those now in the county gaols, the prisoners themselves much benefited, and better prepared for their ultimate release. In order to carry out this plan, a certain number of exemplary convicts should be selected from the Government prisons, at periods varying according to circumstances, previous to the time when in the usual course they would become eligible for discharge, and be sent to such private establishments, and not released therefrom under, at least, three months; and not then unless immediate and proper employment should offer, excepting, however, cases where prisoners become regularly entitled to their discharge, from having completed their sentence; and special cases to be determined upon by the Directors, and sanctioned by the Executive. Should, however, a prisoner misconduct herself, she would be liable to re-

Committal to the Convict Dépôt to undergo her original sentence. It is obviously most desirable to enlist public sympathy and interest in any scheme for the employment of discharged female prisoners; this object we consider will be best attained in the manner proposed. For the purpose of providing situations for the inmates, and so preventing their relapse into crime, we are given to understand that a number of benevolent ladies are willing to manage, gratuitously, a Société de Patronage, in connexion with the institution, such as has been found to work so well on the Continent, especially that established in 1837 by M. de Metz in Paris, in connexion with the great Prison of St. Lazare, and under the presidency of Madame de Lamartine, through which 700 females have passed, with scarcely a serious relapse. Of this institution, M. Béranger de la Drôme, Président à la Cour de Cassation à Paris, in his admirable work, "De la Répression Pénale," lately published, says:—"Près de 200 jeunes libérées sont aujourd'hui réunies dans une maison, située rue de Valenciennes, qui est dirigée par des sœurs religieuses, sous l'inspection des dames de la société. Lorsque ces jeunes filles sont suffisamment préparées et corrigées, ces dames les placent comme domestiques ou comme ouvrières dans des maisons choisies avec soin; elles leur servent alors de patronesses, les assistent de leur conseil, de leurs encouragements, et de leur maternelle surveillance. 700 jeunes filles environ après avoir passé par la maison de réforme, ont ainsi reçu au dehors, la destination à laquelle chacune d'elles était propre, et ont, à peu d'exceptions près, répondu, par l'honnêteté de leur vie, aux efforts qui avaient été faits pour les ramener au bien."

At Montpellier, from a similar institution, 360 prisoners have returned to their families, or been placed in situations, out of which number only six have fallen back into crime since 1847.

We have to express our conviction that the proposed arrangement is calculated to confer great advantages on the persons intended to be benefited, and on the public at large, by the results expected from it and experienced in other countries.

With respect to the medical department of the service, we find that our anticipations, as mentioned in our last Report, have been realized.

We stated that we had recommended alterations in the arrangements for the supply of medicines to the Dublin prisons, by which, in addition to the duties being more efficiently performed, a saving of public money in this item alone would be effected of from £150 to £200 a year.

We were not able to put the new system into force until the commencement of the financial year; and notwithstanding that a stock of medicines had to be provided, and other expenses incurred, contingent on the opening of the new surgeries, &c., the cost of these items to the Dublin prisons, for the nine months ending 31st December, 1855, has been not greater than the charge made to the same prisons by the apothecaries for medicines during the first three months of the year under the old system. On this subject the medical officer of Newgate and Smithfield observes:—"The new arrangements for the supply of medicines to those prisons, which came into operation in April last, has proved not only more economical, but more convenient and effective, than the former system. The economy resulting from it is strikingly exhibited by the fact, that the cost of the medicines used in the prisons, in the first three months of the year 1855, amounted to £37 10s. 10d. ; while that of those supplied during the remaining nine months, including the stock in hand, was only £32 6s. 6d."

The subject on which we have felt great anxiety, and to which we alluded as of the utmost importance in our last Report, is the employment of the well disposed convict on discharge ; for without we can further this, we cannot anticipate a satisfactory termination to the reformatory treatment we have endeavoured to institute in the prisons. It has now been decided that "Tickets of Licence" shall be issued to those prisoners eligible by character and length of imprisonment, and in carrying out these instructions we feel the very great responsibility which attaches to us. We know that the public look with alarm upon arrangements which they consider consist in turning loose upon the community men convicted in most instances of very serious crimes. We are aware how sceptical persons are of a reformation tested alone by prison surveillance, under a comparative absence of temptation ; that the press teems with outrages committed by "Ticket of Licence" men ; that the system is denounced by some of those administering the criminal justice of the country as an unmitigated evil ; but we do not hear the suggestion of a remedy. Our colonies will not (with the exception of Western Australia) receive our convicts ; there is, therefore, no alternative but that, for the most part, they must be discharged at home.

We have deeply considered this responsibility, and in recommending prisoners for tickets of licence, shall bear in mind the Lord Chancellor's intentions expressed in the House of Lords, in 1833, that it was not contemplated to turn a mass of unemployed convicts loose upon the country, but that means would be taken to assist them in procuring employment, and employing them in the interim. With this very intelligible principle as our guide, and considering, if necessary in England, it is doubly so in this country, we are endeavouring, as a preliminary step or stage to so important an undertaking, to collect prisoners eligible for discharge (from length of imprisonment and exemplary character), in certain establishments belonging to our service, and specially devoted to the purpose—at Smithfield, in Dublin, where those acquainted with trades, and the infirm of the selected class can be profitably occupied, and at Fort Camden, near the mouth of Cork Harbour, where the able-bodied of the same class can be employed on the fortifications. These establishments will act as filterers between the prisons and the community ; but to enable them to be really such, the system pursued in them must be of such a character as to test the reformation of the prisoner, and throw him more on himself ; hard work and coarse fare must be the rule, and in the evenings carefully selected lecturers may inculcate lessons of practical utility. It is important that these establishments should be as self-supporting as possible, the officers connected with them should be cognizant of some branch of industry, and give the public the benefit of their own labour—the prisoners may be employed in offices and avocations that could not be sanctioned in a prison, but, which, in this intermediate stage, would tend to engender self-respect. We believe that, by means of these establishments, we shall obtain a further insight into the prisoner's character through individualization, and thus be enabled to recommend the really deserving for tickets of licence. We consider that the community will have greater faith in such a test than they would in a character earned merely under prison discipline; but in recommending these intermediary establishments, we had a further view than the mere amelioration of the system of issuing tickets of licence; we considered that they would equally work for good towards the termination of penal servitude sentences; that they would tend to the solution of a very important question, "the treatment of our criminals;" that the good and evil can be thereby properly tested and separated—the former to be aided in the onward path of reformation, the latter, when discharged in the usual course at the expiration of their sentences, to be noted to the police of their district as requiring special supervision. This will not be a matter of such difficulty as may at first appear, the fact of not having passed through these establishments will be sufficient grounds for warning the police. Many, it is expected, will enter them in consequence of their exemplary prison character who, on being tested, will fail, and be returned to the establishments. Registers will be kept, and every aid given to further the efforts of these selected prisoners in obtaining employment at home and in the Colonies. A diminution of crimes (which is confined to fewer individuals than is generally supposed) must be the consequence; and what is of great importance, it will always place at the disposal of the Government a large number of prisoners, whose labour can be employed economically on public works, such as Harbours of Refuge, &c., who will require less supervision than ordinary prisoners, and who can be located in any accommodation that may be offered, instead of requiring special prison construction. We have commenced this system, and have every confidence in its success. We believe, if properly carried out, and extended with the assistance of the police and constabulary, it will, through the two important channels of directing and preventing, be made the means of exercising an influence over the criminal population generally, which cannot well be too highly appreciated.

The iron prison, erected at Spike in the year 1851, which was found very unsuitable for the purpose intended, owing to the great and sudden changes of temperature to which it was liable, its great heat in summer, and extreme cold in winter, and also from the dampness caused by the condensation of the breath of the inmates on the walls in cold weather, has been lined with a thin sheeting of wood covered with iron, leaving a clear space between this and the outer walls, through which a free current of air always passes. By this means the temperature has been equalized, and the experience of the past winter has proved the building to be, as described by the Governor of the prison, "both strong and comfortable."

We attach considerable importance to this result, as it proves that similar buildings which may be readily erected at any time, in the course of about a couple of months, can, at a comparatively small expense, be made available for the reception of convicts on the site of any public works, the execution of which, by means of their labour, may be determined on.

We are of opinion that the employment of convicts, selected on account of their general good character, &c., in small bodies on public works in various localities, under circumstances of exposure to the ordinary temptations and trials of the world, when the reality and sincerity of their reformation may be fairly and publicly tested, will present the most favourable chances for their gradual absorption into the body of the community. The public feeling is too general that all convicts are alike, and they are judged by the standard of the lowest and most degraded. Such being the case, it is not to be wondered at that all respectable classes shrink from contact with them on their release from prison, as indeed they may well do, so long as they have a "prison character" only to refer to, earned under a strict discipline, surveillance, and restraint. It is, doubtless, an established fact, that many of the worst and most hopeless criminals will behave well under such circumstances, and will consequently obtain on discharge good "prison character;" therefore, what guarantee can any one have, that in giving employment to a released convict, he is not harbouring a depraved and irreclaimable criminal, if he has no means beyond this "prison character" of learning anything of him. It is well known to all who are acquainted with the class to be found in our Convict Prisons, that they present every description and shade of character, and very various degrees of guilt, crime, and depravity; that many of the inmates have fallen from weakness, distress, and force of circumstances, rather than from innate and absolute natural vice; some are more hardened by a longer career in vice and crime, though still not destitute of all proper feelings, nor without some good ground for hope of their ultimate sincere repentance and permanent reformation; while others, it must be admitted, are, humanly speaking, altogether vicious, almost dead to any good impressions, and hopelessly irreclaimable, but this last class is comparatively small. We hope, by means of a careful selection of convicts, according to their general as well as "prison character," by their employment in small bodies in various localities, comparatively as freemen (though under surveillance), that the public will gradually become convinced of the difference to which we have alluded, that many of these men are not utterly irreclaimable; and that by degrees they will become willing to extend a helping hand to such as may really prove themselves deserving of their aid and encouragement.

We believe that a general desire is felt by the community at large to aid in the restoration of these fallen members of society, though all, or nearly all, shrink from personal contact with them; however, when they become convinced that a careful discrimination has been exercised in the selection of the convicts to be employed in the manner indicated—that there are some of whose real and sincere refor-that good hopes have been formed—and when they knew that such reformation has been further thoroughly and publicly tested, we hope to find that this class of convicts at least will be no longer shunned as hopeless outcasts. If means cannot be devised to induce the community to hold out a helping hand to re-establish the reformed criminal, all schemes for their improvement and reformation within the prisons, however ably devised, however zealously carried out, must be comparatively fruitless.

At Fort Camden, situated at the entrance to Cork Harbour, where there is a branch of the Spike Island Prison, we have placed a party of selected convicts who are now employed, as nearly as circumstances will admit, in the manner which we suggest they should be on public works in various localities, on or shortly previous to their discharge or licence, or otherwise. This locality, although the best which we can at present command, is not altogether suitable for the objects which we have in view, inasmuch as being in a comparatively remote position, the convicts subjected to this probation are not thrown into the world as much as we could wish, and therefore are not placed under circumstances which present sufficient trials to afford altogether satisfactory tests of the extent to which confidence may be placed in their future good conduct, and the reality and stability of their reformation; but their employment here will afford opportunities of testing, in a considerable degree, their good intentions, and of judging their fitness to be trusted under circumstances presenting all the temptations of ordinary life. We propose, therefore, even when we obtain works more suitable for the objects we have in view, to draft the selected convicts from Spike Island to this post in the first instance before trusting them under circumstances of great exposure, which will enable us the better to sift the really deserving from those who do not give much fair promise.

The works which will be required at Lusk Common, preparatory to its occupation as a juvenile penal reformatory, for which purpose we hope it will be shortly appropriated, will present one good field for the further trial of the scheme proposed. Here selected convicts employed on the works will be more thrown in the haunts of man, and the sincerity of their reformation and good intentions will be fully, fairly, and publicly tested.

The convicts thus selected will, of course, be compelled to work, at least, the ordinary hours required of free labourers; and we expect that their labour will more than cover the cost of their maintenance and supervision.

Schooling and general instruction will be confined to the evenings, during the same hours which they might, if free, devote to similar purposes.

We trust that other public works may be found on which the labour of this class of convicts may be profitably employed.

Selected convicts have as yet been tried to a very limited extent; but so far as they have been placed under less than the ordinary restraints of the prison discipline, as at Fort Camden, and in the boat service of the prison, &c., their conduct has been almost uniformly unexceptionable, which, at least, gives encouragement for their being further tried.

The ticket-of-licence system has not as yet been brought into actual operation in this country; so large a number of convicts having remained in the various prisons who, according to the present state of the law, might be considered as entitled to their free discharge, on the ground having served with good conduct the full period under a state of penal servitude established in lieu of their respective sentences of transportation, that it has not heretofore been deemed safe or expedient to add to this number by discharging still more on tickets-of-licence. This class of convicts had accumulated in this country to an extent quite unknown in England, owing partly to the want of system which existed formerly in the selection of convicts for deportation, and partly from their physical unfitness for transportation, which, until lately, existed among so large a portion of the Irish Convicts. Subsequent to the appointment of the Commission of Convict Inquiry in 1853, (that is, since 20th April, 1854, when prisoners, who had more than completed the proper equivalents of their sentences of transportation, were first discharged), there have been 920 released. The class of prisoners who have served over the period of penal servitude established by law, as the equivalent for their sentences of transportation, has been disposed of, and it has become necessary that the system of release on licence should now be brought into operation, which we believe, with due care, may be commenced without giving rise to any serious evils to society.

We foresee that a great difficulty will arise in the disposal of convicts sent home from Bermuda, from time to time in large numbers, with a view to being discharged on tickets-of-licence; we cannot feel justified in pursuing any different course, with regard to recommending them for this indulgence, than what we follow in our own prisons, under the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant. The conduct of several of these prisoners on their passage home, and since their arrival in this country, appears to render them fitter subjects for a course of separate imprisonment, than discharge on licence. We trust that in future, only those whose conduct throughout their imprisonment warrants such an indulgence, will be sent home with that view.

The Reports and labors of the Directors are well known to our readers, and to all who feel interested in their work we feel sure that the Report now before us will prove most cheering and satisfactory. We would, however, suggest, that in all future Reports the Chaplains of each Prison should be required to give tabulated returns of the religious knowledge possessed by each prisoner on his admission; excellent forms for this purpose can be found in any one of the Rev. Mr. Clay's Reports on the Preston House of Correction. The Doctor tabulates his returns, so the school-master, so the Governor, yet the most important of all the returns is that of the Chaplain. All who are acquainted with the subject of Prison Discipline, know that the Chaplain's Report is that to which the informed reader first turns, and finding it but a record of the Chaplain's opinions, unsupported by facts, he is unable to form any useful opinion on its merit or its weight.

---

Our present QUARTERLY RECORD is one of quotation, rather than of suggestion or of argument; but in fact there is little new matter to record, as the publications of Reformatory School Reports are annual, and this is not the season of their issue.

We have had, however, during the three last weeks of May, ample opportunities of personally investigating the condition of the chief Reformatories of France, England, and Scotland, and we have no hesitation in declaring that the PRINCIPLE was never more fully proved than now.

Doubtless, Sir Stafford Northcote's Bill, when debated in the House of Commons, did develope some most extraordinary ideas: we had the mingled satisfaction and dissatisfaction to hear that debate, and a more woful exhibition, in many respects, we never witnessed. Every body talked, it was just like the Dublin Corporation Debate on the Irish Reformatory Bill, and those who knew least talked, as we say, "the bouldest."

We do not object to all joining in a discussion on this subject, but we do object to a course of argument which hands over, in England, the whole management of these Institutions to Government. Why should Mr. Baker, Mr. Adderley, Miss Carpenter, Mr. Wright, and the Abbot of Mount St. Bernard, give up the results of time, thought, devotion, anxiety and zeal, because 5s. or 7s. per head may be paid for each juvenile committed to their schools; yet this is a very pressing danger, because our over zealous, and not over well informed friends, confound Government Inspection with Government Management.

There is, however, one Society to which we look, confidently and fearlessly, for a full, honest, and enlightened support of all the true phases of this Reformatory Principle—The National Reformatory Union. What the Union is ; how, why, and whence it sprung, the readers of our last RECORD know, and in every week of the quarter we now record, it has been more than steadfast to its principles.

In our last RECORD we gave a detailed history of the rise, progress, and position of the Smithfield Institution for Exemplary Prisoners, and in our present RECORD we place before the reader the opinions expressed by the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, on the most important points of Gradual Liberation, Patrimage Societies, and Tickets-of-leave. We are happy, most happy, to find that our Prison Authorities have met the vast difficulties of these questions ; we have before us letters from six of the most distinguished writers on Prison Discipline in England, men not less esteemed for zeal than for good sense, and all declare that in Ireland the best and safest means to secure, and complete, Reformation have been adopted.

Let us now have a Reformatory School Bill for Ireland, protecting the faith of our "City Arabs," and we shall have no more most just complaints that Ragged Schools in Ireland are but the seed-plots of proselytism. Neither Dr. Cullen, nor one who has written in The Freeman's Journal, under the signature "Tennis," expresses an opinion too strong or too indignant upon this topic : their facts are facts, and they furnish arguments of a most convincing kind, to drive the Chief Secretary into the abandonment of his proposed Reformatory Bill for Ireland. We consider that the Irish members of Parliament are bound to place the true phases of Irish opinion on these points before the House ; we know that nothing can be expected to arise from this task, save the approbation of the few who study the question ; but if such wild statements as were placed upon the minute books of the Commons by the Hon. Member for Mayo, "that Ireland does not need a Reformatory Act," be taken as the exposition of Irish opinion, all will go wrong. Mr. Maguire has taken considerable pains to obtain a fair Reformatory Bill for Scotland; Mr. Stephen De Vere is a member of the National Reformatory Union—why should not each turn his labours to the advantage of his own country, and to secure the faith of each Irish juvenile criminal?

From The Philanthropist of June 1st, we take the following:—

SHIP REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

Some very useful suggestions on the propriety of establishing Ship Reformatory Schools have been communicated to the National Reformatory Union by Mr. Frederick Nelson Watkins, sheriff's officer, Bristol. After speaking hopefully of the efforts made by philanthropists, the writer says:—

I beg respectfully to suggest the adoption of Ship Reformatory Schools, being firmly of opinion that such schools, if established at each of the principal sea-port towns, would confer a greater benefit upon the class for whom they are intended than any other yet proposed.

The trades now taught on land could be taught on shipboard—tailoring, shoemaking, matmaking, sailmaking, &c., &c.; and thus while the scholars receive a proper education and learning a trade, he may also have the advantage of becoming a good sailor.

Take a given number of boys, from twelve to sixteen years of age, on shipboard, with kind and proper treatment; let them be well instructed in the use of the ropes and boat exercise for two hours daily, and they will be found, after twelve months' training, fit, and able to serve in the Royal Navy, or the merchant and coasting trade, and would be readily received by master mariners. By these means they would have a much better opportunity of becoming independent and earning an honest living, than by any other.

The sailor finds a home in every country and clime, and under every flag. There is no calling that can possibly be given to boys with greater advantage; none so easily obtained, and with the addition of some other useful trade or calling, these unfortunate lads may become useful members of society at home, or, as emigrants, they would become valuable acquisitions to our colonies, instead of being marked down by the police and others, as many are stated to be at the present moment.

When boys leave the Reformatory Schools, as shoemakers, tailors, or labourers only, they may probably have great difficulty in obtaining immediate employment, even in the parish where they are known—a village may support two or three shoemakers and the same number of tailors—then many are sent adrift, and may very possibly be tempted to return to that high road of crime for subsistence, from which it had been fondly hoped the Reformatory School had effectually withdrawn them; or, it may be, that, taking a more favourable view of the case, they may be compelled to resort to the parish work-houses for relief, where, be it observed, seamen are never burthensome.

“But there is a continual demand for sailors, while a great number of boys would prefer that calling to any other. Had any of the ticket-of-leave men been brought up to the sea, they would no doubt most willingly have gone from port to port, and, though penniless, could have worked a passage—as such a privilege is seldom if ever refused by one sailor to another—and thus obtained a livelihood, instead of being driven to those hardships and crimes as described by them at the meeting called by Mr. Henry Mayhew.

In most seaport towns there are a very great number of poor unfortunate boys, who have neither home nor friends to advise or protect them, and, having no knowledge of marine pursuits, cannot get a vessel; for this reason it is very desirable that the admission to the Ship School should not be confined to convicted children alone, but extended to such destitute boys as may be desirous to learn the maritime art. It is notorious that if a boy run away from an inland town, he immediately seeks the seaport in the hope of obtaining a vessel; on his arrival, having none to recommend him, he fails in his object, falls a prey to hunger, and then to theft. I have known of many who have been so situated, and of others, who by stowing themselves away in outward-bound vessels, or by the means of friends, have been more fortunate, but never knew one who afterwards came to crime or want; on the contrary, in several instances they have not only done well for themselves, but have been enabled to give assistance to their parents when needed.

The Government and country would realise great saving by the adoption of the Ship Schools, when compared with the expenditure attending apprehensions, conviction upon conviction, &c., and afterwards sending the convict upon the world ten times deeper stained in guilt, deprived of every means of supporting his existence except by dishonest practices.

Having been a public officer for twenty-five years, a large number of thieves, guilty of almost every crime, have, during that period, been apprehended by me; yet of this number not more than three or four were sailors.

The letter then gives some statistics on this question, and goes on to say:

This report shows very much in favour of training boys to the seas; and more particularly so when taken into consideration that some of these prisoners may have described themselves as mariners, although merely boatmen—a class of men very numerous in Bristol. One of the old Government hulks would be well suited for the purposes of the school, which could be managed principally by pensioners under the direction of a small committee, and conducted on total abstinence principles.

It is distressing to witness the number of unfortunate lads wandering about the quays of Bristol during the winter months, in a state bordering on starvation, without shoe or stocking, or rags sufficient to cover them; seeking shelter under some warehouse doorway, or huddled together on the lee side of a building, while waiting their opportunity to pilfer any article whereby they may be enabled to appease the cravings of hunger. They know no other way to prolong their miserable existence, and if apprehended and convicted, the shelter of the prison is preferable to the open shed by day and the limekiln by night. Is it not here, then, that the work of reformation should begin, not by an imposition of the silent system, but rather by teaching the boy how he may live honestly, and furnishing him with the means of leaving his old haunts of vice and misery? Other nations have made convict labour profitable, but in this country the experiment has not been tried.

The idea of ship Reformatory Schools is not a new one. It has been acted on in Liverpool. Mr. James Brougham has communicated a letter to the National Reformatory Union, in which he states, "Mr. Watkins appears to be ignorant of the fact that in Liverpool such an establishment already exists in the School Frigate "Akbar," certified as a Reformatory within the meaning of the Act, 17 & 18 Vic. c. 86."

As one of the secretaries of that institution, I would wish, through your Journal, to give such of your readers as are interested in these matters some information as to the progress we have already made in our Reformatory School Ship.

In July last the Lords of the Admiralty placed at the disposal of the Liverpool Juvenile Reformatory Association the Akbar Hulk until she should again be required for her Majesty's service. The committee immediately proceeded to have her fitted up for the reception of boys, and also had her rigged in such a way as to enable them thoroughly to teach the boys their duties as seamen; and in all our arrangements the man-of-war system and discipline, modified and adapted to a School Ship, has as much as possible been kept in view.

The ship is moored in the middle of the great float at Birkenhead—a large sheet of water. Our staff consists of a superintendent, schoolmaster, boatswain, cook, carpenter, and three seamen. About three months ago the first two boys were received on board, and we have been gradually increasing our number until we have now forty-three boys.

Our arrangements at present are for 152 boys, who are to be divided into two divisions—the port and starboard watch—each watch being divided into five subdivisions, viz :—

Forecastle, containing	14	boys.
Foretopmen	14	"
Maintopmen	14	"
Mizentopmen	14	"
Afterguard	20	"

Each subdivision has a captain selected for conduct and ability from among the leading and most trustworthy boys; and each subdivision sleep, mess, and are instructed and employed in the duties of the ship together, so as to form a separate little company or family in itself. Their nautical exercises are reefing and furling topsails, reefing and unreefing running gear, knotting and splicing, sailmaking, heaving the lead, rowing in the boats, &c. At present we have one jolly boat and two cutters, one pulling ten and the other eight oars. During their play-hours the boys have books to read, a music class, mending clothes, &c., and they amuse themselves with a variety of games. It is during these times that new boys begin going aloft, and by degrees gain confidence, no boy being obliged to go aloft until he has perfect confidence.

From an almost daily experience of the working of this School Ship, I have a firm persuasion that it is admirably adapted for the reformation of juvenile criminals; an idea, however, seems to prevail in some quarters that they may be established and carried on at a much less cost than Land Reformatories. Now, it will be found that when a hulk has been granted, it is a mere shell, and a considerable sum is required to be expended in fitting her up for the reception of boys—masts, rigging, sails, boats, &c., have to be provided, not only that the boys may have variety of occupation, but to teach them thoroughly their duties as seamen. A large staff of superintendence is also requisite, because of the limited space in which a large number of boys are confined, making the friction on board ship so much greater than in a farm school, where boys can be sent out into the fields to work.

While there are some difficulties peculiar to itself in carrying on such an institution, there are also many advantages, especially in the variety and nature of the instructions being such as have a great interest and charm to boys. A strict discipline and methodical arrangement are also necessary for the well being of such an institution; this may be rather irksome at first to some of the boys, but the good effects of it are very speedily seen, more especially in those accustomed to a vagrant life. The boys all appear healthy, happy, and cheerful; they are dressed as seamen, in blue pilot trousers, with "Akbar" embroidered on the breasts of their blue serge shirts. We have boys on board from different parts of the country; and our wish is to make an exchange of Liverpool boys with as many other Reformatories as possible, so as to avoid as much as we can too many boys from the same locality getting together; and we have a very confident hope that we shall shortly turn out some very valuable, honest, and efficient seamen.

Other letters have been communicated to the National Reformatory Union on this interesting subject, some of which have appeared in The Law Amendment Journal. Now the question is fairly mooted, and is drawing the consideration of practical philanthropists, it will, no doubt, issue into useful results.

A meeting was held in London on the 29th of May, at the rooms of the Society for Promoting the Amendment of the Law, Lord Lovaine in the Chair, for the purpose of presenting an address to M. Demetz on the occasion of his visit to England. The meeting was not a formal one, as the health of the noble-hearted Frenchman was too delicate to permit his joining in any very fatiguing business, but he attended, accompanied by M. Paul Verdier, and was most warmly received. In reply to a series of questions, M. Demetz gave the results of his experience in the management of Mettray, and entered at some length into the consideration of the topics, Teachers, Schools, Patronage Societies, and Punishments. On the latter topic M. Demetz's opinion may be shortly expressed in these words, Many Rewards Make Few Punishments.

It was most satisfactory to see persons of all religions present at this meeting; it was open to all; one of the chief rules of the National Reformatory Union, (the promoters of the meeting) being, that all creeds may join in the work of Reformation. Indeed to contend for any other principle is simply nonsense, when Roman Catholics and Unitarians are amongst the most zealous and successful advocates of the principle of Reformation. It is to judge not by our own light, but by our own twilight; it is to adopt the Christianity of the Sunday School scholar, who thought that the happiness of Heaven would consist in "singin' the praises of the Lord, an' lookin' at the bad 'uns aburnin'." It exposes a Society to the absurdity of asking a Jew Lord Mayor to preside at a meeting to collect funds for Schools, of which funds his School, were he to found one, could not claim one farthing; a piece of folly which, by a slight change, Tennyson's lines aptly describe—

"But the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt Religion feels,
And the godly do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels."

We beg attention to the following letter:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PHILANTHROPIST.

MY DEAR SIR,—I can hardly wonder that some persons who have looked—only very superficially—at the question between the two Reformatory Unions, should be hastily disposed to take it for granted, that as we objected to the introduction of the words, "the teaching of the Holy Scriptures," we might also object to the fact of teaching them.

Yet surely, any people who remain long in this error must be very determined to refuse all evidence contrary to their first impressions. So far as I remember, even amongst all of us who were driven to opposing the words, there was hardly one who did not, at the very time, maintain that the teaching of religion, as based upon a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, must be the foundation of all true reformation.

So far there was, in fact, no difference of opinion between us. Why, then, it may be asked, did we separate? Simply because, though there was in reality no questions on the teaching of the Scripture, there was a question whether we should aid the Roman Catholics in their endeavours to reform the erring of their own persuasion.

Many of us thought that it would be right to aid their endeavours, others thought it would be wrong to do so. The words upon which the division took place were believed to be introduced for the purpose of excluding Roman Catholics; and, after much discussion, one of the committee, who had framed the rules, fairly allowed that they had been introduced for that purpose.

Ask me not why a resolution "that the Holy Scriptures should be taught," should offend or exclude any Christian. That is no affair of mine. Suffice it that the proneness of man to take offence and quarrel with his neighbour, has somehow converted these words into a party watchword, and a lapis offensionis.

Now, had the question been, "whether in each school the managers and masters should teach the Bible to the best of their ability," I will venture to say, not only that every one would have agreed, but that I do not believe that any manager of our English Reformatory Schools, then present or absent, would have accepted the charge of a school on any other terms. I believe that I am tolerably intimately acquainted with nearly all who did vote or (a far larger number) who would have voted with us on that occasion; and I think I will undertake to say, that not one of them would have accepted the charge of any school in which the Bible was not taught.

It was only to the use of the words, as a party watchword (supposed to be so by several of us, and honestly admitted to be so used by one of those who drew up the rule), that any objection was made; and though, perhaps, it was hardly quite fair to frame the resolution in such a way as to compel us to object to what would primâ facie appear not only unobjectionable, but of the highest importance; yet, on the other hand, we must be thankful for the candid allowance that the question really at issue was, whether we should or should not afford help to Roman Catholics endeavouring to reform the criminal children of their own Church.

I remain, dear Sir, faithfully yours,

T. B. LI. BAKER.

Hardwicke-court, Gloucester,

April 26, 1856.

Patronage Societies are now very well known to all readers of our Records, but we think it right to insert here some portion of the report of the meeting held in Birmingham last April, to form a local establishment for the relief and employment of Discharged Criminals:—

The Recorder moved the adoption of the report. One fact, he said, gave at the outset a hope of stability and an expectation of ultimate success. The promoters of the plan were the three principal officers of the Gaol. This fact of itself would be an answer by anticipation to all fears that the ex-prisoners would be treated in a spirit of romantic sentiment, or that extravagant expectations would be entertained as to their future well doing. To the Governor, the Chaplain, and the Surgeon, the prisoner must be thoroughly known. They look upon him as he is, appreciating him at his just value, whatever that may be. They know that his reformation is a work of labour and of difficulty; they know that to retain him when at liberty in the good resolutions which he may have formed while in confinement, is a work of even greater difficulty, but they know also that though difficult it is not in the majority of instances impossible. [Hear.] So that while on the one hand they are protected by their experience from over sanguine expectations, on the other hand they are preserved from the worse danger of falling into scepticism as to the possibility of criminals becoming permanently reformed, a prejudice which has for so many years impeded those Christian labours which cannot be omitted without neglecting one of the most imperative duties enjoined by the founder of our religion. We have been receiving some humiliating but most wholesome lessons. We have been awakening to the truth that we are not quite so superior in every particular to all the world as we had fondly imagined. Whether we look upon ourselves as warriors, manufacturers, or philanthropists, we find that we have not monopolised all the virtue and sagacity of mankind, and imprisoned it within the narrow limits of our island. What we are met this evening to establish has been long in operation in many other countries, both in Europe and in America. As regards the working of these establishments, the results, so far as he had been enabled to acquaint himself with them, were encouraging in the very highest degree. It was a natural objection to arise in the mind of any thoughtful person, having no practical acquaintance with the class whose interests they were contemplating, that whatever advantages the benevolent furnished to the discharged prisoner would operate, if not as an incentive to crime, at all events to weaken the deterrent force of example. But those who, like the valuable officers to whom the meeting owed the proposal to establish the Institution, were practically acquainted with the habits and modes of thought prevalent among the criminal class, knew perfectly well that they were the creatures of impulse: and these gentlemen would smile at the notion of the prisoners having taken up crime on a calculation of profit and loss. The criminal knows just as well as we do, that criminal courses must ultimately bring him into a state of misery, which, if he could feel that he would to a certainty be plunged into it immediately on committing an offence, might have a strongly deterrent effect upon him, but that suffering being in the future, and uncertain as to its date, although certain enough to fall upon him sooner or later, the terror of punishment produces little impression on his frivolous and unreflecting mind, and that little quickly passes away. We must all plead guilty to giving the present moment and the present life too much weight in the government of our actions, but the criminal is emphatically the slave of his immediate desires, and his future lot no more troubles him than if it were the lot of another individual. And hence it was that he, (the Recorder,) could appeal with the most perfect confidence to those who thoroughly knew the criminal class, to support him in pronouncing fallacious arguments, however plausible, which had been directed to show that amelioration in the condition of a criminal which he reaches through his endeavours to amend his conduct, have had the effect of inducing men, women, or even children, to become criminals themselves. If there were any exceptions to this rule (and he knew of none) they would be found on examination to be only apparent exceptions, and to be caused by some great error in the application of the bounty of the benevolent. Doubtless mischief would be wrought by pampering the appetites of criminals, or by any other ill considered indulgence of their failings. But the practical officers of the Gaol were not likely to commit such a mistake. And after all, though he had spoken of bounty, the principal requisites for success must not be sought in extensive pecuniary means. It was kindness under the guidance of sober sense, but nevertheless ardent and unclouded, which was the first want of the outcast—that Christian superintendence which may lead the poor creature to feel that he has some friend to whom he can look up with respect and gratitude, that some one whose encouragement is a favour and a blessing cares for him, will be made happy by his welfare, and will suffer pain and mortification if he should relapse into crime. Here then the wanderer would find a guide, here he may ask advice, which will not be given in pride, or in that species of condescension which is only pride under a mask easily penetrated. On the contrary, his friend will speak with him as fellow man to fellow man, as Christian to Christian, as sinner to sinner. But the aid will not be confined to words; if it were, indeed the criminal who by experience of his former associates and by the lessons of his youth is suspicious, would believe he was the object of nothing more than lip-sympathy and ostentatious professions. Nevertheless, the aid afforded must as little as possible consist in furnishing him with money or money's worth. It should mainly consist in taking pains to find the prisoner a home and honest employment, thus bringing him back to his place in society, and giving him another chance of enrolling himself among the honest portion of mankind. He would now, he said, call their attention to what had been done on the continent. The French had many years ago founded Institutions similar in their objects to that which this meeting was assembled to establish. These they call Sociétés de Patronage, which were now in action all over France, but, as might be expected, more especially in Paris, whence they had their origin. He was enabled by personal examination, by reading reports of these institutions, and by the information he had obtained from his friend M. Demets, to assure himself that the results were highly satisfactory. During a tour in Italy which he made four years ago, he found similar Institutions in Florence and other parts of Tuscany. They were working well and were giving perfect satisfaction to those who employed their time and money in establishing them. He had obtained documentary evidence of their success, and he had also been favoured with a personal interview with one of the ministers of the Tuscan Government, who was at the head of these Societies, which are nevertheless voluntary Institutions.

In Bavaria, the whole kingdom is reticulated, so to speak, with Patronage Societies; a principal establishment in each province, with sub-societies in each district. By the Bavarian law, every prisoner is sent on his discharge (not simply directed to go, but conveyed, as it were) to his parish, which takes charge of him until the Societies can find him employment. In cases where the Directors think that further probation is desirable, the ex-prisoner is sent to a Refuge for a time by way of fitting him more completely for being placed out to work. The meeting might rely on this information, as he obtained it through Sir John Milbanke, our envoy at Munich, who was so kind as to transmit the Recorder's questions on the subject to the Bavarian Minister of the Interior, with a request that he would obtain answers, by which means much valuable information connected with the prisons of Bavaria came into the Recorder's possession. It was to be observed that in every case of success the voluntary principle was adopted, and very sedulously observed, even under despotic governments. And as regarded the United States of America, the voluntary principle was, as might be expected, in flourishing action, with results corresponding to the hopes of those who were cognizant of its marvellous efficacy. In all the countries to which he had referred, those two things, the voluntary principle, and success, were found co-existent. But in Austria, where such societies had been established by the government, success was wanting, and the same government which had set them up, found itself obliged to let them fall. (Hear.) In our own country, we have not hitherto done much; but a most valuable commencement was made many years ago. The society to which he referred was established by Mrs. Fry, and its operation, he believed, was limited to female prisoners, and to those who had been committed to Newgate. From his own experience he could testify to the value of their labours. Nineteen years ago, the society recommended to his service, as nurse, a young woman who had been convicted of a serious theft. His wife made very careful enquiry respecting her conduct, both before and after her offence; and they paused for some time before they ventured on the step of taking her into their household. But eventually she was not only received, but an infant, in very delicate health, was committed to her care, by day and by night. It was thought necessary to place her under somewhat severe restrictions, to which she submitted without a murmur. He was able to state that the experiment was quite successful. A more tender and watchful nurse, or a more faithful domestic, it had never been his fortune to engage. The meeting would be glad to learn, that, after a long probation, she rejoined her husband, and although the Recorder's family remained in communication with her for years, they had no reason even to suspect that she forfeited, or deserved to forfeit, the position which she had thus regained. (Hear ) Similar societies had been formed at Bath and Worcester, both of which he believed had been productive of great good, although he could not speak of them with particularity ; and there were other associations with which, however, he was too slightly acquainted to be able to speak at all. Referring to the suggestion which had fallen from the Mayor, that their operations should be at first withdrawn from the public eye, the Recorder said he did not see how they could make even a beginning without the aid of the press, as not only would they require the public sympathy to obtain the requisite funds,—for some money they should want, though not so much as at first sight appear necessary ; but they must impress the minds, and awaken the kind feelings of employers, or they would be unable to obtain places for their wards. And in addition to the consent of employers, it would be necessary to gain the co-operation of working men, who very naturally felt disinclined to admit the discharged prisoner into their body. Some had thought this objection insuperable, but he who for seventeen years had witnessed, not without admiration, the willingness of that class to receive back prisoners who had wronged them into their houses, when he, (the Recorder,) felt himself able to remit the punishment which the convict had incurred, and could deliver him up to these kind hearted persons, had no such fears. If injured parties showed so much of charity and longsuffering, he could not believe that the body of which they were members would refuse to lend a helping hand to a fallen brother, on that reasonable assurance, which would be given to them ; that extreme care would be taken to guard against the privilege being abused which they were asked to concede to him. He desired to take this opportunity of impressing on every one who might read the proceedings of the evening, that those whose pecuniary means did not admit of their joining the society, might nevertheless be of essential utility by communicating with the agent who would be employed, as to opportunities for setting the prisoners to work ; and he would add, that the humblest and the poorest honest man or woman, had in that honesty, and the character which it gave to them, a treasure which enabled them to confer a precious boon upon the outcast. They could give him kind words of consolation and advice. They might let him feel the gratification of knowing that he had a friend, who would not scorn or reproach him, and yet who would not lead him into temptation, but as far as possible protect him from it. The Recorder then adverted to the eminent services of Thomas Wright, of Manchester. This exemplary man was the father of a very large family of children ; the Recorder was afraid to mention the number. He had heard it amounted to nineteen. His circumstances in life were far from opulent. He was the foreman of a foundry. Many years ago he was led to visit the prison at Salford, the adjoining borough. Sunday being his day of leisure, was the time chosen, and without neglecting his own religious duties, or the care of his family, he spent hours every Sunday with the captives. He thus acquired an intimate knowledge of the character of each prisoner ; and on their discharge, he exerted himself with untiring energy, and with eminent success, to obtain places of work for such as he considered hopeful. Sometimes he was obliged to become surety for the good conduct of his protégé; but he represents himself to have lost but little money by incurring this obligation. The number of his fellow creatures, whom he has permanently rescued, amounts to several hundreds. [Hear.] The people of Manchester, wealthy and generous, have raised a sum adequate to provide for the maintenance of this good man for the remainder of his life, and have withdrawn him from the foundry, thus bestowing upon him the most acceptable reward they could have offered—the power of devoting his whole time to his noble mission.

The Recorder spoke also of Sarah Martin, the poor dress maker of Yarmouth, who began her labours early in the present century. Feeling a strong desire to be of use to the prisoners in the gaol of her native town, she was urgent in her entreaties to be admitted to them. But so little was this form of charity understood or appreciated, and so obscure was her social position, that it was not until after the lapse of a considerable period that she accomplished her object of being permitted to enter the gaol. She, like Thomas Wright, gave up her Sundays to the task of teaching and exhorting the inmates. By great self denial, she managed so to eke out the little pittance earned by her labours as, after fulfilling the duty of providing for the wants of her grandmother, to be able to pass a whole week day in addition to the Sunday with the prisoners. Like Mr. Wright, though not to the same extent, she employed herself in obtaining occupation for the discharged. Her strong and pure spirit was lodged in a frail tenement, and the middle of life was scarcely reached before she died, worn out with her labor of love. (Hear.)

Mr. Joseph Sturge seconded the motion. He could appeal, he said, to the experience of gentlemen in that room, that many of those who broke the laws of their country were more to be pitied than condemned. [Hear.] How many of those he addressed could dare to say that if they had been placed in similar circumstances, they would not have given way to temptation? He believed there would be no difficulty in raising money. The chief difficulty would be to find persons who would be willing to do as the Recorder had done—trust a convicted thief with the care of either child or property.

A motion enlarging the committee was proposed by Mr. Barlow, seconded by Mr. RATCLIFFE, and supported by the Rev. Mr. Burt. The latter remarked, that he could not have sustained the moral pressure of acting as chaplain, and seeing men, women and children, turned adrift into the town, from the gaol, had it not been for the hope of seeing steps taken for establishing a permanent system of relief. The plan which he ventured to recommend was not to establish a large institution for all the prisoners requiring assistance, but to engage single lodgings for them in the cottages of poor persons of good character. If it was found necessary, a few small houses might be rented, and re-let to respectable tenants, who would receive the parties sent to them. The prisoner might in some cases be allowed to occupy the lodgings without payment for a few days, while he sought for employment; but as soon as he procured work, he would be required to pay a fair rent. Upon this plan there would be as little deviation as possible from the accustomed social condition of the persons relieved; and he believed it to be a safe rule, in all charitable efforts, that the less we depart from the ordinary arrangements of society, the greater amount of good we accomplish. He would not hold out the hope of doing much by the proposed measure, but he had no doubt that some little might be done, and however little we can effect, it was our duty to do what we can. He felt that to teach a man religion in prison, and to tell him to be honest, and then to send him out into the world under circumstances in which it was morally impossible for him to earn an honest livelihood, was mocking him.

The Belvidere Crescent Reformatory and Ragged Factory, managed by Mr. Driver, has been frequently referred to in this Review, and a friend who visited it the day after the Rejoicings for Peace, thus writes to us of it:—

London, June 2nd, 1856.

I visited Mr. Driver's Reformatory on Friday, and found it, and him, all I had expected. He has now twenty boys at work, making paper boxes for the various shops who use these articles, and he sells about fifty pounds worth per month. He is a most long-headed, energetic man, and pounces on his work and does it, and in all he is more than aided by his wife.

"I am sometimes here for hours, alone with the boys," said she, "and we get along quite well. I have seldom to punish them, and my chief terror for them is sending some body, very bad, to bed."

Fancy a quiet mannered, young, and slightly formed woman, managing twenty City Arabs, the hall door being on the latch, and the whole world of St. Giles's or the New Cut within musket shot.

"But," she added, "they are very fond of my baby, and I think he gives me some power over them. I sometimes have to wash his face six times in the day, they kiss him so; and if they get him at meals time they try to make him taste what they have before them, and occasionally they deluge him with coffee, poor little chap!"

"How did you manage about the fire works last night," said I; "oh!" she replied, "we had a large van, and we went off all through the chief streets; I sat at the door and Mr. Driver sat at the top of the van, and we went everywhere, and the boys were as good as any boys, any where could be; the oddest thing of all was that one boy slept all the way from Hungerford till we got home at one o'clock."

Mr. Driver shewed me the entire system of works, but his specimens are capital, and his management of the boys wonderful; he is the Arnold of the Ragged School Managers; and I had rather see his photographs of pupils in different phases of reformation, from the "raw material" to the six months boy, than any thing in the Royal Academy. Tell all our friends, of all religions, to call on Mr. Driver, and no one, with heart, or head, or faith, can leave the Refuge without feeling possibly, smaller, but certainly wiser.

To every word of the above quoted passages we fully subscribe; and to Mr. Driver, and the Rev. H. Whitehead, the Reformatory advocates are deeply indebted. To our own Prison and Workhouse authorities we would repeat here an observation made to us some short time since by Mr. Driver—“We have now got a room devoted to prayer alone; I cannot tell you how much I feel the usefulness of it; we had to pray in the workshops formerly, and there we were praying in a room used for other purposes, and just cleared away for the occasion; a spot of paste, or a dab of glue, or some mark of the ordinary day's work, came before us at prayers, and then we wandered away from the work of prayer time to the work of work time, and so half our prayer was but mechanical!” We quote these observations for the benefit of our Prison and Poor Law authorities, many of whom fancy that any place is good enough to pray in, even though it may be usually devoted to the most opposite uses.

In the Thirty-fourth Report of the Inspectors General on the General State of the Prisons of Ireland, 1855, and just published, we have the usual able and lucid statements of the conditions of the various Prisons under the inspection of Messrs. Connellan and Hervey.

From these reports it is plain that the County authorities are as stupid and absurdly short-sighted as ever; that separation is a principle of slow growth in the mind of the bucolic J. P.; that any future cost is to be despised for a present saving; that Kilkenny City gaol is a disgrace, as we have before stated, to the country, and, shortly, the whole report just proves what Frederic Hill has written, and what we have often quoted—“That most effectually to carry out the objects of imprisonment, and that at the least cost to the country, and with the nearest approach to justice in the apportionment of the cost, it is requisite that the whole power and duty of providing and regulating prisons be placed in the hands of Government.” *

The suggestions in this Report are most admirable, and exhibit an amount of care and close consideration on the part of the Inspectors General, most admirable and noteworthy, careful as their Reports usually are.

---

* See “Crime, its Amount, Causes and Remedies.”—By Frederic Hill, Barrister at Law, late Inspector of Prisons. London: Murray, 1853, p. 368.

These observations, shewing our satisfaction at all before us as in this Report, do not, however, apply to the County authorities, particularly to that portion who take upon themselves the visiting the Bridewells: of these establishments there are 113, "exhibiting for the most part, defects of the gravest character, both material and moral."

There is insufficient accommodation, it being sometimes necessary to confine three persons in one cell: oral communication between prisoners of each sex being impossible of prevention, and the sleeping rooms of one sex having to be passed through to arrive at those of the other.

Want of water and imperfect sewerage. No water is procurable on the premises of fifty-five bridewells; 16 of the 18 situated in the county of Cork alone, being thus circumstanced; all these things being opposed to the 7 Geo. IV., chap. 74.

Insufficient Bedding, particularly in Cork and Kerry.

Want of Security, from low and badly built walls—26 Bridewells at least being reported as thus unsafe.

Inadequacy of Staff. One Officer or Keeper must guard the Bridewell, and he must engage in no other employment or trade whatsoever, yet in no less than twenty-three Bridewells, the salaries range from £15 per annum, at the highest, to £9 4s. 8d., a fraction above 6d. per day at the lowest, and this low rate of payment leads to various abuses detailed in the Report.

Defective Inspection is another fault complained of, and its many great evils are pointed out, and, as we think, the remedy is indicated, by the Inspectors General.

With regard to Juvenile Offenders we have the following valuable tables and analyses in the report.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

In our detailed tables under this head are included all ages up to twenty years, but in the subjoined summaries we have taken sixteen as the maximum age at which an offender can justly be styled a juvenile, more especially as the ranks of the Militia have been largely recruited from the ages varying from sixteen to twenty, amongst which, consequently, military offences form a large item in the list of crimes. We this year drew up a new form of Juvenile Return, which enables us to separate distinctly the vagrants from the criminals, and also gives a correct sub-classification of Workhouse offences. In former years these offences, from a misconception on the part of those who filled up the returns, appear in many cases to have been reckoned twice over—first, amongst the larcenies and misdemeanors, and secondly as a separate denomination of crime; and therefore the number of juveniles in years preceding 1855 has been somewhat overstated: but, nevertheless, although from this cause the real decrease is probably not so great as the figures indicate, yet a considerable and gratifying reduction has taken place. We have also much amended the Return of Parentage, to which we invite particular attention; and deeming juvenile crime to be a subject peculiarly interesting at the present moment, we have, for facilities of reference, separated the juvenile from the general criminal statistics.

OFFENCES OF JUVENILES CLASSIFIED.

	10 Years and under.		16 Years and above 10.		Total Males and Females.		Gross Total Males & Females in 1855.	Gross Total Males & Females in 1854.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Felons convicted, .	3	1	375	13	378	114	492	674
Misdemeanants do. .	123	27	2,730	573	2,853	600	3,453	4,015
Vagrants do. .	186	139	1,666	426	1,852	565	2,417	4,074
Felons acquitted .	3	1	95	39	98	40	138
Misdemeanants do. .	1		91	21	92	21	113	} 2023
For farther examination	30	20	338	87	368	107	475
	346	188	5,295	1,259	5,641	1,447	7,088	10,786

WORKHOUSE OFFENDERS.—1855.

	10 Years and under.		16 Years and under.		Total.			Total in 1854.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M. & F.
Workhouse offenders,	18	.	388	36	406	36	452	638
On leaving Workhouse,	3	.	134	11	137	11	148	414
	21	.	522	47	543	47	590	1,052

RE-COMMITTALS OF JUVENILES.—1855, 1854.

	10 Years and under.		16 Years and above 10.		Total, 1855.			Total 1854.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M. & F.	M. & F.
Re-committed once, .	24	13	438	119	462	132	594	914
„ twice, .	4	5	226	56	230	61	291	459
„ thrice, .	2	2	111	25	113	27	140	229
„ four times and upwards,	6	19	227	99	233	118	351	429
	36	39	1,002	299	1,138	338	1,376	2,031

RE-COMMITTALS OF JUVENILES—1854, 1855.

	10 Years old and under.				11 to 16 Years of age.				Total.				Gross Total, 1854.	Gross Total, 1855.
	Criminals.		Vagrants		Criminals.		Vagrants		Criminals.		Vagrants
Re-committed once, -	M. 10	F. 4	M. 14	F. 9	M. 311	F. 74	M. 137	F. 46	M. 411	F. 78	M. 141	F. 44	1884	214
" twice, -	1	2	3	3	151	81	75	25	152	23	78	28	231	459
" three times, -	.	.	2	2	89	18	42	7	69	18	44	9	140	229
" four times, -	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.	.
and upwards, -	.	.	6	19	108	26	119	64	108	28	125	83	251	429
	11	6	25	33	639	158	363	141	650	164	298	174
	17		58		797		504		814		563
	75				1301				1376
Gross Total, Criminals and Vagrants, -													1376	2021

In the committals the females are 20·41 per cent., or one-fifth of the whole; in the recommittals they are 24·56 per cent., or one-fourth; so that, in round numbers, it may be said that there have been four boys for each girl in prison during 1855.

EXTRACT from the RETURNS of the DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE, from 1849 to 1855.

Years	Committed for Trial.				Summarily Convicted.				Discharged by Magistrates.				Total.	Grand Total, Males and Females.
	Under 10 Years of Age.		10 Years and under 15.		Under 10 Years of Age.		10 Years and under 15.		Under 10 Years of Age.		10 Years and under 15.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
1849	—	1	55	13	371	438	1745	549	92	78	722	163	2985	1242	4227
1850	—	—	48	10	640	588	2356	727	155	23	749	199	3950	1547	5497
1851	—	—	53	11	743	682	2691	1133	210	138	724	225	4621	2169	6790
1852	—	—	35	9	724	955	1957	1302	155	102	722	233	3600	2601	6201
1853	2	2	56	18	479	466	1865	746	103	67	646	182	3151	1484	4635
1854	2	—	62	11	393	383	1885	630	122	100	631	206	3095	1339	4434
1855	1	—	29	14	264	208	1662	361	91	84	611	157	2658	824	3482

Thus, in 1855, as compared with 1854, there has been a decrease in male offences of 2,553, and in female of 1,145; in all 3,698, or at a per centage of 30·1 in the males, 44·17 in the females, 34·28 in the total of both sexes. In 1854 the vagrants were 37·77 per cent. of the whole, in 1855 only 34·09; so that the decrease in vagrancy has more than kept pace with that in other offences. In the general re-committals, also, there is a reduction exactly proportionate to that in the committals; but whereas in the committals of juveniles the vagrants are only 34.09 per cent. of the whole, in the re-committals they are no less than 60.04 per cent. of the total number of re-current offenders.

SENTENCES of Penal Servitude of Juveniles.

		16 Years and above 10.
		Males.	Females.
Six Years,	.	11	1
Four Years,	.	53	5
		64	6
TOTAL		70

No juveniles were sentenced to transportation, and none under eleven years to penal servitude.

SENTENCES of Juveniles for Unlimited or Indefinite Terms of Imprisonment.

10 Years and under.		16 Years and above 10.		Total.
Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.	Males.	Females.
2	—	46	8	48	8
				56
TOTAL,				56

SENTENCES of JUVENILES for all Definite Terms of Imprisonment.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
2 Years and above 18 months,	—	—	—	—	7	—	—	—	7	—
18 Months and above 12,	—	—	—	—	15	1	—	—	15	1
12 Months and above 9,	—	—	—	—	61	9	—	—	61	9
9 Months and above 6,	—	1	—	—	18	6	—	—	18	7
6 Months and above 3,	3	—	—	—	95	35	2	—	100	35
3 Months and above 2,	10	3	—	—	311	81	2	1	323	85
2 Months and above 1,	13	3	—	—	400	126	1	—	414	129
1 Month and above 14 days,	38	7	69	44	956	164	594	158	1557	378
14 Days and above 7,	13	9	89	78	433	98	851	226	1386	411
7 Days and above 48 hours,	31	5	22	15	366	100	177	31	596	151
48 Hours,	6	1	3	2	187	28	14	4	210	35
24 Hours,	12	—	1	—	159	11	24	12	195	24
	126	29	184	139	3008	659	1665	432
	155		323		3667		2097		4982	1260
	478				5764				6242

SENTENCES of JUVENILES for Short Terms of Imprisonment.

	Males.	Females.	Total.	No. of Days of 24 hours represented.
1 Month and above 14 days, . . . . .	1,657	373	2,030	56,840
14 Days and above 7, . . . . .	1,386	411	1,797	25,158
7 Days and above 48 hours, . . . . .	596	151	747	5,229
48 Hours, . . . . .	210	35	245	490
24 Hours, . . . . .	195	24	219	219
	4,044	994	5,038	87,936

It thus appears, that of the total number of juveniles sentenced to ordinary terms of imprisonment, only 938 males and 266 females, in all 1,204, were sentenced for longer periods than one month; but that 4,044 males, and 994 females, in all 5,038, or upwards of four-fifths of the whole 6,262, were under sentences ranging from twenty-four hours to one month; and that the average length of imprisonment after sentence, for each of these 5,038 juveniles, taking the maximum of time mentioned under each heading, was only seventeen days and ten hours.

PARENTAGE of JUVENILES.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Having both parents living,	60	23	51	62	1428	274	307	121	1846	480
Having both parents dead,	40	9	46	16	885	210	975	173	1946	408
Having father dead,	42	15	67	54	857	234	251	91	1217	394
Having mother dead,	19	2	21	7	457	108	135	48	632	165
	161	49	185	139	3627	826	1668	433	5641	1447
	210		324		4453		2101		7088

SUB-CLASSIFICATION.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Having stepfather, . . . . .	17	3	2	2	132	40	37	21	188	66
Having stepmother, . . . . .	3	1	2	—	87	44	28	11	120	56
Abandoned by parents, . . . . .	21	2	11	1	162	46	110	5	304	54
Absconded from parents, . . . . .	15	1	11	2	175	48	139	32	340	83
Illegitimate, . . . . .	2	1	1	—	49	18	12	12	64	31

STATE OF EDUCATION ON COMMITTAL.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Read and write, .	12	—	7	1	774	65	467	86	1260	152
Read imperfectly .	40	4	24	4	774	172	275	146	1113	326
Know spelling, .	18	5	26	9	397	92	299	22	740	128
Know alphabet, .	15	1	10	1	192	42	45	6	262	50
Wholly illiterate, .	76	39	118	124	1490	455	582	173	2266	791
	161	49	185	139	3627	820	1668	433	5641	1447
	210		324		4453		2101		7088

RELIGION.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Protestant,	19	6	2	—	257	68	38	20	316	94
Presbyterian,	—	1	—	—	46	13	2	1	48	15
Roman Catholic,	142	42	183	139	3324	745	1628	412	5277	1338
	161	49	185	139	3627	820	1668	433	5641	1447
	210		324		4453		2101		7088

RESIDENCE OF JUVENILES Previous to Committal.

	10 Years and under.				16 Years and above 10.				Totals.
	Criminals.		Vagrants.		Criminals.		Vagrants.
County or borough to which gaol belongs, Other localities,	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
	147	38	106	84	2819	636	654	248	3728	1008
	14	11	77	55	908	188	1014	185	1913	439
	161	49	185	139	3627	826	1668	438	5641	1447
	210		324		4453		2101		7088

The analysis of the foregoing tables is as follows:—

Firstly.—Parentage—32·81 per cent., or one-third, had both parents living; 33·21 per cent., or one-third, had both parents dead; 22·72 per cent. had lost their fathers, and 11·24 per cent. had lost their mothers, making together one third who were orphans of one parent; 6·06 per cent. were stepchildren, 5·05 per cent. had been abandoned by their parents, 5·96 per cent. had absconded from their parents, and only 1·34 per cent. were illegitimate.

Secondly.—Education—19·92 per cent., or one-fifth, could read and write; 20·3 per cent., or one-fifth, could read imperfectly; 12·24 per cent. could spell, and 4·4 per cent. knew their alphabet, comprising about one-sixth; and 43·12 per cent., or rather more than two-fifths, were wholly illiterate.

Thirdly.—Religion—5·78 per cent., or little more than one-twentieth, were of the Established Church; only 0·88 per cent. were Presbyterians; and 93·32 per cent. were Roman Catholics.

Fourthly.—Residence—66·81 per cent., or two-thirds, came from the town or county in which the gaol to which they were committed is situated; but 33·18 per cent., or no less than one-third, were strangers.

There appears to have been some slight improvement in the state of education in the juvenile offenders during the past year; but neither in this respect nor under the other headings has 1855 differed so much from 1854 as to require any particular notice. In the last General Report the question of the expediency of establishing juvenile reformatories was so fully discussed, that we do not consider it necessary to restate the arguments in favour of such establishments. We would merely point to the figures and analysis which we have given, as showing, that although the numbers are diminished, yet that no less than 7,088 children were committed to prison during the past year; that a large proportion of them were wholly illiterate, whilst many others had barely acquired the first rudiments of education; that the terms of imprisonment were too short to render it possible to impart any real educational instruction to the great majority of them; that many, especially vagrants, continue to use the gaol as their home, and to return to it in the evening of the very day on which they have been set at liberty; and that unless youthful offenders can be kept under restraint sufficiently long to enable instruction and reformation to take deep root, it is idle to expect much—if any—improvement in this class of the criminal population.

JAMES CORRY CONNELLAN.
FELTON F. W. HERVEY.

A Select Committee of the House of Commons, on Transportation, is now sitting, and amongst the most important witnesses examined before it, are Colonel Jebb, Captain Walter Crofton, Chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, and Mr. M. D. Hill, the Recorder of Birmingham.

That the Ticket-of-Leave system has not given satisfaction in England is beyond all question. Punch has poked fun at it; Mr. Mayhew has held meetings of convicts about it; magistrates have shaken their heads at it, and the newspapers have written very sound sense and very plain nonsense about it.

But how stands the fact—the system has not had a fair trial, and this is proved by Captain Crofton and by Mr. Recorder Hill. Why the system has been untried, we are told, by the latter; how it could be made useful is made patent by the former.

Colonel Jebb tells the Committee that only about 8 per cent. of re-committals of Ticket-of-Leave men are before him—but how does he know Ticket-of-Leave men from other criminals? How can he account for the fact that, by a return presented to the House of Lords, it appears that the cost of conveying re-committed Ticket-of-Leave men to the various convict establishments amounted to £820 : 5 : 0 ? And why did he, on the second day of his examination, throw the Committee and all hearers into the most profound astonishment by declaring that, notwithstanding all the wonderful results of the system, as detailed in his first day's evidence, yet that he was prepared to see the system changed or abolished ?

Our readers are aware that the Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland have endeavoured to render the prisoners under their control not alone good prisoners, but also good men. They have abstained from issuing Tickets-of-Leave because they had no sufficient means of judging the real characters of the prisoners, and until they should have INDIVIDUALIZED they did not consider themselves entitled to liberate. Impressed by these opinions, Captain Crofton opened the Smithfield Institution for Exemplary Prisoners, of which we have, in the RECORD of our last number (pages xxxvii to xlv) given the history.

Captain Crofton gave to the Committee the results of his experience gathered from the returns of this Institution. These experiences proved that the gradual liberation offered by Smithfield was not alone useful to the man, but was also the means of developing the first germs of a Patronage Society, of which every employer in the kingdom might become advantageously a member. Twelve or fourteen of the men are employed in Dublin, and they visit the Institution once every fortnight, just as the colons visit Mettray when they need advice, or desire to speak to their old guardians. "I send one of the men, a carpenter, still in the Institution, to work every day in the Mountjoy Prison," said Captain Crofton, "and he returns after work hours regularly and sober." "What," exclaimed a member of the Committee, "do you mean to say you trust one of the men out, and he does not run away?" "You forget," was the answer, "that having made a character he has a character to lose."

Whilst referring to this portion of Captain Crofton's evidence, it is right to state that the Earl of Carlisle has visited the Institution at least once every week during the past three months, and has brought with him the most distinguished of those who have been his guests during that period. The interest thus manifested in them, and particularly in their mental improvement, by the Lord Lieutenant, has had a most beneficial effect on the men, and has also had no slight effect on the general body of prison officials. We refer to these visits of the Lord Lieutenant, as, being private, they are not recorded in the newspapers, and they are as creditable to his heart as his pertinent questions and suggestions when in the Institution are clear evidences of his knowledge of human nature, and of his tact in dealing with a class of men of whom he can have little experience.

To continue Captain Crofton's evidence. He was of opinion that the present system of telling a convict that, although he is sentenced for some fixed number of years, yet that he can, as a matter of right, shorten that term by good conduct, was wrong, as it gave a premium to hypocrisy: and he was further of opinion that the emigration of well conducted convicts to West Australia should be encouraged, and that it would be advantageous to both mother country and colony; he would, in fact, make transportation a reward in place of a punishment, and would keep the badly conducted, or irreclaimable convict, at home.

These were suggestions very startling to some of the Committee, but very satisfactory to many of those who have studied all the bearings of the subject, and our chief regret is that we have been unable to report, in full, the valuable evidence of Captain Crofton; however, the omission shall be supplied in our next RECORD, as it is likely that by that time the Evidence and Report will have appeared.

The evidence of the Recorder of Birmingham is particularly interesting; and we are enabled to print it here, having had it specially reported. Mr. Hill said:—

I have held the office of Recorder of Birmingham, since the year 1839. I have during that time tried a considerable number of prisoners. My attention has been directed to the provisions of the act 16th and 17th of Victoria. It became my duty upon the passing of that act to consider its provisions very carefully. I am of opinion that that act has worked well; indeed much better than I expected it would. I have heard its operation spoken of unfavourably, but I have never been able to ascertain that that opinion was based upon a good ground. The necessity which the operation of the act occasioned of discharging in this country criminals who formerly were sent abroad, was felt by the public to be an inconvenience, and that inconvenience was attributed, although I think erroneously, to the system of granting tickets-of-leave; I say erroneously, because it is not easy to understand how a license revocable, although not revoked, can operate injuriously with respect to the public. If the system of granting those tickets-of-leave has any effect I think it must be to operate as a check to the disposition upon the part of the discharged criminal to return to his evil courses, inasmuch as, by one stroke of the minister's pen, he may, without any reason being assigned, be sent back to penal servitude, and although I am of opinion that, as a general rule, deterrents are over estimated as to their effect upon the criminal, yet I must say, that suppose the power of the minister to revoke the ticket-of-leave be exercised duly, it furnishes a deterrent of peculiar strength, inasmuch as, in the ticket-of-leave man, detection is easy and punishment may follow immediately upon that detection. I say detection is easy, because from the indorsement upon the back of his ticket-of-leave, it is not necessary for the revocation of his license, that he should commit a new crime; his having no visible means of subsistence, or consorting with persons of bad character, being sufficient to justify such revocation. I may add, with respect to the indorsement at present upon the ticket-of-leave, that I do not think it susceptible of any improvement, except in so far as it would be desirable to give its terms greater efficacy by carrying more strictly into effect the threat which they imply. I make this statement because we learn from the evidence of Colonel Jebb, that except in very few instances, tickets-of-leave have never been revoked until the convict had been charged with the commission of a new crime. The threat of revocation, therefore, has hitherto been a mere matter of form, but if carried strictly into effect, I conceive that its tendency would be to produce very favourable results. The public impression against tickets-of-leave as having an injurious tendency I do not well understand. It is possible that that impression may arise from the belief that if the person to whom a ticket-of-leave had been granted did not possess one, he would at that moment be in prison, but that is not so; for reverting to the former practice, we find that it was not the usage to keep one under sentence of transportation in confinement for the full term of his sentence; but to liberate him much about the same time as is now done under the operation of the ticket-of-leave system, without that check, however, which a ticket-of-leave unquestionably affords. I may also state that I think the good results of the ticket-of-leave system have been erroneously magnified, because I am of opinion that the percentage of persons enjoying the privilege of ticket-of-leave, who have been subsequently re-convicted is a piece of statistical information, likely to lead to very incorrect inferences. It is said, for instance, that the number of re-convictions does not amount to more than eight per cent. of the number convicted and discharged with tickets-of-leave; but it is quite clear that before that inference can be fairly drawn it must be ascertained that ticket-of-leave men can always be identified. From my own observation and from inquiries which I have made, I am very strongly of opinion, that not only are ticket-of-leave men not always identified, but that a very large number escape identification, and the probability is, that a very considerable number of ticket-of-leave men are convicted who are not known as having been convicted for a previous offence. I will give to the committee some facts in proof of the justice of this view. I have closely questioned the police of Birmingham as to whether they had any means of identifying ticket-of-leave men. They assured me that they had not in all instances. In the month of November last, I asked them to make a list of all the ticket-of-leave men in Birmingham; to watch carefully the conduct of those men, and to report to me with respect to the matter. They did so, having first told each of those ticket-of-leave men whom they knew that his conduct would be watched, but that he would not be interfered with if he only behaved himself well. The report was made at the end of six weeks, and I found from that report that there were in Birmingham only nineteen persons whom they considered to be ticket-of-leave men. Now that struck me as being a very small number for the town of Birmingham, and having entered into the statistics of the matter, upon the principle upon which Colonel Jebb proceeded, I came to the conclusion that the proportion of ticket-of-leave men in Birmingham ought to be eighty. I questioned the police afterwards upon the matter, and they informed me that they had reason to believe—although they could not state so positively—that there were about forty ticket-of-leave men in Birmingham. But let me suppose that to be the case, only half the number would be accounted for which statistical research would lead one to conjecture. The experience derived from a place such as Birmingham, justifies me I think in stating, that the identification of ticket-of-leave men is a subject attended with some difficulty as well as uncertainty. I may say that information which I have received with respect to Bristol, also tends to lead me to the same conclusion. I have proceeded upon the assumption that Ticket-of-Leave men remain in those towns in which they are discharged, or if they do not, that Ticket-of-Leave men from other quarters of the country come to supply their places. I think that a very fair assumption in the cases of Birmingham and Bristol, because, being of considerable extent, they afford desirable harbours for bad characters, and it is therefore probable, that instead of having a less they contain a larger proportion of such characters in the ratio of their population, than smaller towns do. I do not think it is easy for the police, under the present system of police surveillance, to identify those Ticket-of-Leave men; but I may add that I do not think the want of the necessary surveillance upon the part of the police is the real difficulty in the matter. For the purpose of greater clearness, I shall compare this country with France. The criminal statistics of France are very full and very accurate, whereas ours are anything but full, and anything but accurate. In France they have had for many years a very perfect registration of births; the name of the new-born child is not only registered, but also the names of its father and mother. It is therefore practically impossible, for that child to make use of any other name than the proper one to any great extent as an alias. If he should be apprehended for any crime, there is no difficulty in ascertaining who he is. Upon his apprehension he is asked his name. If he answers correctly, the proper authorities, by writing to the place of his birth, obtain a very valuable clue to his character and proceedings. If he deceive the authorities by giving a false name, he is detained in custody, but not placed upon his trial until they ascertain who he really is. Having ascertained who he is, they then write to Paris where the criminal statistics of the realm are collected as it were into a focus, and are thus enabled to obtain information relative to his antecedents. In England, however, our system of statistics is not of that perfect character, and the requisite information with respect to the antecedents of a criminal, is not therefore so easily, or so accurately acquired. I have suggested an expedient which has not been acted upon, but which, if acted upon, would I think be found to work very advantageously in this particular. It is of this nature:—Captain Gardiner, the governor of Bristol jail, possesses a photographic apparatus with which he takes the likenesses of those prisoners under his charge, whom he imagines have embarked in a course of crime as a calling. He says he can produce a copy of each of those likenesses at the rate of six pence a piece. Now with the exception of London, fourteen, or say twenty, of those copies would be sufficient to send to the police in the various large towns throughout the country; so that in the case of each prisoner the expense of those likenesses would not amount to more than ten shillings. Those portraits would not fail to be multiplied, and you would by that means have succeeded in baffling any alias which a criminal may assume, and have procured an instrument by which you may know whether he was or was not an old offender. I may add that my experience on the bench leads me to believe that many old offenders pass off as if they had been convicted for the first time. There is a great deal of trouble attendant upon obtaining evidence of a previous conviction; because you must not only have a certificate of such conviction, but you must procure witnesses to identify the criminal, and to prove that he is the person to whom the certificate applies. The police of Birmingham are in my opinion a trustworthy and intelligent body of men, and I do not think they persecute either Ticket-of-Leave men, or those offenders who are completely discharged. The police tell me that they pass those men by in the streets, and take care not to recognise them, unless they know them to be engaged in evil courses. Ticket-of-Leave men, generally speaking, take great pains to hide themselves. It is very difficult to say whether they change their ground; but it must be admitted that there seems to be a disposition in the criminal to return to the spot whence he came, notwithstanding that that might appear to be the worst and most dangerous place to which he could go. The circumstance, I apprehend, arises from the fact that the criminal happens to leave friends in that locality, and the means perhaps of pursuing his career of crime, should he return, with facilities, which in a locality where he was a total stranger he would not possess. According to my own observation I may say that, since the establishment of railways, the thief is a much more locomotive character than he was. He rushes from place to place, with great rapidity, and is often in consequence able to do a great deal of mischief. Railways unhappily, too, afford considerable facilities for disposing of stolen goods. A receiver of such goods at Aberdeen, for instance, establishes an agency at Dundee. The stolen goods are sent from the former to the latter place by train with rapidity, and are there disposed of without that chance of identification which without those facilities to which I alluded would not be the case. I am of opinion that the hostility in the minds of the public towards discharged criminals and Ticket-of-Leave men is less than it used to be, and that it is every day diminishing. I am of opinion that the belief in the possibility of the reformation of a criminal is not only gradually but rapidly gaining ground. I give this opinion more emphatically with respect to juveniles than with regard to adults. It is to be inferred from the statistical information which assumes that only eight per cent. of the Ticket-of-Leave men have been re-convicted, that the remainder are doing well; but my belief is that a very considerable number of Ticket-of-Leave men will be re-convicted, who now enjoy a season of impunity, but who will drop in by-and-by. I find from a table upon the subject that the proportion of those re-convictions is gradually becoming augmented at the rate of about one one-fifth per cent. per annum. I am aware of the system which is pursued at Mettray, by which young persons upon their discharge are placed under the care of patrons. About fifteen years ago I commenced at Birmingham a course of proceeding in which I have persevered, namely, when a young person was convicted whom I did not think hardened in the ways of crime, I either had him placed under the control of some respectable relative, or having passed some nominal sentence upon him, I committed him to the care of a guardian who entered his name and place of abode upon a book kept for the purpose, in order that inquiry might, from time to time, be made into the conduct of his ward. The offenders so disposed of I divided into three classes, those who were doing well; those who were getting on badly, and those whom after sometime I lost sight of. The experiment I consider to have been upon the whole successful. Mettray is altogether a place for juveniles, and my opinion is that youthful criminals disposed of in accordance with the principle which is there adopted, are reformed in greater numbers, than if they were sent at once to prison. It is of the greatest advantage that offenders should be sent into a real family. The more a family is imitated in those cases the greater the chance of reformation. The family of one's relation, therefore, is always better than the care of a guardian, for the purposes of which I have just been speaking, because a guardian has not the home power over the juvenile offender, nor is he in all cases to be trusted. The results of the system have been favourable in the case of juveniles; favourable also in the case of adults, but the experiment has not been so extensively carried out in reference to the latter class as to justify me in drawing any positive general inference from it.

My opinion is, under all the circumstances of the case, that the measure of 1863 has worked well, and is working well in England. That opinion is founded on a considerable number of facts. The principle of the measure I regard as being a sound and a good one. That principle I take to be two-fold:—Firstly, the enabling the convict to shorten the period of his sentence by good conduct; secondly, his liberation from prison upon a principle not absolute, but qualified, such qualification not rendering it necessary that he should commit any new offence before his return to confinement, if he forfeits that confidence in his reformation which forms the ground-work upon which his license was originally granted. With respect to the manner in which these principles have been embodied in the Act, I may say that I think it is susceptible of great improvement. I think that all reason for shortening the term of penal servitude as a substitute for a longer term of transportation has ceased to exist, now that the principle of granting Tickets-of-Leave has been adopted in the one case as well as the other. I should therefore suggest, that the fourth section of the present bill should be struck out, the effect of which would be to render the terms of penal servitude as long as the terms of transportation, for which they are now substituted. I may also add that I deem it to be pernicious rather than the contrary, that the time over which a Ticket-of-Leave is used to hold a partially discharged convict in check should be at all shortened. That is another reason why I should suggest that the penal servitude should be as long as the period of transportation, inasmuch as a larger time would be afforded after the convict became entitled to a Ticket-of-Leave, to see whether there was good ground for believing that he had really become a reformed character. If he should not give evidence of reformation, I am prepared to face the alternative that he should be confined for the entire of that longer period of penal servitude which I propose should be resorted to instead of the shorter period which has been substituted for transportation, and that he should be kept in confinement until his sentence should have expired, or until he had given pretty good proofs that he was disposed to amend his mode of life. I also think it would be desirable to adopt the word, "transportation" in lieu of "penal servitude," and I fully and heartily concur in the belief that if our colonies were willing to permit our reformed criminals to be absorbed into their population, great advantage would be the result, both to them and to the mother country. I should extend the operation of the Ticket-of-Leave—I mean the liberty of the person possessing it to go where he pleased—to every part of the United Kingdom, nor, I may add, do I see any reason why it should be confined within that limit, or why it should not be extended to our colonies. I am, however, of opinion that we should not permit the Ticket-of-Leave man to go into another country; because then we should lose that hold over him, which it is desirable we should possess. I may state upon this subject also, that it seems to me to be demanded by national justice that a convict should be permitted to shew cause why his license should not be revoked, and I should therefore propose that he should be afforded the means of meeting his accuser, and that he should not, as it is at present the case, be liable to have his license taken back without having an opportunity of demonstrating the injustice of the proceeding in his case; if indeed injustice there should be. The license now is revoked before the person holding it hears whether any charge has or has not been made against him, but what I should suggest is—not that a power of appeal should be given to the Ticket-of-Leave holder after the revocation of his license—but that previous to that revocation, he should be at liberty to "shew cause" why he should not be deprived of the privilege which he enjoys.

I do not think the power of revocation could be better placed than in the hands of the Secretary of State; but as he might not, owing to pressure of business, have sufficient leisure to conduct any investigation into the convict's conduct, I think such investigation might be very advantageously entrusted to the hands of a magistrate. I may add that in order to enable the Secretary of State, or the magistrate to conduct the inquiry with facility, I would give him the power, which he does not possess, under the bill, of examining parties upon oath. With respect to the administration of the act, I should suggest that I believe it to be of the greatest possible importance to hold out to the convict the stimulus of hope. I also think it desirable, nay, absolutely necessary, for the due administration of justice, that there should be full and free communication between the home-office and the judges, recorders and magistrates, throughout the land. The home-office, under the present system, is sometimes called upon to make regulations of which the magistrates and judges know nothing; a state of things which is productive of great disadvantage. As an illustration of that disadvantage I may state that I myself, until two years after the passing of the Act of 1853, was not aware that any difference was to be made between persons sentenced to penal servitude, and persons sentenced to transportation, with reference to their claim to obtain Tickets-of-Leave, and the consequence was, that when passing sentence of penal servitude, I have constantly said to the prisoner, "Now you may remain in confinement for the full term of your sentence; but that will be your own fault, because if you conduct yourself well you will be discharged from prison long before the end of that period." Great was my surprise, however, to learn from a letter signed by Colonel Jebb, which appeared in the Times, that he was of a contrary opinion, an opinion which upon subsequent communication with the Home-office I found to be correct. The result was, that I felt it to be my duty to call for a mitigation of sentence in the case of one hundred and fifty-nine criminals; and by one stroke of the minister's pen those one hundred and fifty-nine sentences were mitigated, by one-third of the period of their original duration, a circumstance which I believe has never taken place in our own judicial history, or as far as I know, in the judicial history of any other country on the face of the globe. My appeal to the Home-office in the case was the result of my having sentenced—entertaining the impressions with respect to the intention of the legislature to which I have just alluded—one hundred and fifty-nine persons to a longer period of penal servitude than under other circumstances would have been the case. I am of opinion that short periods of imprisonment in the case of persons embarking in dishonest courses are injurious, inasmuch as there is not time afforded for carrying properly into effect the system of reformatory action in their regard, while an education in the ways of crime is commenced. At the last Birmingham sessions there were one hundred and thirty-eight prisoners, and I find that out of that number fifty-eight had been previously convicted, and if I were to put the number of times together, I should find that in the case of those fifty-eight persons there were upwards of two hundred convictions altogether; while I may state that in the case of one youth the number of convictions had been nine. Short periods of imprisonment operate injuriously in this way:—They do not cause that wholesome dread of crime which acts as a deterrent to any great degree, while the prisoner is initiated into the ways of guilt without deriving any benefit from reformatory action. I may also say that I do not think any present scale of punishment is very deterring. I think the fear of deterrents as a check upon crime is over-estimated. The uncertainty which hangs around detection is the main reason why I think such to be the case. I am of opinion that it would be extremely desirable that the criminal should be enabled to leave this country for one in which there would be fewer temptations in his way, and better means of obtaining an honest livelihood. I consider the principle involved in constituting a number of stages, as it were, in the good-conduct of the prisoner as a most excellent one. Under the operation of that principle he will feel himself, as it were, getting better and better every day, and an immediate motive for conducting himself well is thus presented, which will act powerfully in aid of the motive derived from the circumstance that he may hope in the course of some time to obtain a Ticket-of-Leave. I consider the period after his discharge as the most critical moment in the convict's career. There is danger then of relapse into crime. I think the plan of giving a prisoner leave of absence for a short time, as detailed in the evidence of Captain Crofton, allowing him for instance to leave the prison in the morning and to come back in the evening, is a plan which forms an excellent introduction to his complete discharge. I believe the Société de Patronage works most successfully in France. The principle upon which it is conducted is that when prisoners are discharged whose case is considered as hopeful, every effort is made to obtain for them employment. That system also prevails in Bavaria, Tuscany, and to some extent in Switzerland. Those Sociétés de Patronage are composed of private individuals in all those countries, and are maintained upon the voluntary principle. In Austria, where they were established in connexion with the state, they failed. I think those institutions are about seventeen years old in France. The earliest attempt made to establish a similar institution in England was that made by Mrs. Fry, who established a society for female prisoners, a society which I believe still continues to exist. There is now one at Worcester for the aid of discharged prisoners. We had a meeting in Birmingham in April last, with the view to the establishment of an institution of this character. Our plan is to have several houses in the town, and in the neighbouring county, to which the prisoner upon his discharge may go, and we hope that he may be able while there, so far to redeem his character as to enable him to obtain employment. I consider that such a society will remove many difficulties in the way of procuring employment. I have myself shewn my confidence in such societies by taking a young woman into my service from Mrs. Fry's institution. She had been convicted of stealing plate in a house where she was engaged as char-woman. She and her husband were at the time of the theft in great destitution. She subsequently expressed great regret for her crime. I may add that having had her for a considerable time in my service, I should never desire to have a better or more faithful domestic.

In reply to Mr. Baines, the learned gentlemen said:—There are a few points with respect to which I wish to offer a few observations to the committee in addition to the evidence which I gave on Monday last. I upon that occasion alluded to the institutions called Sociétés de Patronage in France, in terms so general as to lead the committee to suppose that such institutions were established in that country for adults. Having, however, communicated with M. Demetz and M. Beranger upon the subject, I find that Sociétés de Patronage for adults do not exist in France, although from the experience of their good results in the case of juveniles, those gentlemen are desirous that adults also should enjoy the advantages which institutions of this description are calculated to confer, and actually do confer in Bavaria, and some other countries in which adults are not excluded from their operation. The difficulty which exists in the way of the establishment of Sociétés de Patronage in France, has I understand, its foundation in the circumstance that it would tend to diminish to some extent the grace of a free pardon upon the part of the Emperor; a difficulty I may add which would have no place in this country. M. Demetz has had some experience of the working of such institutions, in the case of adults who have been acquitted of the offence with which they happened to be charged. It appears from the report of that gentleman, as well as from the information which I have received in other quarters, that there prevails in France a strong prejudice against every person who has been once imprisoned; a prejudice which is not obviated even by the fact that he has been acquitted of the offence for which he had been imprisoned; nor by the fact that the judge may have expressed it to be his opinion that he was innocent. Now M. Demetz founded a society for obtaining employment for prisoners of that description, subsequent to their acquittal, upon the receipt of a certificate from the judge before whom their case had come, that there was no ground for believing them to be otherwise than innocent. That society is still in existence and the good results which have attended its working, have caused M. Demetz to be extremely desirous that the principle upon which it is based should be extended, and he has requested me to present to the committee in his name a work in which his opinions with reference to the subject, and certain facts in connexion with it, are set forth.

(Document handed in.)

I may perhaps mention one fact to which M. Demetz alludes. It is that a large manufacturer in Paris observed to him that he did not like to take into his employment persons who had been imprisoned for some offence, and absolutely pardoned, inasmuch as he could not exercise over such persons the requisite amount of control; "but if you can obtain," observed the manufacturer to M. Demetz, "a law which will enable me to employ persons provisionally pardoned, I should be disposed to employ a great number of them, because I should have it in my power to exercise over them a certain amount of control."

There is another point upon which I now wish to offer a few observations to the committee:—I find that the principle upon which Tickets-of-Leave are granted is this—that the prisoner should have served a given time, and that such time-service is a qualification defeasible if his conduct be bad. Under the operation of that principle very few indeed have disintituled themselves to the privilege of obtaining a Ticket-of-Leave, because by the observance of ordinary good conduct they have been considered to have so far redeemed their characters after a short period of detention, as to deserve a Ticket-of-Leave. Now, let me suppose that the principle of making a man work himself as it were out of prison, were adopted, it is quite clear that under the operation of that principle, men would obtain their Tickets-of-Leave at the expiration of periods, most various in point of duration, whereas under the existing system they are turned out with Tickets-of-Leave in batches. To illustrate my meaning let me suppose that a minimum of time to elapse before a Ticket-of-Leave can be granted is fixed, then you would find under the operation of a principle such as that of which I am now speaking, that while one man by marked good conduct and industry would have worked himself out of prison at the expiration of the minimum time, another man would, in consequence of his good conduct not having been so marked, be obliged to remain somewhat longer in prison; another longer still, and so on. That is a principle which I consider would be calculated to work very advantageously. In stating that there were in France no Sociétés de Patronage for adults, I did not mean to state expressly that there were no such institutions for female adults. That is a point upon which I cannot speak with accuracy. My conversation with Mon. Demetz related to adults generally, as distinguished from juveniles. I do not consider that provisional discharges should form an essential feature in the constitution of Sociétés de Patronage, although they may form a very useful adjunct. I am of opinion that the operation of such institutions ought to extend beyond the period of the expiration of the Ticket-of-Leave, but I do not think that that operation ought to be postponed until after the expiration of the license. Perhaps the very best time when the prisoner could come under the superintendence of such institutions would be immediately upon his being discharged from confinement. The institution about to be established in Birmingham, will extend as well to those who may be discharged from prison absolutely, as to those who are discharged merely provisionally. The former, as the law now stands, must always constitute the greater number, because the principle of the law applies practically to offenders only in whose case penal servitude has been substituted for transportation.

Mr. Hill's evidence concluded : any other observations which he had to offer being, he said, embraced in a more concise form in the charge which he delivered at Birmingham in autumn last, than they could possibly assume in the shape of oral testimony.

Charge put in.

We have been informed that M. Demetz has been requested to state his views to the Committee in writing, and all our friends will learn with satisfaction that he has consented to do so.

Amongst the topics of general interest to our readers, we may record the following :—

The Committee of the Reformatory and Refuge Union offer Prizes of £15, £10, and £5, for the best Three Essays on "The Practical Management of Reformatories and Refuges, with respect to Food, Labour, and Best;" to be written by Governors, Masters, Matrons, or Assistants, in any of the Institutions on the List of the Union. The Rev. Sidney Turner, of Redhill, Alexander Thomson, Esq., of Banchoory, Aberdeen, and Mr. J. G. Gent, of the Ragged School Union, have kindly consented to act as the adjudicators. Any further information may be obtained from the Secretary, 118, Pall-mall.

The Philanthropist of June 1st states :—

The soirée to be held at Willis's Rooms on the 19th of this month, will afford an excellent opportunity for a review of the operations of the institutions of Great Britain, and especially of their several modes of employing industrial occupation as a most powerful training for habits of honest labour. Articles manufactured by boys and girls, as well as by adult inmates of all the institutions, are to be there laid out for inspection, and as the exhibition is to be limited to such things, there will be, of course, none of that distraction caused by mixing with the plainer objects of this kind the more bizarre minutiae which generally overshadow them at Reformatory fancy sales. Here we may fairly expect to find a general assemblage of all who desire to be intimately acquainted with the different materials employed in industrial classes, and the various methods of using them for training the young and older inmates to work ; while it is desirable also that the products of their labour should be so displayed, as to show at a glance the pecuniary aspects of industrial employment in general.

We understand that boys, girls, and adults, from each of the me-

Provincial institutions will be present to point to their several manufactures, their bundles of chopped wood, packets of picked bristles, piles of boots and shoes, or of coats and trousers, the boxes of shoe-blacks, the chairs, forms, tables, and dressers, from the carpenter's shops, books and pamphlets printed and bound, and the more elaborate ornaments turned at the lathe, or hammered on the anvil. Others will exhibit the fruits of the earth cultivated by their hands, as well as the mats and ropes, and models and pictures, evidencing their perseverance or their more ambitious attempts at design. In several instances the actual work will be carried on in one of the rooms set apart for this purpose.

The needle-work to be exhibited by the girls, will be of equal interest, but we confess that in criticising such matters, it will be absolutely requisite to have the help of the experienced ladies who will, doubtless, be present on this occasion. Already there are many busy hands at work for this exhibition, and we even hear of one or two friends who intend to appear dressed entirely in clothes manufactured in the institutions.

In our last RECORD (page xxiv.) we inserted the prospectus of a society for establishing a Refuge for Roman Catholic Females Discharged from Prison, and we rejoice to state that the Refuge, on a small scale, is now open at Golden Bridge, under the care of the Sisters of Mercy. To Doctor Cullen the very deepest gratitude is due for the prompt manner in which he aided the project of the Refuge; and we understand, from gentlemen officially connected with the Prisons' Department, that the ladies who superintend are proceeding carefully, cautiously, and most successfully. The establishment is quite "un-grand" enough to win the approval of Mr. Baker or Mr. Wright; whilst the zeal of all concerned would please even Miss Carpenter.

The Sisters possess a most important influence for Reformation in the fact, well known to all the inmates, that all is done, all labor and care undertaken, without pay, or pecuniary recompence of any kind; this gratuitous devotion, some of our readers will remember, was the great secret of Sarah Martin's success.*

---

*This admirable woman was a poor dress-maker, and devoted all her time to the care of the prisoners in Yarmouth Gaol. She had a small income, about twelve pounds per annum, and having lost her business through her care of the prisoners, she subsisted upon this small sum, and upon the charitable kindness of those who approved her exertions. The Corporation of Yarmouth wished her to accept some stipend, she refused to do so, and thus explains her reason, in a letter to the wife of a Magistrate who had entreated her to take the money. "Here lies the objection which oppresses me: I have found voluntary instruction,

About seven acres of ground are attached to the Refuge, and thus an opportunity is afforded of teaching the common branches of dairy work and washing, so far as they are required about an ordinary farm house. We were much amused, and indeed interested, in learning that an old woman who had been a notorious fowl-stealer, is now a most anxious and careful guardian of the hen house; and pointing to a large collection of fine young chickens, she is accustomed to exclaim, "Look at thim, I'll rayer every one of thim." We presume she is quite astounded at the possibility of being able to keep her hand from their necks, and is consequently proud of her reformation. We hope to be able in next RECORD to report fully on this excellent and most admirable institution.

The erection of the Juvenile Convict Prison at Lusk is at length commenced, and about 300 men will soon be huffed on the Common, and at work.

The Female Convict Prison, at Mountjoy, is in a very advanced stage of completion.

In a former part of this RECORD we referred to the meeting of the National Reformatory Union in honor of M. Demetz; we now insert the Report of that meeting as it appears in The Law Amendment Journal of June 1st:—

Special Meeting of the National Reformatory Union—Thursday, May 29th, 1856.

Lord Lovaine, M.P., took the chair at three o'clock.

Mons. Demetz attended the meeting, in accordance with the invitation which had been forwarded to him; Mons. Verdier accompanied him.

Among the others present were—Lord Robert Cecil, M.P.; Hon. H. G. Liddell, M.P.; Dean of Salisbury; Sir S. H. Northcote, Bart., M.P.; Sir T. Winnington, Bart., M.P.; Sir E. Kerrison, on my part, to have been attended with great advantage; and I am apprehensive, that in receiving payment my labours may be less acceptable. I fear, also, that my mind would be fettered by pecuniary payment, and the whole work upset. To try the experiment, which might injure the thing I live and breathe for, seems like applying a knife to your child's throat, to know if it will cut." She was only induced to accede to the offer of the Corporation, when they told her—"If we permit you to visit the prison, you must submit to our terms"—and they gave her—twelve pounds per annum! and this after twenty-three years of devoted care. She commenced to visit the prisons in the year 1819, being then twenty-eight years old, and the chief support of her mother; she received the twelve pounds but for two years; it was granted in 1841, and she died on the 10th of October, 1843.

---

Bart., M.P.; Mr. M. Milnes, M.P.; Captain Stuart, M.P.; Mr. Serjeant Manning, Mr. M. D. Hill, Q.C.; Mr. D. Power, Rev. Sydney Turner, Mr. R. Hall, Mr. E. Webster, Mr. C. Batchiff, Mr. G. W. Hastings, Mr. T. H. Bastard, Mr. J. Perry, Mr. A. Hill, Rev. L. Lewis, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. P. J. Murray, Captain Crofton, Mr. E. B. Wheatley, Mr. M'Clelland, Mr. H. G. Wright, Rev. T. Jackson, Mr. Halswell, Mr. Lyall, Mr. Bowyer, and a considerable number of ladies.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The Chairman said that they now had the pleasure of seeing at a meeting of the Society one whom they regarded as a great benefactor to his race, who had first rescued from misery and crime those for whom no one before had cared—one who had thereby conferred great and lasting benefits on humanity. It afforded them all the greatest gratification to see Mons. Demetz among them; and they trusted to derive much information from the words which he might address to them that day. They had already elected him an honorary member of the Society, and he (the Chairman) would now read the following Address:—

“TO M. M. DEMETZ, ETC. ETC.”

“Sir,—I have the pleasure, as Chairman of the Reformatory Union, to express to you the deep gratification which its members feel in enrolling you amongst them as an honorary member, and in seeing you on this occasion.

The Reformatory Union has been formed with the special aim of placing the corrective treatment of youthful offenders upon a right foundation. They seek to procure such amendments in the laws relating to juvenile crime as shall ensure a just discrimination between the old and the young—the man and the child—the hardened and the still comparatively harmless—the offender of depraved will and purpose, and the offender from neglected training, orphanage, and destitution.

“The Union seeks to stimulate and assist the noble efforts of individual benevolence to provide Asylums and Reformatory Schools, in which the young offender may find the moral restraint, the industrial occupation, and the better influence, of which he stands in need. The Union labours for this, by collecting the various results of experience and inquiry in England and other countries on the different branches of the Reformatory question; by bringing into closer intercourse and more friendly relations all, of whatever creed or party, who have devoted themselves to the good work of reclaiming the youthful offender; and by enlisting and organising such branch societies as may provide for the guardianship and oversight of the young persons trained in Reformatory Schools, upon their discharge and return into the world.

“These, Sir, are the chief objects of our Union. They are objects essentially connected with that noble cause to which you have devoted the ripest years of your life, with a sacrifice of personal interests and selfish objects which cannot be too highly honoured. They are objects which you have not only laboured for, but have attained to a remarkable extent, and which it is your teaching and your example that have mainly led this association itself to value and to seek for.

"I feel sure that the slight expression of their deep respect and homage, which the members of the Reformatory Union desire this day to offer to you, will be welcome to you. Their feelings are, indeed, the sentiments of all to whom your name and your work are known. They trust that the good providence of God may yet continue your health and vigour through many years of usefulness and honour, giving you ever-increasing influence and success in the mission you have undertaken, and assuring to you that reward which never fails the real benefactors of their fellow men.

"Signed on behalf of the members of the Reformatory Union,

"LOVAINÉ."

After concluding the address, the Chairman put to the meeting, that it should be now signed by himself, and he presented to Mons. Demetz on behalf of the meeting.

This was assented to with acclamation.

Mons. Demetz said (speaking in French), "I beg to thank you for the honour you have done me in presenting me with the address which your chairman has read. In it you have been pleased to speak more highly than they merit of the exertions which I have made in the cause you have equally with myself at heart. By your sympathy you sustain me in the efforts which I made in that cause. Let me assure you, on my part, that the remainder of my life will be consecrated to it, and that under all circumstances you may count on me."

The Chairman then said, that in proceeding to the real object of the meeting, that of obtaining as much practical information as possible from Mons. Demetz, they must remember the ill-health of their visitor, and must endeavour to be as short as possible. The General Committee had framed some questions on points of interest, and he would now proceed to put them to Mons. Demetz, always remembering that we were not bound to follow him as servile imitators, though most ready to listen to his advice. The first question was as to the period during which children should be detained in Reformatories, and the age at which they should be sent there.

Mons. Demetz said that in France a child might remain in a Colonie Agricole until 20 years of age, according to the 66th article of the Penal Code. The theory of the law was, that as children do wrong without knowledge, they should be educated, improved, and rendered good—not condemned to be punished. But before the establishment of Mettray this 66th Article was to all intents and purposes a dead letter; for the children, though acquitted, were sent to the maisons de reclusion, where there was no distinction made between the children who had sinned in ignorance, and those who were steeped in crime. The consequence was that the poor creatures came out finished students in wickedness—they had taken a high degree in the university of crime. He said that in these matters he spoke from experience, for he was for four years juge de police correctionnel. His colleagues regarded this duty as a curvée, but he considered it as a great blessing ; for it led him to do whatever he had been able to accomplish towards the education and elevation of the poor lads brought before his tribunal. Many of these children (without exaggeration) were obliged to be placed on a chair, in order to be raised on a level with his desk. They declared that they thieved in order to satisfy the cravings of hunger, which their parents either could not or would not supply. To punish them was impossible ; to restore them to their parents, was only to consign them to the state of starvation which had brought them before the tribunal ; and to send them to the maison de reclusion, was only to condemn them to learn iniquity. Unable to bear this any longer, he gave up his office, and determined to establish an institution which should remedy this sad state of things. Mettray was founded ; and the 66th article was no longer an illusion—it became a fact. But magistrates for some time liked to retain the former state of things, and still sent lads to prison, or sent them to Mettray only for a short time ; and it would be found that the greater proportion of the recidivists were those children who could not stay a sufficient time to be educated, and to be enabled to gain their living honestly. He thought that the boys should not quit the Reformatory School until they were skilled workmen, and not mere apprentices. In France the condition of apprentices was not comfortable, they were much in the power of their masters, while the well-taught workmen were valuable to their employers, and were consequently well treated. He considered the army as the most appropriate mode of life for the boys leaving Mettray ; the discipline in both was much alike, and he had found it the best educational means. He thought that the removal of the youths from Mettray directly into the world was too rapid a transition, and compared it to a horse ridden for some time with a tight rein in the hands of a firm rider, and then suddenly let loose. Liberty men must have, especially in England, but the liberty of these youths ought to be very carefully superintended.

He then adverted to the English Juvenile Offenders' Act, and said, that though a boy might under it be occasionally kept till he was 21, yet the greater proportion were dismissed before they could have acquired the steadiness of a man. He thought they should remain in a Reformatory until they had attained an age at which there is at least a likelihood of their having that command over their passions which was not often possessed in very early youth. As to the age at which children should enter Reformatories, he thought that the earlier children came the better ; the younger they were the more easy it was to teach them, to eradicate their bad tendencies, and to impart good aspirations. Of course very little children were not of much use in cultivating the ground ; but as the object of Reformatory Schools was not so much to make the land profitable as to reform the children, they should enter these schools at a time when their dispositions could be easily moulded ; and it required much less skill to teach children at seven or eight, than at fourteen or fifteen. We should deal with these children as a physician would treat a disease, which may be easy to cure if taken at the beginning, but not if allowed to spread its baneful influence over the whole frame.

The Chairman said, that the second question to be asked was, as to the education of assistant teachers, and the mode in which the government of Mettray was carried on.

Mons. Demetz said, he thought the teachers should be selected when young—never when more than 18—before they had acquired the tastes which would make them wish to take a place in the busy world. Many came to Mettray who had been intended for priests, but who found the rigours of the clerical profession, and the necessary seclusion from all family ties, more than they could bear. The life of a teacher at Mettray, however, was one of great self-denial and devotion—one requiring a considerable amount of enthusiasm to face the many difficulties and trials of the path. The teachers then first entered the normal school, where they generally remained two years, and then they gradually rose through the different grades of officers until they become chefs de famille. They required great experience: they began by being monitors in the class-room, then they became sous chefs, and afterwards chefs de famille. But it was necessary that they should rise gradually to the more responsible offices: they would fail if placed too soon in important positions.

As to the mode of education at Mettray, Mons. Demetz said that it was carried on by dividing the boys into families. It must be remembered that the children who required to be placed in Reformatory Schools were chiefly those who have become criminal through the neglect of their parents; they have never experienced the benefits of living in a respectable family; and the means of raising them to the position from which they have fallen are to be found in restoring to them, as far as possible, the training of a family. The boys were therefore divided into families of forty—not that he thought this was the best number, for it was too large, but that these institutions must be carried out as cheaply as possible; if they cost too much, the public would begin to grumble. He thought that twenty-five would be the best number; that of course exceeds the number of a real family; but he considered that these children had not the tie of affection which exists between real brothers and sisters; and that if there were only the natural number of a family, there would not be that emulation among them which was necessary to their progress. The children were classified, partly by age, and partly by disposition. Up to eight years of age he thought the different dispositions of little consequence; after that time he mingled the heavy character of the Breton with the gay disposition of the Gascon. France having a share in so many races, gives him the power of mingling all sorts of different dispositions; and he kept the ages of the members of the different families as near as he could. He thought it very important that the commencement of all charitable institutions should be small, and that they should increase gradually. The managers of such institutions learn as they go on; the make mistakes which can be easily repaired in a small establishment, but which ruin a large one; and when a great sum of money has been spent upon an institution, it must be used—it has then cost too much to be thrown aside. We said that 500,000 francs had been spent on a prison for boys at Paris, and that it was so inconvenient and so thoroughly ill-constructed, that it would have been cheaper to have pulled it down at once than have used it for the poor creatures there incarcerated. Mons. Demetz further said that he experienced great difficulty in finding moral trade instructors for the boys. Unfortunately these men were apt to relate their adventures on the Sunday to the boys whom they taught on the Monday. To remedy this defect he was about to establish a branch in his normal school, in which trades will be taught; and into this department he intends to admit youths of respectable birth, whose parents would not like them to enter a common atelier.

Mr. M. Milnes asked whether it were possible for the boys at Mettray to become teachers.

Mons. Demetz said that it was possible, but very rare. Of course if he professed to reform youths completely and entirely, he must allow them possibly to become teachers, but that in practice he very seldom did it. There were a few young men who had been boys at Mettray whom he admitted to his table, and whom he would trust in everything. This showed that the thing is possible; but if it were easy for a boy to become a teacher, the other teachers would be offended who had always led respectable lives. He added, that the education of the agents fitted them for other paths in life than that of a teacher in Mettray. They could go into commerce, and sometimes did so, when they became tired of the very strict mode of life they must lead as agents. He never wished them to stay an hour after they had changed their minds, and therefore never bound them by any contract, but let them go when they pleased.

The Chairman said, that the third question was, as to the system of rewards and punishments pursued at Mettray.

Mons. Demetz said that the strictest discipline was observed at Mettray, accompanied, however, with the greatest personal kindness and even tenderness. Infractions of the laws were as far as possible prevented; and the boy was made to feel that if he broke the laws he was sure to be punished, and that if he fulfilled his duty he was sure to be rewarded. It was evident that where boys were not in prison, but, as at Mettray, in the open fields, there must be a power that would prevent them from absconding. An officer of the government had exclaimed, concerning Mettray, "what a singular prison, where you have no keys but the clef des champs." In 1848, when France was plunged into revolution, when several of the government schools were in a state of rebellion, when even private schools had had their own éméutes, at Mettray there was no infraction of the laws. The youths behaved very respectfully towards their teachers; this respect is strictly inculcated; and as the agents behave towards the boys so as to inspire respect, it is always readily yielded to them. The punishments were formerly—being condemned to eat dry bread; imprisonment in a light or dark cell; erasure from the tablet of honour; and for very bad offences, dismissal from Mettray, and return to prison. The punishment of dry bread had now been changed to a blow on the hand with a ferule, it being found that dry bread had an ill effect on the boys who underwent it. For this punishment had been inflicted chiefly for idleness; and as a boy who was idle in one part of his duties was generally idle in others, the same person was continually undergoing the punishment; and as the boys at Mettray had not more to eat than was absolutely necessary, the punishment which was designed to cure idleness, ended by making them unfit for the labour which they were required to pursue. He had a great objection to corporal punishment, and the ferule was not inflicted on the elder boys; it was not considered as a disgrace; and it did not, like many other punishments, entail an erasure from the tablet of honour. These punishments, perhaps, might seem numerous, but it was necessary to have certain penalties which the boys knew were inevitable unless they obeyed the laws of the place. But he said that he preferred rewards to punishments, and that in increasing rewards he negatively increased punishments. He often made the deprivation of a reward a punishment; for instance, the boys learned to swim as a means of saving their fellow-creatures when drowning, and it was a punishment to be prevented from taking the swimming lesson. He considered that one of the most elevating things which a youth could do, was to do good to his fellow-creatures; a good action once accomplished raised a man for ever; and he therefore inculcated the doing good to their fellow-creatures, and gave them instruction which would fit them to assist their neighbours.

He said he wished that the institution of Mettray should be considered as the parent of the boys, and he therefore never allowed any boys who had left to go when ill to an hospital, because a real father would not permit it; and when any youth was out of employment he might always return to his home. He also said, that when anything occurred in which he did not see his way clearly, he always considered what a father or a mother would do in such a case.

The three principles on which he acted were—first, religion, as the basis of all; secondly, esprit de famille as the bond to unite them together; and thirdly, military discipline as the means of organization. He must explain, that by military discipline he did not mean a military spirit; this discipline was necessary for large numbers to keep up order and to spare time; but no individuality was sacrificed.

He also explained the nature of his superintendence of the youths after their leaving Mettray. His friend, Mons. Verdier, took devoted care of all who went to Paris; and in other parts of France there were people who kindly watched over these youths. When any one visited Mettray, an endeavour was made to enlist their sympathies, and then, if any youth was going into their neighbourhood, he asked them to be his patrons. Mons. Demetz said, in conclusion, that he always endeavoured to obtain the help of women in this cause.

At the termination of Mons. Demetz's interesting remarks, which were listened to throughout with the deepest attention,

Mr. Gladstone moved a vote of thanks to him and to Mons. Verdier, for their kindness in attending the meeting.

Mr. Liddell seconded the motion, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. M. D. Hill moved the thanks of the meeting to Lord Lovaine, for the ability with which he had filled the chair and conducted the business of the day. Mr. Hill took the opportunity to observe, that nothing would be so disastrous to the Society as any attempt to confine it to a particular set of persons ; and that its chief hopes of success must rest on the amount of support it could obtain from the public.

The motion having been unanimously carried, and Lord Lovaine having acknowledged the compliment, the meeting separated.

NOTE ON THE JUVENILE OFFENDERS' (IRELAND) BILL.

[As Amended in Committee.]

Most of our readers are doubtless aware that a Juvenile Offenders' Bill for Ireland is now before Parliament, and in a form as "Amended in Committee." The Bill was most objectionable when introduced ; now, as amended, it is more dangerous and objectionable than ever.

By the original Bill justices were empowered to commit to Reformatories, no provision being made that the young offenders so committed should be sent to Reformatories managed by persons of the religion of the juvenile's parents. This section was at once opposed by the Roman Catholic members, and by the Bishops of that Church. The Chief Secretary expressed his anxiety to act fairly by all religions, and now, what is the result, as we have it in the Amended Bill? By the Third Section the Judge or Justice is to commit to a school managed by those of the religion of the young offender, or to such Reformatory "as the Parents, or Guardians, or near Relatives of such Offender may select."

It must be kept clearly in mind that, by the Fourth Section of the Amended Bill, "any House of Refuge for Juvenile Offenders, or any Industrial School, or other similar Institution," may, if the managers or directors shall desire it, be certified as a Reformatory. Further, it must be also kept in mind that, by the Seventh Section of the Amended Bill, the parents of any offender committed to a Reformatory shall be liable to contribute, if of sufficient ability, a sum not exceeding five shillings per week towards his support ; but any two Justices may, "upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case," if they think fit, order any lesser sum as that which the parent shall be bound to pay to the Reformatory in which his child, or step-child, shall be confined.

We give very great credit to the ingenious concoctor of this Amended Bill, but we do not give great credit to the Roman Catholic Attorney General who allowed his name to appear indorsed upon it, for the Bill is nothing more than an attempt to legalize proselytism, hypocrisy, and falsehood.

By the third Section the juvenile may be sent to such Reformatory as his parent, guardian, or near relatives may select, step-parents being included; by the Fourth Section, any of our Ragged Schools, or other "similar Institutes" can be certified as Reformatories; and by the Seventh Section any "two justices" may name the sum to be paid by the parents, or step-parents, or guardians, or near relatives of the juvenile, to the Reformatory.

No man in Ireland can conceal from himself that this is but a clever attempt to give a legislative help to that system of proselytism supported in our Irish Ragged Schools by the money of English and Irish fanatics; a system of corruption of which Dr. Cullen, in a Pastoral read in all his Churches on Sunday, June 8th, thus writes:—

"But our enemies are not satisfied with heaping insult and contumely on us: they have resource to bribes and gifts to obtain the perversion of the poor and destitute, and especially of children. Unfortunately, the late famine, and the ruthless anxiety of many landlords to clear their estates of the poor peasantry, have filled this city with misery and want. Thousands of these victims of want or oppression crowd our streets. Bigotry and fanaticism have determined to traffic on their misery; and with that view, ragged schools have been opened, or put in greater activity, in several parts of the city. Lurgan-street, Townsend-street, the Coombe, and Rutland-street, are the seat of schools of this description, which are met with also in other parts of the city on a smaller scale, and there are agents sent through the streets, to seize on poor neglected children, and to seduce them, oftentimes against the will of their parents, into those schools.

"These ragged schools are purely aggressive, instituted for the purpose of depriving poor Catholic children of their faith. If any family be in distress, the agents of those schools make a regular contract with its members. They say to the parents: 'send your child to the proselytising school, and we will provide both for his and your wants—all we require is, that you allow us to imbue his mind with heresy.' The parents are thus tempted to sacrifice their own souls, and to immolate their child to Baal, by the hope of some temporal relief. If they reject the proffered boon, then the pretended charity of the proselytizer leaves them to pine in misery, and to witness the starvation of the child. When a father dies, leaving an unprovided family, similar offers are made to the widow: her children will be protected, but only on the condition that they renounce their faith,

"Can anything, dearly beloved brethren, be more degrading or more unworthy, than thus to trample on Christian charity under the pretence of promoting religion? And what fruits are to be expected from a system so perverse and antichristian? Nothing but hypocrisy and lying, scepticism and unbelief; and these are the only results obtained by a most profligate expenditure."

What is there to prevent all or any of these schools from being certified under this Bill if it became law? All are within the spirit and letter of the Fourth Section. Parents or relatives have the power of selection, and though Justice may frown, yet justices will,

lxiii NOTE ON THE JUVENILE OFFENDERS' (IRELAND) BILL.

"on consideration of all the circumstances of the case," use that power which the law would give them, of making the weekly payments greater or lesser as the parent, step-parent, guardian, or near relative, should prove steadfast or elastic in conscience, and in faith,

That there is every danger of this kind in Ireland none can deny ; whilst we know, from the very best authority, that although 200 Roman Catholic juveniles have been sentenced to Reformatories within the past three months in the London district, only twelve of this number have been sent to Roman Catholic Schools. Thus the act is abused in England, but how much more would it not be abused in Ireland ?

We do not write at length upon this Amended Bill now, we merely draw attention to its covert and dangerous tendencies ; but if it be "shelved" for the session, as is not unlikely, we shall have an opportunity of again referring to it in our September number.

The Bill makes no provision that if juveniles are sentenced to fourteen days imprisonment previous to committal to a Reformatory, they shall pass these fourteen days in separation.

There is no effort made to render the Poor Law Guardians more careful of the young paupers, by charging the Union with the support of juvenile offenders when the parents are unable to pay the sum directed by the Bill.*

In fact the Bill appears to have been drawn up by one who knows nothing of Ireland, and little of the Reformatory system ; it appears to have been amended by one who cared little for securing public confidence in the measure, provided proselytism were made easy, and that the justices were enabled to take the place of the tract distributor and the Scripture reader. This is not right ; it will, as it ought, have the effect of destroying public confidence, and without this confidence there is no chance whatever of the successful working of the Reformatory Principle.

---

*See "Reformatory Schools for Ireland," By P. J. Murray. Dublin : Kelly, Grafton-street.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF REFORMATORY SCHOOLS AND OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

Through the kind attention of Mr. G. H. Bengough, a gentleman well known as the fellow laborer with Mr. Baker, in the Hardwicke Court Reformatory, and one of The Honorary Secretaries of THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION, we have been favored with the following admirable paper for insertion in this Quarter's RECORD :—

EXPERIENCE IN REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

In the Summer of 1853, having then partially relinquished the charge of the Hardwicke Reformatory School, of which for the fifteen months previous, through Mr. Baker's kindness, I had had nearly the entire management, I commenced a short Record of the results of my experience during that period, which I have since added to and corrected as further acquaintance with the working of that and other Schools, has enabled me to do.

When I first entered upon this work, I possessed little or nothing of any special qualification for it ; my only practical acquaintance with boys having been acquired in an occasional experiment at teaching in a village Sunday School. As must have been expected, therefore, I made not a few blunders at starting. The greatest of which perhaps was that in undertaking to be practically the master, as well as the manager of the School, I undertook more than I had the time or power to perform. But such was my utopian idea of what was required and what I could do, that I at one time contemplated dispensing with the assistance of a Bailiff, or any assistance at all. The evil results of this error were two-fold. In the first place, though I was as much as possible on the spot myself, taking usually the main part of the labour of teaching in the School at night, and latterly also of superintending the boys at their meals, still, owing to my frequent absence on magisterial or other business, a larger proportion of attention and labor fell upon the Bailiff than he was well able to bear.

He thus became jaded and harassed in body and mind, and in consequence morbidly irritable; a striking contrast to the state of things at present in the School, the commencement of which speedily followed the appointment of a Master, who took the greater part of the indoor superintendence, as that of the meals, the dormitory, the clothing, &c., and taught in the School. For, (though he was not himself a very efficient man), both officers were then allowed sufficient quiet to recover the tone of their minds if wearied with the attention of the day ; and the regularity of routine and discipline which was not interrupted as before, was one cause of there being much less difficulty and labour in every part of the administration, than existed when this routine was often broken by my own irregular attendance.

I consider also, that the offices of framer and administrator of the Laws are both difficult and undesirable to combine, in the same person, as I was obliged to have them, in my own—except that I still think that, in regard to the heavier punishments particularly, a greater solemnity is imparted to them and the managers authority upheld by having their infliction and duration referred in all cases to his express sanction.

I should therefore most strongly urge it, as of primary importance, to secure in the staff such a division of labour as will relieve all those engaged from the strain of a too constant attention to what is undeniably a very harassing and laborious task, the supervision and control of children of this peculiar class. But another, and as I consider it, an evil result, from my having thus undertaken more than I was able to perform, was that the Bailiff became practically, and (always of course under Mr. Baker) still is the head of the Hardwicke Schools. Now, however important the formation of a habit of industry may be, and deprecating as one must over dosing children, especially of such a class, with direct religious teaching, it is most essential that some one habitually with them should be able to awaken their attention and interest in religious truth, and daily under the Divine blessing send it by a few forcible words home to their hearts. Of the influence which a habit and power of teaching such as this and a well trained mind had on the general tone of the School, we had ample evidence with our second master, a young man from Kneller-Hall, who unfortunately remained with us only a short time. Now, as it seems to me, a man qualified as I have described must be out of place if in any way subordinated to one of inferior mental training to his own. And the Bailiff, with many important qualifications for his work, is not able, and indeed never undertook, to supply the directly educational element, which is yet the most important in the system of a Reformatory School. To the qualifications which he does possess for his position as director of the labor of the boys, and the general management of the School and the Farm, (which all who have seen it have admitted to be most admirably worked) I am anxious to bear most ample testimony: the School indeed owes very much to his sound, practical, common sense which, though perhaps erring a little on the other side, was a useful antidote, and one not uncalled for to the want of energy and decision, and the attempted seductiveness of my own management at first. I have dwelt the more on this topic because it is one of the very few points of difference of opinion which exist on this whole subject, between my valued friend Mr. Baker and myself. He would place the Bailiff as the chief in importance as an agent in Reformation, if not in authority in the School; while I have always strongly felt, and where I had the opportunity pressed my conviction, that the first point to be secured (next of course to a right Heart) is an educated mind, and that the agent in the industrial portion of the system will be then a secondary consideration, and a want not difficult to supply.

Here too arises several questions, on which I experimented, not always successfully, in my own person, as to the position and intercourse of the master of School, with the boys, as carrying out the theory of the family system. My hope was at first that the Bailiff would naturally take the position of head of the family, and that he and his family and the boys would live in common—taking their meals and and so forth together. Into this arrangement, however, he did not seem disposed to fall, and for a considerable time the boys dined by themselves, perfect silence being observed, and the meal-time being any thing but what in a family it should be, a time of orderly social intercourse. I then adopted quite a different system and dined myself at the head of the table, having the meat and cheese or whatever it might be, put on the table instead of being cut up outside, and carving myself. I encouraged the boys (they were very shy at first) to talk quietly among themselves and to me, and on the whole I had reason to be satisfied with the greater civilizing effect it had upon them; (as a matter of economy it was not successful, but I had not adopted it with that view.) The great obstacle, however, to its perfect success was the difficulty of keeping the talking to a subdued tone and preventing its degenerating into noise. The master who took my place found it necessary to return to the rule of silence; which his successor, however, judiciously rendered less stiff by reading some interesting book aloud. This family theory and its full development from the first engaged my earnest attention, and I have since thought much upon the subject, and I really cannot help coming to the conclusion that it is a mistake, and a mistake which has partially originated, in our adoption of the word family into our language upon this subject, as an equivalent of the French "famille." The infusion of a home feeling towards the Reformatory or Refuge is not necessarily dependent on the boys holding a filial relation in any real sense to the master of the School. As a School and (so far as a school is so), as a "household" is the true practical aspect in which (it seems to me), it should be regarded. The relation of a teacher to his scholar, the master to his disciple, does not preclude in fact calls eminently for the display of love, and in some sort a paternal interest on the one side, and a respectful but not in ordinary cases, a filial attachment on the other. If circumstances would allow of the subdivision of numbers to such an extent, as that one head should have charge of from ten to fifteen children only, as is the case in one at least of the foreign Reformatories, there would still be no true counter part of the family as we understand the word. For ten children of one family would never be found of ages so nearly the same, so that the relation of each to each would be wanting, even if that of each to the head could be realised, where, as is the case with us, so many of the children have parents over-indulgent rather than the reverse at their real home. To regard the Reformatory then, as a School, it seems to me will make one's treatment more systematic and consistent, and more really practical than to aim at giving it in one or two particulars a complexion which can never be thoroughly carried out. The disadvantageousness of very large numbers will still stand upon considerations of another kind, the difficulty, namely, of finding one man capable of sufficiently individualising a very large number of children, and the necessity of calling in the aid of an assistant in such cases, who can scarcely stand in the same position to them as the real head. Perhaps, however, a system analogous to that of the tutors in some of our public Schools might be found to attain the desired end, where the arrangements of the building, as is the case with that of Kingswood, with which I am now more particularly connected, should render such a mode of dealing with considerable numbers collected under one roof most convenient.

But to return to the faults of my first management.

Commencing with an exaggerated idea of the power of kindness to do alone what is only to be brought about by firmness in requiring obedience and maintaining respect, I committed, at starting, the great error of treating my boys not with too much kindness, but with too little strictness and regularity of discipline. In seeking to win their confidence I encouraged them to be so unreserved as often to overstep the barrier of due respect; and both these errors have been subsequently the cause of much otherwise needless trouble. Not that I altogether regret this, however, or would advocate any approach to the other as the less dangerous extreme. On the contrary, I owe to them, to the latter at least, a more thorough insight into the boys' character, than I should have been otherwise able to obtain. I cannot again tax myself with giving any undue indulgence in the way of personal comforts, at least at starting, where my mistake in the way of kindness lay, was in the endeavor to win them to like work in school or in the field, in making it too little of a decided duty to be decidedly, and energetically fulfilled, and in trusting too sanguinely to the effects of a mere verbal rebuke, where a decisive and sufficient, if a mild punishment should have been inflicted at once as inevitable. I allowed myself to think, too, that it was needless to exact such observance of order and discipline, when I had only three or four boys to deal with, as I felt would be necessary when there were more; and this caused me many a difficulty, which I should have otherwise completely avoided. For I always found, that any change in the system once acted on, was productive of much more dissatisfaction and disturbance than would have existed under a far stricter system advisedly adopted, and steadily acted up to from the first. One of the first things therefore which I say, when my advice is asked on the plan of commencing such an institution as ours, is that however few the number of boys at first received, the system and rules should be as strict, if not stricter, than those which it is contemplated with a full school to adopt.

We commenced with three boys, who, before the school was quite completed, were accommodated by the Bailiffs at their residence; and this also interfered with the adoption of a settled system from the first. The three boys were all from London: very good specimens of a class which is to be met with only in London and large towns; and as far as my experience has gone, superior in every respect, not only in knowledge of evil, but in capabilities for good to the youthful criminals of a country district such as ours. There can be no question at the present stage of knowledge of the Reformatory system, that to commence with a very small number of boys is the foundation of success. But it admits, I think, of a question, whether we acted judiciously in commencing with boys of so difficult a description to deal with, and it was almost unquestionably unwise to have them all from the same place. Our object in this was to preclude the possibility of any new comer introducing into the school a knowledge of evil, and taking up a position as a knowing lad and a leader in mischief upon that ground, by securing previously to the side of good order these three thorough adepts in crime, I conceive there would have been much less trouble in thoroughly influencing some of our country lads, judiciously chosen, that they would have had no inclination for this knowledge, and been indifferent to this false fame, and formed a check upon even the cleverest newly caught London thief. One great difficulty which I suppose nearly always exists with small numbers especially, but which in our case was aggravated by the boys' previous acquaintance with each other, was the incessant quarrels which took place, and which only ended when the number in the school had increased to six or seven.

As I have stated above, I began with so lax a discipline, and such indecision in the infliction of even a mild punishment, that the Bailiff was, perhaps, driven, long before I inflicted any punishment at all, to resort to personal correction to enforce obedience to his commands; the result of which was, that when I did try it, my own system, being a less sensible mode of correction, and less decisively evidencing the fact that I was in earnest in requiring to be obeyed, failed to produce much effect. I regret, I confess, that any such necessity should have arisen; and I feel quite sure that firmness and resolution to be obeyed, evinced from the first by all concerned, would have obviated any necessity for resorting to less temperate measures, except in extreme and exceptional cases. The cases where it is employed now, are, I believe, few; and the correction very slight, which makes it the more probable that it might have been altogether dispensed with; and as a check upon its frequent employment, I soon adopted the system of requiring, that in every instance, even the slightest, it should be entered accurately in the report kept of the boys' general conduct, which I examined every week.

The system of punishments and rewards which I had looked to as likely to prove, under ordinary circumstances, a sufficient stimulus to good conduct, and deterrent from bad, was, with a few slight differences in detail, that which I had seen so admirably working at the Philanthropic Society's Farm School at Redhill, and of which, Mr. Sydney Turner has spoken as the key of the whole system there.

I allowed, to well-conducted boys, a small sum weekly, in proportion to their skill and diligence in work, awarded generally at the discretion of the Bailiff; as I could not succeed, from various causes, in getting the much better system of piece-work fairly carried out. I never, however, heard any discontent expressed at his awards; a maximum being prescribed, and general rules made known, by which they were made.

Of this weekly reward a certain proportion was deducted for each given offence, omitting fractions; thus dishonesty forfeited the whole; lying, three-fourths, and so on. At one time I allowed them these sums in money, but I found, by experience, that this practice gave rise to an almost irrepressible amount of gambling, and tended also to encourage and somewhat facilitate attempts to abscond from the school. I therefore had the sum entered to their credit, till they wished to purchase sweets, on which they were only allowed to spend a portion, or any other articles with it, or perhaps additional luxuries at meals. One part, however, of the Redhill system I did not put in practice, viz.: that of reading out the week's list of offences before the school, as is (or at least was) done there after dinner every Monday. I tried, for a short time, indeed, a plan which involved this, that of making them walk to church and sit at meals in order, according to the number of bad marks they had each got during the week, but abandoned it as the publicity thus given to their disgrace, which was often occasioned by very slight offences, was too severely felt to be good.

To render such a system as this efficient, demands great faith in its eventual success, and consequent perseverance in it on the part of the officers, and on the part of the boys depends on that which is not the growth of a day or even of a few weeks, a satisfactory moral tone generally in the School. In setting it in operation at first, it will have usually to be backed up by a ready appeal to more sensible modes of correction, where its influence is not sufficient, but always with a return to it, and a trial of it again and again, until, as it eventually will, it succeeds. The fines too must be made sufficiently heavy to entail, as a tolerably near prospect, a curtailment of food or other indulgence. By a somewhat extraordinary application of this their consequence in one case, I made their influence more appreciated at the Hardwicke School. I had occasion to give a mark to one of the boys there, an impassible, idle, easy-tempered simpleton, when he derisively asked for 100. I accordingly took him at his word, and the 100 marks gave him bread and water three days in the week for a period of six weeks. It put a stop to such remarks for the future. Of course, however, cases occurred in which punishment by fine was inadequate. On two occasions we had recourse to the ultima ratio of a public flogging, inflicted either by, or in the presence of Mr. Baker, and myself, and with all the solemnity of form and circumstance with which we could invest it. I have once before publicly recorded my conviction that inflicted in this way, it is calculated to exert a sound moral influence on the sufferer and the other boys; The offences in these two instances were a fifth attempt to abscond, and offering personal violence to the School-master in the School. For other bad, though less serious offences, we resorted to confinement in a light cell; occasionally, but very rarely extending to as much as three or four days; (and then usually, principally for safe custody, when a boy had attempted to abscond,) for twenty-four hours is ordinarily found sufficient to reduce the most refractory to order.

In the infliction of the other severer punishments from time to time required, I endeavored, as far as possible, to establish a moral relation between the punishment and the offence. Thus one punishment, and one which I found very sensibly felt, was confinement to the walk in front of the School-room, and the offices, sometimes strictly to the School-room itself at all times but the hours of work : and this was generally inflicted on boys who attempted to abscond, or were guilty of any act of dishonesty ; and I endeavored to impress upon all the boys the moral necessity of it, as the delinquents had proved that they could no longer be trusted out of sight.

When not subjected as a punishment to this restraint, they enjoyed a considerable amount of liberty. In fact, at one time, I can hardly say that they had strictly any bounds at all, except that they were not allowed to cross the canal, which is about 200 yards below the School to the east, and were required, as a general rule, not to wander to any great distance from the School, for which in fact, they had no time. The situation of the Institution, being so entirely in the country, and the small number of boys there at first, rendered this amount of liberty possible, without much danger of its abuse. But with increasing numbers it became necessary considerably to curtail it. On Sunday afternoon, too, some of them, those in whom I could place sufficient confidence, were allowed to extend their rambles much further ; the rest being taken for a walk by the Bailiff or School-master in turn. Indeed when the School was smaller, all had the same liberty as I afterwards conceded to the best alone, and even then I very seldom found it abused. In fact the only occasion on which advantage was taken of it by any boy to attempt to abscond was in the case of a boy who made the attempt five times, and who presented the most unsatisfactory material for any moral impression of any inmate of the School. I should not, however, advocate the general adoption, even if possible, of such a liberty as this, nor adopt it myself again, even if circumstances were again to become similar with me.

Now they are occasionally permitted to watch a cricket match, perhaps in Mr. Baker's park, to join a coursing party, or to endeavor to catch a few rabbits, when it is necessary that they should be destroyed ; and when the Royal Agricultural Society's Exhibition was held at Gloucester, I took them all with the Bailiff and School-master to the show-yards, where they conducted themselves very well.

I encouraged in most instances their acquisition of property, and the appropriation of their working tools. At first I had grievous complaints of their pilfering from one another, (especially in regard to the produce of some gardens, with which I endeavored to interest them, not however very successfully ;) but being quite unable to remedy this, I not unwillingly left it to redress itself, as it soon did ; endeavoring to deduce from it how unbearable would be the state to which society must come in time, if dishonesty were not repressed by law. For thieving in an ordinary way there was of course but little temptation or opportunity in such a School as ours ; but surrounded as it is by a number of orchards, and allowed as the boys were a great deal of liberty, especially on Sunday afternoons, it might have been expected that we should have had many cases of pilfering apples to punish. But though we certainly had some, yet on the whole they were very few; and from a large pear tree, on the lowest part of which was their favorite seat, a good crop of pears was secured; though, not to make their virtue too great, it must be added that it was in sight of the Bailiff's house. I fear that they have little sense of the moral delinquency of theft, at least in this regard; for though I made apparently a considerable impression on the first occasion, when three boys, who had been detected, voluntarily confessed, (i.e. before I had heard from the Bailiff,) and appeared moved even to tears by what I said to them upon the occasion, I had reason subsequently to suspect that they had anticipated by this demonstration of feeling escaping any punishment, which, however, I did not think it right that they should do; and I certainly discovered that the boy who was most demonstrative in his contrition upon that occasion, possessed a marvellous aptitude for calling up sobs and tears at will.

But accurate as one's general principles and well arranged as one's system may possibly be, it is by no means an easy matter to act up to them in the various cases and with the various tempers and dispositions, with which in a school of many boys one must have to deal. Thus even the very promptitude of punishment which in most cases is so salutary, is in a few instances better exchanged for more winning and patient treatment.

I have had a very remarkable instance of this, in the case of one boy, while another, I am inclined to think, would have been benefited by the adoption from the very first of a far stricter and more uncompromising discipline than I unfortunately did employ. The case of the first, is briefly as follows:—My meeting with him at all was, so to speak, the merest chance. I happened to be paying a visit to an establishment in London, from which I was to get two boys, the day after he was brought there, (an elder brother having been received there some time before.) The manager of the Institution asked whether I could receive him too, as he could not for his age be kept there. His history was so touching a one that I could not refuse.

His only surviving parent was a step-mother, whom his father had married shortly after the death of the boy's own mother, the father himself dying before he was much more than a baby. While he lived he seems to have taken some pains to send the boy to school, but after his death the step-mother seems to have entirely neglected him, and left him to go his own way. He was first taught the art of thievery by a brother, a few years older than himself, his only real brother, who afterwards being confined in the house of detention, Westminster, committed suicide by leaping from the mast in the yard there. This brother, and his fate afterwards, seemed to have had a great influence on his mind, at first for anything but good, but as I shall have to state, it became the occasion of one of the most interesting conversations I ever had with him or any of the other boys.

He has told me that he was very much frightened the first time, (he was then only nine years old), that his brother took him with him.

They used to get into houses at night and steal from under people's pillows while they slept, and his brother used to make him carry the things they had taken to "harden" him to it. He had been in prison, as nearly as I could make out, eight or ten times, principally for picking pockets, at which he seems to have been most adroit, occasionally substituting for a heavy sum of gold he may have taken from the pocket of a person coming from the Bank, where he used to lie in wait, an equal weight of stone that she (women were his usual prey) might not miss it till she got home.

In prison he seems to have been most refractory and insolent, his experience of it having taught him only this, that in every instance a boy comes out of it, especially after his first committal, "harder" than he went in; and he was only kept at the Institution to which he was taken by careful watching against his escape.

I got him therefore thoroughly untamed; and from his own confession he planned his escape the day after he came down. He never really attempted it, however, but once, in company with three more, when they were all brought back in a few hours. I had little or no trouble with him for some time. The first serious difficulty that occurred being about four months after the opening of the school, and it was in some conversation I had with him in connection with the punishment I was then obliged to inflict, that I was led to believe that he was most likely to be won by patience and a system of treatment more of a moral than of a physical nature. There seemed to be a depth and an openness of character in him beyond what I could ever see in any of the rest, who were almost of necessity, from want of any thought or earnest desire to do right, kept in order by the certainty that disobedience would be visited by a prompt punishment. My patience, however, was I admit severely taxed; and I was sometimes driven to confine him, which I found the best punishment as it gave him opportunity to think; and as often his evident penitence and anxiety to do well gave me encouragement to bear with him again. When he came to me he was absolutely ignorant of the merest principles of Christian truth, though I knew that he was taught, or the attempt at least was made to teach him, in prison, but I suppose having never given his mind to it at all, he had never apprehended what was taught. Under me he made considerable progress in the facts of Old and New Testament History, and I was therefore surprised to find at last how little he seemed really to have taken in intelligently some of those facts, with which I had supposed he was well acquainted. I had other difficulties also to struggle against in the evil influence which one or two of his school-fellows exercised, especially over his religious feelings, by persuading him of that which they had picked up from among the grown-up criminals of London—that religion was a mere invention of men to keep the world quiet, an idea which, when he was in one of his disturbed moods, he would openly broach with a bold profanity which was beyond everything alarming and disheartening, and yet with an inconsistency, of which he was quite unconscious, he would at the same time declare that he never wished to be good, that he might go when he died to that place of torment where he said he was sure his brother had.

gone before. It was on this subject that the conversation began which seemed to open his eyes to the reality and practical bearing of those truths which before had never reached his real understanding.

He came into my room one night and asked me, in connection with something which had passed in the School-room before, if I thought his brother was in hell, and if he should see him if he went there himself when he died, for he wanted to see him again. I told him of course, at first, that we could not possibly know anything about this, that God was merciful, and his brother had never had the means which others had had, of hearing what was right. In the long conversation which followed, I had to combat his theoretical disbelief in Religion, or the very existence of a God, supported upon the commonest shallow theories of the chance origin of all things. I was led indeed to give, as it might have been, to an untought heathen, (so new did it all seem to him when presented as a reality) a short outline of the plan of salvation set forth in the Gospel, with the final account which all men must give in their bodies, on the last day. It was something indeed in this last idea, which seemed to strike him as a reality for the first time. I was amazed, and beyond words, thankful to see the vivid impression which this made on his mind, and with what hope he seemed to seize upon the belief, that, in that judgment, God will not remember the evil deeds of those who truly believe in Christ Jesus, and, being sorry for their sins, evince their sorrow by earnest endeavors to avoid them for the time to come. He really seemed then to feel what he had often heard from me, with the rest, on these subjects; they had at last become to him more than mere words.

From that night I felt that by God's help, I had rescued this one at least of my little flock from sin and death. For many weeks the influence of these newly awakened principles was plain; remarked even by the other boys; he was never heard to swear, was obedient and attentive to all that was said to him, even where it was the hardest trial to him, in the lessons in school. One more trait in his character I will mention, as possibly interesting to others as well as to myself. His half brother was about to leave the Institution in London, whence he had come to me, for Australia. I had promised, if possible, to let him see him before he went. One night, (this was some time before the conversation to which I have alluded above) he said he wished to speak to me about going home. He had been for some time previously, in a very restless and intractable state, so that I felt it would be impossible with anything like safety to allow him to go then. However, I thought it might do him good to talk to him, so I had him into my room and asked him what he wanted—to go home for good, or merely to see his brother? He confessed openly, that if I let him go, he never meant to come back again, but to return to his old ways. For more than an hour did I argue and plead with his better nature; it was long before I could get him to listen to me, but I had met that in him, and prevailed at last before; so I persevered, and at last, by God's help (for I should be impious not to acknowledge it in this case) I prevailed this time also, so much so, that I parted with him in a few days, for London, fully confident that, his word being pledged to it, he would, and he did, return before Christmas day : and though I know that he again became very restless while in London, and must confess it was an experiment which was too hazardous ever to be tried again, I am fully convinced that he felt, when he left me, the sacredness of his word, and was inspired by the hope of better things, really to have determined to do what I had exhorted him to do, come and give us another trial, I having pledged myself that I would be as patient and forbearing with him after, as I had been before. When I relinquished my former close connection with the School, I received him into my own service ; while there, he had strength to withstand the temptation of a sudden meeting with one of his old companions, which he told us of as soon as it had occurred, and for some time his conduct was perfectly satisfactory. At last, however, owing to his not having quite sufficient employment, and a change in the house, he became restless and not satisfactory in his conduct, and at his own desire I dispatched him to Melbourne in Australia, with every hope from his demeanor at parting with him; that he would do well, a hope which I have not relinquished, though (from his not being able to read or write well, I suppose) nothing has been heard of him. To return then to what I said at first ; here was a case in which a very peculiar, and with most boys an impracticable method of treatment, proved at last eminently successful.

With another class of mind, it proved entirely the reverse.—One of the other London boys was a nice quiet looking, well mannered and well spoken boy, apparently fond of learning, and more particularly of books of a religious character ; I may mention, as an instance, that he asked me for some sermons that I used to preach to the boys on Sunday evenings, in winter. This boy prepossessed me, not unnaturally (from my inexperience) by the quiet and orderly regularity of his conduct, and his apparent determination to leave his old way of life. His story too, that he was turned out of doors by his step-father, and after trying to get work, or admission into the Union, in vain, was driven into crime for his bread, tended to confirm that impression. But I have now very considerable doubts, whether a great portion of that story was not false. From his own accounts afterwards, I know that he was at one time in good employment, at a stationer's in London ; and that while he lived at home he was in the habit of picking pockets ; as he related to the Bailiff one day ; how he had picked the pocket of some woman in the fair, and when he came home, found his mother had had her own pocket picked, and was so vexed about it, that he burst into tears. But, however this may have been, his conduct during the greater part of the time he spent at school, was outwardly most exemplary.

In fact for nearly a year I had not to punish him on more than one occasion and then only slightly ; though I certainly passed over, on account of his general good conduct, some things which I should have punished in other and worse behaved boys. The Bailiff indeed, who necessarily saw more of him than I did, early suspected him of duplicity to a great amount, and had discovered him, though unable to prove it, in telling a number of lies. On only one or two occasions, however, could I detect any of that really passionate and determined temper which he subsequently proved that he possessed.—It was some time before I began to suspect its existence, so complete a command had he generally over his temper, so plausible were his explanations, so cool and deliberate his denials of any charges made against him. The first occasion, then, in which I fairly convicted him of a deliberate falsehood, was a great surprise and disappointment to me, though it failed to open my eyes to what I fear now was his true character; the assurance of this indeed only came gradually into my mind, though other circumstances little noticed at the time serve now to confirm it—I only gradually became persuaded that he was acting a part. The other circumstances were the fact I learned in the conversation with the boy above detailed, that he and another had been the means of instilling those infidel doubts into his mind, still I only came gradually to perceive that I had never seen to the bottom of his mind, and to desire to break up that tranquil surface which had concealed it so long and so well. But the time came at last, he began to be discontented at my not doing what I had given him some hopes of, but was unable to do, in apprenticing him to a carpenter which was his great desire, and also at the other boy above mentioned, certainly far less exemplary in his conduct, having been provided with a situation before him. I hope I am not judging him now too harshly if I say, it seemed as if he began to despair of getting anything by an appearance of goodness, and so let his real nature appear; at all events he became more outwardly troublesome, took less pains to conceal his instigations of others in breaking rules, making a disturbance, &c., which he had before so cleverly done as to have escaped in my mind, though not in the Bailiffs, even suspicion, much more detection and punishment. At last he broke out into open rebellion and insolence to myself, for which I found it necessary to inflict a very severe punishment, rendered more severe by the great obstinacy he exhibited throughout. After this he seemed again to return to his former quietness; at his mother's express request I sent him home for a holiday, during which he regularly paid a visit every day to the manager of the institution from whom I had him, and whom he had also managed to deceive, and returned of his own accord to school. How long this would have gone on I cannot tell, if he had found it as easy to deceive me now as he had before; but I had again to punish him, though slightly, for instigating other boys to play in school. Shortly after I engaged with a new master to assist me, who soon detected him in the same offence, and for resistance to whose orders and insolence on the first occasion I had again to punish him myself, and on another occasion he punished him, though slightly, with two or three strokes with the cane (which, as I said, I have found necessary for the very refractory in school.) Whether he then found out that he could not hope to escape, if he behaved badly, undetected and unpunished, as I must believe, or whether anything else led him on, I cannot certainly say, but the next day he managed to effect his escape, and we have never since been able to learn anything positive about him. He carried off with him another boy, a thorough specimen of a child quite spoiled by the ill-judging weakness of a mother—who had baffled all my efforts—who had made previously four attempts to escape—whom from the first I had looked upon, from the extreme shallowness of his mind, as one of the least hopeful of any whom I had in charge. As a confirmation of the generally acknowledged fact of the debasing moral effect which an impure life has upon the whole moral nature, I may remark that in both these cases, and also in another somewhat similar whom I also lost, I found that the boys had become prematurely initiated into and familiarised with the company of the worst of the other sex—and the last especially manifested an extraordinary delight in associations and language of the most disgusting character.

I venture to add further that I think this fact bears somewhat upon the question of limiting the age of admission into Reformatory Schools below the ordinary age of adolescence—I base this upon the conviction that in connection with the physical change which takes place at that period, a material change of mind and character occurs, which soon puts the individual above the class of and beyond the methods adapted for dealing with boys—united with the fact, as above stated, of the premature manliness of the three boys to whom I refer. At all events, whether I am correct or not in tracing the connection which I here suppose, I feel no hesitation in deprecating as the result of my experience, any extension of the limit in age which is now fixed, unless it be such an extension, say up to nineteen, as will include a large class who are now excluded, not on any definite principle, from the benefits of Reformatory Institutions aided by the state, and will compel the foundation of Institutions with such modifications as will be suitable for the reception of older inmates—and to which inmates found too old for the present existing schools might be transferred.

In addition to these and some other boys who regularly absconded from the school, others were lost by being removed by, or allowed to return to their friends at request, there not being then, as there is now, any direct legal power of detention over them. The first boy who was permitted, under more favorable circumstances, to leave for his own home, without any definite provision for his immediate employment having been made, had nearly been added to the list of failures. I had allowed him to return home under the impression that the great improvement which certainly did appear in him was sufficiently permanent to prevent his again willingly returning to his former life: but his idle habits were not, as it proved, overcome; and though he never returned to the extreme state of degradation from which his admission into the school had rescued him, he got into bad company, and bad habits, and finally into prison, when I prevailed on him to return to the school again.

In the two first cases, besides that of the boy I had taken into my own service, in which a decidedly successful result was produced, the boys left this country altogether, as emigrants. But a fair average success has attended the plan originated by Mr. Baker, of apprenticing boys to farmers or unskilled trades without a premium, and on such terms that a small but yearly-increasing weekly payment is made by the master to a savings' bank, the accumulation to be for the boy's benefit, if he leaves at the end of his term with a good character ; for the school, if he is discharged or returned to the school with a bad one. The employer is always requested to return the boy to the school, if he becomes troublesome, or himself becomes unable, from any cause, to keep him ; and as this is looked upon by the boys as a great punishment, if it were always acted upon, and known to be so, it would afford a great security for the boys' good behaviour.

The master, however, has not always either the will to take the trouble or the power to fulfil this part of the covenant, when boys are actually dismissed the school on entering his service, so that I have been inclined very frequently to wish that "provisional liberation," which, as it appears in substance in the Scotch Reformatory Acts, is not unknown to our law, should be introduced into the English Legislation on this question, in the shape of an enactment, that boys might be discharged from schools provisionally, for a time, on the undertaking of any competent person in sureties, to a certain amount ; the recognisance not to be estreated by the boy's absconding, unless it were shown that the boy had previously misbehaved, and the surety had failed to return him to the school. The penalty of absconding to be cancelling of any period of time spent in service, and reversion to the original sentence of detention ; the remainder of the sentence due on the day of provisional liberation to be counted as still due, if, at any period within the time specified in the terms of such liberation, the boy absconds or misconducts himself so as to be sent back to the school, with a period of imprisonment for the offence besides.

The early age at which, under the existing general practice with regard to sentences, the periods of detention must usually terminate, make a provision of a description similar to the one here proposed an almost essential sequel to the present law. To dismiss a boy indeed, at thirteen or fourteen, who was sent to you at ten or eleven, especially if he be one of those easily impressible subjects, on whom a permanent influence is the most difficult thing in the world to produce, would be, in but too many cases, to throw away the labor of the past three years. There are certainly cases where the strength of character which is sometimes exhibited even at that age, would afford good hopes of a boy's retaining the impression which he had received, if ordinary care were taken as to the position in which he were placed on leaving the school. But these cases are rare, and there really does seem a serious question, as to the chances which await many of our present scholars, on their leaving, so prematurely, our schools.

The rarer cases to which I alluded above will be readily recognised by the managers of all Reformatory Schools, as presenting at first the most difficult and intractable material on which they have to work, characterised by their violent temper, and obstinate energy of will, under their first treatment. It is such who, when they are subdued and won by patient pains, that are the most hopeful in the end ; while the majority, the passionless, easy-going boys, who are neither bad nor good, and still more the very tractable and exemplary, as a rule, are the least hopeful of all. Of course, it will happen that a boy received into the school as a refuge, presents the outward characteristics of these last, with inwardly a steady inclination to good; but such form usually an exception to the rule. And as the outward quietude and ordinary tractability of a boy when first admitted to the school, is no true index of his real character, so his demeanor, while in prison, is as little an index of what he will exhibit when transferred from the prison to the school: indeed those who have been the quietest and best behaved in prison, are often the most violent and intractable in the school.

But there is one particular which marks peculiarly the criminal class of boys (as I have been told the same is found among the inmates of our Female Penitentiaries), in which they are all nearly alike, and with which, it is, in nearly all cases, equally difficult to deal—an inveterate habit of lying; as one of them once told me, any one of them would tell a lie if they thought they could get anything by it; and even where there was no apparent advantage to be gained, it seemed almost more natural for them to say what was untrue, than what was true; and the ingenuity and plausibility of the tales which some of the most uninventive looking boys have told me, has occasioned me no little surprise. It is a great thing gained, indeed, when one can induce them, even if it be not always from the most disinterested motives, to disclose, in answer to enquiries, the name of an offender among them; much more when one can secure the habit regarded as a duty, of their making known any attempted or contemplated infraction of a rule, or endeavor to escape. The love of power, importance, and influence with the master among the bigger boys, and the hope of the latter among the lesser ones, of course will, in almost all such cases, have, perhaps, a more than legitimate influence; while, on the other side, the certainty of punishment, if they are discovered to have been accessaries before the fact, I have found to be very useful in producing the same result. Failing, however, to arrive at the knowledge of the offenders through confession elicited by such means as these, I occasionally suspended the whole school from reward, with the same result. Though in some cases, I believe, where only a few were concerned, the partially innocent has submitted to punishment rather than break his notion of honor, by confessing the name of the real culprit.

I have already adverted to the decided difference that appears between the boys from larger towns, especially London, and those from country districts. There is an intensity about the former, which characterizes them in a very marked manner. In the country indeed, one does not find those large associations of thieves of all ages, and many of them men of considerable talent, that exist in our largest towns, and therefore, among other points of difference, the intellect, in the one class of our young criminals, is much more active and more educated than in the other. It is not surprising, therefore, that among the regular practised thieves from London, I discovered what I had not anticipated, the existence of a systematic and theoretical, as well as practical infidelity, which they had picked up from their elder associates. My experience has not shewn me any approach to a similar evil in the simpler, but perhaps equally mischievous boys, coming from the country or country towns. On the contrary, strong sectarian prejudices, especially as Protestants or Roman Catholics, many of them rather amusingly, because very ignorantly, display. Of the general outlines of religious truth, I have found very few indeed, comparatively, wholly ignorant at the age at which they came to me. But having learned it as a task at School, it is very hard indeed to interest them in such teaching at all; the least difficulty existing where they do come, devoid of religious instruction altogether. The time for teaching indeed generally is to most of them, the most trying period of the day. The enforced stillness, their utter distaste to which, by inducing very many of them to play truant, originally led them into crime, the call upon them to fix their attention and the irksomeness of beginning the rudiments of reading, under the ordinary system, especially to the older ones, all oppose great obstacles to doing much in this way. Some things, especially, when orally taught, I found they are quick enough to apprehend; more than boys of their average age in our common schools. But the ordinary reading books suitable from the shortness of the words in which they are written, to their reading powers, are miserably behind the requirements of their minds. A set of reading books adapted to Ragged and Reformatory Schools, is a want which I long to see supplied. I think I have now touched upon most of the points, which attracted my attention during the time of my first experiment at Hardwicke, and which have been confirmed, and in a few particulars added to by the experience which I have been privileged to gain elsewhere. There is indeed one very important point, on which, however, I do not feel competent to speak, the results of the boys' labor in contributing to their support; my own opinion, adopted after I had been about two years at Hardwicke, was, that a boy is incapable of performing under any circumstances, sufficient amount of agricultural labor to provide himself with food. With grown men it is different; that they can do so, has been abundantly proved. But when one considers the necessary deductions from the working time of a boy at one of these Schools, and the necessity for finding work not always remunerative all the year round, I am at present little sanguine of a success of an approach to which I have only in one instance heard. So here I think my experiences must end, and in conclusion I can have no better wish, for this simple narrative of ideas and actions, than that it may be of some use to those who are engaged in a similar undertaking, or if I could anticipate that it might induce any one, who, like myself may be blessed with leisure and means, to enter upon a work, anxious indeed at times, but with many a bright light between, in which at least, he may be able in all humility to feel that he is endeavoring to offer an acceptable thank-offering to God the Father of all mercies, for all that he has received at His hands, by devoting himself to His service, in striving after the salvation of some poor little ones of those for whom His Son died.

The following interesting letter, shews the position of the Roman Catholic Reformatory Schools in England :—

Dear Sir Robert Throckmorton—I cannot do better than address you as Chairman of the meeting held last winter at Birmingham for founding a Catholic Reformatory at Mount St. Bernard, and over which you so ably presided, in order to make a few observations upon the progress of the undertaking, and the prospect of its speedy success.

Three weeks ago I had the opportunity of seeing the Colonie Agricole of Mettray, in France, the first, I believe, of this kind of Institution which was founded; and I also had the pleasure of seeing its founder, Mons. De Metz, from whom I obtained a great deal of information about the system on which the Colony of Mettray was founded and conducted with the most undeniable beneficial results. The success of the system is clearly expressed by the significant fact that out of every 100 boys sent to Mettray 90 are reformed. Mons. De Metz has been in England since then, and I have had further opportunity of conversation with him with especial reference to the Mount St. Bernard Reformatory, and I am desirous that the opinion he expressed in its favour should be generally known.

In my humble opinion a very wise step has been taken in discarding the name of Reformatory School, and substituting for it that of Agricultural Colony, a title which was entirely approved of by the Home Secretary, at the suggestion of the Government Inspector, Mr. Perry; and it is accordingly styled, in the paper of certification, "The Agricultural Colony at the Abbey of Mount St. Bernard." There is something grating to the feelings in the title Reformatory, while, on the other hand, that of Agricultural Colony will not preserve in the minds of the boys any idea of being sent there as criminals, but will rather stir up a sentiment of honourable pride and interest in the Institution which they will never lose.

The reasons assigned by Mons. De Metz for his warm approbation of a Colony undertaken by the Cistercian Monks, and for his sanguine expectation of its success under their superintendence, are principally three :—

1st.—That religion was the basis, for without it no human power can work out the reform of criminals. It has been well observed that without religion the reform of prisons may be effected, but without religion we shall never arrive at the reform of prisoners.

2.—That the teachers, instructors, and masters of trades, were themselves brothers (of the third order), receiving no stipend, but serving as unpaid volunteers in this noble work, for the glory of God and the love of souls, desirous to devote themselves wholly to the active work of reforming others.

3.—That the example of the Monks cannot fail to exercise a great influence over the boys, who will see that they derive no gain whatever from the Colony, but are themselves daily employed in the cultivation of their own lands, working harder and faring poorer than even the colonists themselves, who will soon learn to love and respect those who have sacrificed themselves for their benefit.

A fourth reason which Mons. De. Metz pointed out is, that under the care of Religious, who receive no remuneration, but perform the laborious task for the love of God and their neighbour, a colony can be established and maintained at a much less cost than one which is conducted by paid superintendents and teachers, which is a matter of some consideration.

Another great advantage in favour of the Colony at Mount St. Bernard is its locality. This is a point on which Mons. De Metz lays considerable stress, considering it to be highly conducive to the success of these Institutions that they should be placed in the country, in a retired situation, to avoid, as much as possible, communication with towns, which is not likely to prove of any benefit to them, and because in the country there is more freedom and less need of restraint, and fewer temptations to boys who are, as it were, prisoners on parole. Moreover, there is no doubt that the health of the boys would be better in the open country, employed in agricultural labour, than in the confined precincts of a town school.

All these advantages are remarkably well combined at Mount St. Bernard, where the Colony is placed in a retired position, with a great extent of uncultivated land around, distant from towns, apart from villages, in the very picturesque district of Charnwood Forest. The soil is sufficiently easy to work (which is very important for boys), and the climate is particularly healthy. I regret that Mons. De Metz was unable to visit the Colony during his stay in England, or I am sure he would have approved very highly of its situation. He had fixed a day for going to visit it, but was prevented by indisposition.

With so many important elements of success, and such favourable means already existing to work them, it may justly be hoped that the Mount St. Bernard Colony may become one of the first in England. A staff of ten brothers has been organized, and the Institution has been certified by the Government. The first colonist was sent there yesterday, I believe by the magistrates of Birmingham, and official notice has been received that several other boys will be sent very shortly. All that is wanted is the help and support of the public to provide the requisite funds.

At the meeting held at Birmingham last December—one of the most well-conducted, business-like meetings I ever attended—for which we were greatly indebted to your able presidency—it was resolved to purchase fifty acres of land adjoining the Abbey Farm, and for this purpose, as also for building and other initiatory expenses, to raise a sum of 4,000*l*. The land has been bought for 2700*l*., for which a deposit of 200*l*. was paid when the contract was entered into at the wish of the Committee of the Catholic Association at Birmingham, and the remaining 2500*l*. will have to be paid by the 1st of November next. The building is rapidly advancing, and part is even now ready. The Abbot has done all that is possible to expedite it, even, I believe, to the extent of advancing some of the Monastery funds; and it now remains for those who organized that meeting, and promoted the foundation of the Colony, to use their exertions to complete the sum of 4,000*l*. which they voted should be raised.

Up to the present moment I am informed that not 1000*l*. has yet been paid, and as it is important that the whole should be obtained before next November, I understand the Bishops of the four Midland dioceses—Birmingham, Northampton, Nottingham, and Shrewsbury—have requested Father John Jackson to proceed as soon as possible to the midland counties for the purpose of collecting donations and subscriptions.

The Colony has received the warm approbation of those Bishops who gave their active concurrence at the meeting, and no doubt will be equally supported by the cordial generosity and liberality of the nobility, gentry, and clergy, and all classes of the people.

Believe me to remain, dear Sir Robert Throckmorton,

Your's faithfully,

London, June 10, 1856.

CAMPDEN.

In our last RECORD we referred to the proposed plan of holding an exhibition of the various industrial products of the Reformatory Schools of the United Kingdoms. We subjoin an account of the exhibition, which we condense from The Philanthropist, of July 1st:—

The Industrial Exhibition, to which we called attention in our last number, was held at Willis's Rooms, on the 19th and 20th of June last. It was a happy thought on the part of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, to have an exhibition of the articles made by the inmates of some of the principal Reformatories and refuges of the country; and by carrying this thought out, they enabled the metropolitan public to judge of the progress the reformatory movement was making. Though we knew that many trades were being taught and many useful arts cultivated in several institutions, we were not prepared to see such results as were exhibited at Willis's rooms. The large room contained thirty stalls, on which was arranged various articles of human use, which had been made by the boys and girls of the following institutions: The Refuge for the Destitute, Royal Female Philanthropic, School of Discipline, Grotto Passage, Albert-street Refuge, London Reformatory, Brook-street Refuge, Maida Hill Refuge, Elizabeth Fry's Refuge, Training Refuge for Girls, Industrial Home, Bryan-street Refuge, Ragged School Shoe-black Society, Field-lane Night Refuge, Female Refuge and Cripples' Home, North West London Reformatory, Boys' Home, Wandsworth, St. Giles' and St. George's Refuges, Home in the East, Home for Female Children, Dolphin Court Girls' Refuge, Metropolitan Industrial Reformatory, Belvedere Crescent Ragged Factory, Britannia-court Refuge, Boys' Refuge, School for the Destitute, Paddington Home, East London Shoe-black Society, South London Shoe-black Society, Westminster Industrial School.

These institutions not only exhibited specimens of their manufacturers, but some of them sent specimens of their inmates, who were shown in different parts of the room, plying the different avocations they had been taught.

Prince Albert, who has thought over the subject of exhibitions as much as any man living, and who fully appreciates their industrial and moral advantages, visited the exhibition soon after it was opened. He examined minutely the various articles shown, and in several cases expressed his admiration. He took several things, such as mats, with him to Buckingham Palace, to be used by the Royal household. A goodly number of the nobility and gentry visited the exhibition during the two days it was opened. Many articles were sold, and more were ordered to be manufactured. We might mention, for instance, that Mr. Sidney Turner ordered one hundred iron bedsteads from the North-west London Reformatory.

One peculiarity of the exhibition was the variety of articles produced. The Redhill Farm School sent specimens of grass and crops now growing, also specimens of bread, butter, and cheese, produced on the farm. In another part of the room was a copy of Dr. Gill's Commentary, in six large volumes, which had been printed by youths. But perhaps one of the most encouraging things present was the copy of a religious newspaper, printed and edited in one of the cities of the United States by two young men, who, having passed through prisons, and afterwards through a well-known reformatory in London, subsequently crossed the Atlantic, and commenced business for themselves. The copy of the said newspaper, which was shown to us, was well printed, and exhibited encouraging signs of editorial ability. We have since seen a letter written by one of the young men themselves, addressed to a gentleman in London who formerly felt an interest in their welfare. The letter was full of gratitude and hope. It is almost impossible accurately to estimate the benefit which the reformation of these two young men may be instrumental in conferring on the world. They were first rescued from a life of crime in England, taught a useful trade, and what is of greater importance, they were deeply impressed with those solid and lasting obligations of duty and right which conserve human society, and those saving truths of the Gospel, which can alone fit them for citizenship in the kingdom of our Lord. They then crossed the Atlantic, and found a home in the new world, and new associations, where they are now encouraged by new aspirations, sustained by new resolves. They are now printers, proprietors, and editors of a journal, which advocates social progress and inculcates religious duties. A curious fact in relation to the exhibition is worth recording. Almost every article of dress which Mr. McGregor wore on the day of the exhibition was made by the boys or girls of various refuges and reformatories in England, Scotland, and Ireland. His trousers were made by the boys of the Boys' Refuge, Whitechapel; his waistcoat by the boys of the Ragged School, Cork; his shirt by the girls of the School of Discipline, Chelsea; his neck-tie was made by the girls of the Training Refuge, Lisson-street, London; his pocket-handkerchief by the girls of the Industrial School, Aberdeen; one sock by the St. Giles's Refuge, the other sock by the girls of the House of Refuge, Glasgow ; his pocket-book by the boys of the Home in the East ; his shoes by the boys of the Metropolitan Reformatory, Brixton ; and his shoes were blacked by the boys of the Ragged School Shoe-black Society, Maiden-lane, London.

Perhaps we shall be promoting the interests of the reformatory movement in general and the various institutions in particular, by mentioning in detail some of the articles made at some of the reformatories and their prices. We have insufficient materials by us to do this in anything like a lengthened or elaborate manner ; but we turn to the best account the facts and information we possess.

It will be a hopeful day in the history of this country when all our reformatories and industrial schools will be self-supporting ; and to bring them as closely as possible to that culminating point should be the desire of all interested in the movement. The poet has said, " A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind." The directors of schools, knowing the difficulties with which they have to contend, may imagine the condition of kindred institutions. We therefore think that reformatory schools should mutually buy from and assist each other. In one school, it may be, bedsteads are manufactured, and in another boots, and if by any arrangements bedsteads may be exchanged for boots, a mutual advantage might be realised. Imagine another case. Let us suppose a new reformatory school is about to be established in some part of the country. Boots, clothes, bedsteads, and other articles, are by necessity wanted ; and if they could be obtained at advantageous terms from any institution or institutions where such things are manufactured, it is desirable that they should. In order to facilitate any arrangements of the kind, we have deemed it advisable to give the following facts, which we collected at the Industrial Exhibition :—

THE CRIPPLES' HOME, Hill-street, Dorset-square, supplies bonnets, from 1s. to 6s. ; window mats, 4s. to 16s. ; boys' hats, from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. ; table mats, at 4s. 6d. per dozen ; fancy baskets, 1s. 6d. and 4s. ; soup ditto, from 1s. 6d. to 2s. ; small mats, at 1s. each ; carriage baskets, 4s. and 4s. 6d. each.

THE REFUGE FOR HOMELESS AND DESTITUTE BOYS, 17, Arthur-street, St Giles's, sent the following articles to the exhibition : 1 screw dining table, price 14l. ; 1 double desk, 1l. 15s. ; 6 forms, at 6s. 6d. each, 1l. 19s. ; fancy mats, at 5s. 4s. 3s. and 2s. a pair ; 6 pair of boots, at 7s. 6d. per pair, 2l. 5s. ; 8 suits of cord, at 25s. per suit, 10l. ; specimen firewood, at 5s. per 100.

THE REFUGE FOR DESTITUTE BOYS, Paddington-street, Marylebone, supplies Mats, from 2s. 6d. upwards ; Church hassocks, 7s. each ; ottomans, from 4s. each ; wood, 4s. per hundred ; Shoe-black boxes, 3s. 6d. ; fire aprons, 5s. ; hair picking, at three-farthings per pound.

THE HOME IN THE EAST produces scrubbing brushes from 3s. to 14s. per dozen ; stoves from 5s. to 10s. each ; cocoa sacks for exportation, 42 inches by 29½, at 9½d. each, with 2½ discount, and boys' clothing at manufacturers' prices.

THE KILMARNOCK REFORMATORY SCHOOL sent the following articles : Collars from 2s. to 4s. 6d. ; pairs of sleeves, from 3s. 6d. to 7s. ; collar and a pair of cuffs, at 6s. ; handkerchief at 7s. These articles attracted great attention, and works of a similar character might have sold to a considerable amount.

THE BIRMINGHAM FREE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL sent the following: one silk bed quilt at 4/.; 1 twill ditto at 1/ 11s. 6d.; hotwater tin, and covers at 10s. 6d.; knitted ottomans at 12s.; Boys' shoes at 10s.; girls' ditto, 8s.; a suit of boy's clothes at 1/ 8s. 9d. Book marks at 1s. 6d.

THE PERTH LADIES' HOUSE OF REFUGE sent boys' shirts at 2s. 4d.; gentlemen's socks at 1s. 6d. per pair; small ditto at 1s.; children's socks at 9d.; ladies open stockings at 2s. 5d.; pin cushions at 2s. each; hemming for quilts at 8d. per yard, &c.

THE RED LODGE sent the following to the Exhibition; Patchwork counterpane, 12s.; girl's frock (worn at Red Lodge), 4s. 6d.; bonnet, 1s. 6d.; lady's night dress, 7s. 6d.; gentleman's shirt, 6s.; boy's Sunday shirt 3s.; striped shirt, 2s. 6d. (or 2s. 3d. each per dozen), unbleached shirt, 2s. (or 1s. 9d. each per dozen); pair worsted stockings, 1s. 10d., two pair girl's cotton at 1s., 3s., 10d.; pair worsted socks, at 1s. 9d. and 1s. 1d.; samplers, 2s. 6d. each; Book-markers, 6d. each; crochet pincushion, 1s. 6d.; two knitted mats, at 1s., 3s., 6d.; two pair child's fine merino socks, at 1s. 2s.

THE SCHOOL OF DISCIPLINE, QUEEN'S-ROAD, WEST OCHLSEA.—

	Materials.		Making.
	s.	d.	s.	d.
Long-cloth shirt, fancy front	-	-	5	6 ... 8 0
Ditto, plain front	-	-	5	6 ... 2 6
Night-gown, worked trimming	-	-	12	0 ... 3 6
Ditto, with edged frills	-	-	11	0 ... 8 0
Dressing-jacket, worked trimming	-	-	13	6 ... 3 6
Ditto, lace trimming	-	-	7	6 ... 3 6
Chemise, 12s. 6d. each	-	-	9	6 ... 3 0
Gentlemen's collars	-	-	0	6 ... 0 4
Baby's shirts	-	-	1	6 ... 0 6
Ditto blankets	-	-	4	7 ... 1 0
Ditto caps	-	-	1	6 ... 1 0

PHILANTHROPIC FARM SCHOOL, RED HILL.—List of articles exhibited:—

Farm Produce—One bundle Rye; one ditto rye-grass (Italian); two fleeces South Down wool; four lbs. butter; two cottage four pound loaves.

Tailors' Shop—School clothing, jacket, vest, trousers; emigration, coat, vest, trousers, ditto, working suit of fustian, jacket, vest, trousers.

Shoemakers' Shop—One pair strong water-tights; one pair ditto, with iron tread for digging; one pair light Bluchers; one pair light ditto, with iron tips and heels.

Carpenters' Shop—Two emigration boxes; two mallets; two carpenter's squares; two gauges: one panel gauge; one brick mould; one post and rail.

Blacksmiths' Shop—One hand hoe; one hay fork, nails, staples, holdfasts, chain and iron work.

Brickmaking—Four specimens of society bricks, unburnt state; four ditto, burnt in clamp.

SALTLEY REFORMATORY.—Tailors' Shop—Doeskin trousers, French fronts, at 1*l.* 2*s.*; superfine frock coat, 2*l.* 17*s.*; superfine doeskin trousers, 1*l.* 1*s.*; double-breasted cord jacket, 10*l.* 6*d.*; cord trousers, 6*s.* 6*d.*; cord waistcoat, 3*s.* 10*d.*; moleskin waistcoat, 3*s.* 6*d.*; grambone Oxonian jacket, 14*s.*—Shoemakers' Shop—Riding boots, at 1*l.* 15*s.*; Bordeaux calf Wellingtons, 1*l.*; English calf Wellingtons, 18*s.*; Balmeral shooting boots, 17*s.*; dress boots, 10*s.* 6*d.*; ladies' side springs, 10*s.*; boys' lace-ups, 8*s.* 6*d.*; police Wellington boots, 10*s.* 6*d.*; police Blucher boots, 7*s.*; morning slippers, 6*s.*; workhouse womens' boots, 7*s.*; workhouse girls' boots, 4*s.*; workhouse boys' boots, 5*s.*

THE DUNDEE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.—Door mats, from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* 8*d.*; knee or housemaid mats, 1*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* 8*d.*; onion nets, 6*d.* to 8*d.*; onion or cabbage nets, 10*d.*; garden net, 1*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.*; salmon fishing net, 3*s.* 6*d.*; sheep net, 7*s.*; suit of boy's clothes, 10*s.*; pair of boy's boots, 6*s.*; girl's ditto, 6*s.*; packing boxes, 3*d.*; boy's shirts, 2*s.* 4*d.*; boy's shirtfronts, 10*d.*; cotton stockings, 10*d.* to 1*s.*; boy's socks, 1*s.*; cotton socks, 6*d.*

BELVEDERE-CRESCENT RAGGED FACTORY.—Parasol boxes of various kind, used by manufacturers to send their goods to retail dealers. Glove boxes for the same purpose. These are the staple articles manufactured, and the demand is constant. Fancy glove, handkerchief, envelope, and note-paper boxes, and ornamented boxes for the drawing-room, the prices ranging from 8*s.* 4*d.* to 3 guineas.

WANDSWORTH.—Boys' strong Blucher boots, from 6*s.* 6*d.*; men's Wellington boots from 13*s.*; lower ditto and clarence, from 8*s.*; ladies' leather boots, from 6*s.*; girls' leather boots, from 3*s.* 6*d.*; cloth goloshes, from 4*s.* 6*d.*—Tailoring—Boy's cord suit, from 10*s.* 6*d.*; ditto fustian, from 9*s.*; men's cloth suit, from 30*s.*; gentlemen's plain cloth coats, from 30*s.*; frock coats, silk facings, from 30*s.*; over coats, from 23*s.*; waistcoats, from 7*s.*

ROYAL FEMALE PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY.—Shirts, from 7*s.* to 12*s.*; chemise, 6*s.* to 10*s.*; invalid's sofa pockets, 5*s.* 6*d.*; gentlemen's collars, 8*s.* to 12*s.* per dozen; clergymen's bands and cases, 4*s.* 6*d.*; marked needlebooks, 2*s.* 6*d.* to 4*s.*

BOYS' REFUGE, Commercial-road, Whitechapel.—Carpentering—Boxes of skittles, 4*s.* 6*d.*; boxes of bricks, polished, 6*s.*; shoeblack box, 9*s.*; boxes of letter clips (mahogany), 4*s.* 6*d.*; chest of drawers, 9*s.* 6*d.*; polished chairs, 13*s.*; plain ditto, 10*s.* 6*d.*; child's table, 8*s.*; glass stands, 5*s.* 6*d.* per dozen; reading desk, 8*s.* 6*d.*; shoemaker's stools, 8*s.* 6*d.*—Tailoring—Suits (best), at 17*s.* 6*d.*; suit, apprentices, at 82*s.* 9*d.*; suit of fustian, at 14*s.* 6*d.*—Sailor's Outfit—Jacket, 14*s.*; pair of duck trousers, 2*s.* 9*d.*; pair of blue ditto, 6*s.*; serge shirt, 3*s.* 6*d.*—Shoemaking—Pair of gentlemen's shoes, 10*s.*; boys' Bluchers, 8*s.*; ladies' boots, 7*s.* 6*d.*; girls', 6*s.* 6*d.*

MAIDA HILL REFUGE.—Sailors' outfit, working men's clothes, paper bags for grocers, &c. Prices not attached.

GLASGOW FEMALE REFUGE—Shirts, from 2*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.*; socks, from 2*s.* upwards.

GLASGOW MALE REFUGE.—West of England doe trousers, 1*l.* 5*s.*; embroidered vest, 12s. 6d.; twill grey Scotch tweed, 2l. 15s.; ditto shepherd tweed, 3l. 7s.; Highland dress sack, velvet, 1l. 18s. 6d.; boots and shoes of all kinds, from 5s. 6d. to 1l. 5s.; boys' Highland shoes, 8s.; boys' shoes, 8s. 6d.

BROOK-STREET BAGGED SCHOOL, New-road.—Open new and old hair, wool and cocoa-nut fibre, from  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 1d. They supply also bundles of wood.

THE WESTMINSTER INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.—Printers and paper bag makers. Per gross, from 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 1s. 4d. Printers' circulars, address cards, bill heads, &c., from 1s. per 100 to 5s. per 1,000.

THE SALTLEY REFORMATORY, Birmingham, sent a great variety of boots and shoes from 7s. up to 1l., and one pair of red morocco slippers was much admired by the Prince.

THE WANDSWORTH REFORMATORY sent a variety of tailoring and carpenter's work—the latter of which excited great admiration.

THE BLOOMSBURY REFUGE sent needlework of a variety of descriptions and various prices. The list of articles was too long for insertion in this number.

A conversazione was held at Willis's Rooms on the first evening of the Exhibition, at which the friends and members of the Reformatories and Refuge Union attended. The following passages from the report of the meeting are interesting:—

Mr. Macgregor then gave the following account of the metropolitan institutions: My Lords, Ladies, and Gentlemen, it was difficult, till lately, to ascertain the names of the metropolitan institutions. Those who had laboured for ten years in the cause, were unacquainted with the names of some of them. I have been told, and it really seems to have been true of these metropolitan Reformatories, that when vultures are not seen in a country where they live, you have only to put on the ground a leg of mutton, and go away, and you will soon see far-off specks upon the horizon—the scent of their prey has called forth the vultures. (Hear, hear). And so it was with these institutions. (Laughter). We did not know even the names of some of them; but we had no sooner announced that we had money to give away, than they all came forth. (Renewed laughter). There are four for adult males, with 217 inmates and room for 163 more; ten for boys, with 315 inmates and room for only two more; four for adult females, with 148 inmates and room for twenty-eight more; nine for girls, with twenty-five inmates and room for seventy-six more. Besides these, there are three Shoe Black Societies, which employ 135 boys, and the Westminster Refuge, which employs thirty, making a total of thirty-one metropolitan institutions, with 931 inmates and room for 359 more. (Loud cheers). The first three institutions in London were started for girls; but in 1852 alone, there were six refuges founded. The whole of these institutions, thirty-two in number, are described—each occupying a page—in the pamphlet which is now in the hands of most of you. These institutions are for all classes; some of them are for those who have been long in crime, and others are to prevent those falling into it who are placed in the way of temptation. Some afford only temporary shelter and temporary employment. Some are for cripples, some are for the young, and some for the mature criminal, and one of these, I believe, even shelters two babies; but although distinguished from each other by so many differences, there are two points of similarity common to all of them; in the first place, they all of them teach the Bible to the inmates; and, in the second place, they are all disposed to receive a cheque upon Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith. (Hear, hear, and laughter). We shall always encourage them in the one, and we intend, on this occasion, to gratify them in the other. (Hear, hear). There is one exception, however, and that is the Red Shoe Black Society, which is self-supporting. (Cheers). This meeting arises out of the meeting at the Mansion House, which we owe to the Brixton Reformatory, and the exertions of Mr. Robert Hanbury, Mr. Gurney Hoare, and two or three others. We have collected the sum of £2,600, of which £1,600 will be distributed this evening. The institutions whose inmates are chiefly adults, are less supported by the public than the new institutions for boys; we have thought it better, therefore, to assist them more liberally than we do the others. We shall, therefore, give to these institutions for every adult, male or female, £2, and for every boy or girl, £1 10s., and accommodation provided, but not occupied, will be taken into consideration. You will excuse me appearing in this morning costume, and allow me to inform you that the two separate articles of wearing apparel which I have now upon me, are respectively the produce of ten separate reformatory institutions. (Loud cheers). These institutions are spread over the country. (Hear, hear.) Let us endeavour to keep up these institutions; we have certainly received pleasure, profit, and instruction from them, and let us recollect that it is more blessed to give than to receive. (Applause.)

The Earl of Shaftesbury said: My worthy friend, Mr. Macgregor, has, I think, hardly made it sufficiently clear that he is 'figged out,' as the phrase goes—(laughter)—in ten articles of clothing, manufactured in ten different Reformatories, situate in ten different districts of Great Britain and Ireland. (Applause). We will now proceed to the distribution of the fund to the representatives of the various institutions. The list was as follows:—Refuge for the Destitute, Dalston, 160*l*.; Royal Female Philanthropic (Miss Nene), 92*l*.; School of Discipline (Mrs. Shaw), 69*l*.; Albert-street Refuge (Mr. Williams), 58*l*.; Maida Hill (Mr. Pearson), 18*l*.; Elizabeth Fry's Refuge, 35*l*.; Refuge for Destitute Girls, Lisson-street, 52*l*.; Industrial Home, Peckham, 18*l*.; Bryan-street Refuge (Mr. Worth), 34*l*.; Cripples' Home, 43*l*.; N. W. London Reformatory (Mr. Bowyer), 116*l*.; St. Giles' and St. Georges' Reformatory (Mr. Williss), 107*l*.; Home for Female Children, Dacre-street, 60*l*.; Home in the East, Old Ford, Bow, 61*l*.; Dolphin-court Refuge, 29*l*.; Metropolitan Refuge, Brixton, 114*l*.; Belvidere Crescent Refuge, 38*l*.; Britannia-court Refuge, 16*l*.; Boys' Refuge, White-chapel, 150*l*.; School for Destitute, Coburg-row, 18*l*.; Paddington Home, 301; Grotto-passage Refuge, Paddington-street, 241; Brook-street Refuge, 241; Field-lane Night Refuge, 401; Westminster Industrial School, 201; South London Shoeblack Society, 201; East London Shoeblack Society, 201; London Refuge, 851.

The following important minute, of the Committee of Council on Education, will be read with interest, by all advocates of the Reformatory Principle:—

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, on the 2nd of June, 1856, the Lords of the Committee on Education of Her Majesty's most Hon. Privy Council, resolved to continue the grants at present made in aid of field gardens and workshops annexed to common elementary day schools, but as regards "ragged or reformatory schools," to cancel all existing minutes, and to provide as follows (no school being admissible to aid under this minute, unless it be industrial in its character, and unless the scholars be taken exclusively from the criminal or abandoned classes):—

1. To pay half the rent.
2. To pay one-third of the annual cost of tools and of raw material for labour.

3. To make grants towards the cost of books, maps, and apparatus, upon the same terms as to other schools.

4. In order to encourage the preparation of suitable schoolmasters for employment in such institutions, to grant the sum of £35 to the treasurer of any reformatory school, in respect of every person qualified as next undermentioned, who shall have been boarded, lodged, and trained, as a master in such reformatory school during a period of twelve months, viz.:

- (a). All teachers of common elementary day schools holding certificates of merit, or registered.

- (b). All teachers of workhouse schools holding certificates of efficiency.

- (c). All students in normal colleges under inspection, who shall have resided therein not less than one year, and shall have successfully passed the examination at the end of the year before Her Majesty's inspectors of schools.

Their Lordships also resolved to reimburse to the said treasurer any sum not exceeding £6, which it may have been found necessary to advance for the purpose of travelling or personal expenses to such persons in training.

The conditions of all such grants to be:

- (a). That the reformatory contains at least forty inmates, and be sanctioned or certified by the Secretary of State, under the Acts 17 and 18 Vict., c. 74 and c. 86.

- (b). That Her Majesty's inspectors of schools recommend the school, from year to year, as a suitable place in its character and arrangements for receiving masters into training for reformatory schools.

- (c). That payment of the grant be made by quarterly instalments; and that the same certificates of good conduct be required from the principal of the institution on behalf of each person in training, as are now required in the case of Queen's scholars.

5. To grant half the salary agreed to be paid by the managers to every master and to every assistant master, in any ragged or reformatory school, in the following ratio:—

For any number of inmates not exceeding 25, 1 master; between 25 and 50, 1 master, 1 assistant.

An additional assistant to be allowable for every 25 additional inmates above 50; and an additional master (instead of an assistant) for the first 25 inmates after every 100; these allowances giving 1 master and three assistants as the ordinary staff for every 100 inmates.

Every master, if untrained, must be upwards of 25 years old, and every assistant upwards of 18 years old. Industrial instructors may be counted as assistants.

If the salary agreed by the managers to be paid to an assistant exceed half of that of a master in the same school, the excess will not be reckoned in calculating the sum to be reimbursed by the Committee of Council on Education.

Her Majesty's inspectors of schools must report favourably in each year for which the grant is paid, with especial reference to the following points:—

(a). That the ability and character of the schoolmaster and assistants are satisfactory.

(b). That habits of obedience, cleanliness, and order, are enforced in the school.

6. To grant as capitation, upon every child (according to the number in average attendance during the year preceding the annual inspection), who is not paid for by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury under the Act 17 and 18 Vict., c. 86, the sum of 50s. per annum, provided that such child be fed at the school.

On Thursday, June 26th, Mr. Miles, M.P., and Rev. Sydney Turner, as a deputation from the National Reformatory Union, had an interview with Sir George Grey, on the subject of these Minutes:

The Deputation represented that the preliminary qualifications of the candidate for training had been fixed too high, and that they were likely to exclude many who would be morally and religiously fit for the work. This was more especially the case as regards workhouse schools. It would be far better to allow candidates of all classes to offer themselves; and to test them before they were admitted to training by a specific examination, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were qualified to give elementary instruction.

Sir George Grey said, in reply, that the Committee of Education were anxious to raise the intellectual standard of the Reformatory teachers; and that in allowing all persons who satisfied the inspector of the school of their character and ability to be employed as master and assistant (as the fifth clause of the minute did,) room enough had been left for all special cases of moral fitness. He added, that generally it would be sufficient if the candidate was able to teach reading, writing, and arithmetic, and was fairly acquainted with history and geography. With regard to workhouse schools, he thought that the minute would be open to modification, so as to admit those who had certificates of competency.

The Deputation urged that the inspectors employed should be inspectors of workhouse schools, they being best acquainted with industrial training and domestic management.

Sir George Grey said, that they would, in all probability, be the inspectors commonly employed.

The Committee of Patronage of the National Reformatory Union issued a series of questions last July, to the Managers of Certified Reformatories, soliciting information as to the mode adopted by them for providing for the children who have left their schools. It is intended to issue a Report founded on the answers to these questions, which, it is hoped, will lay down some uniform plan of patronage capable of being worked throughout the whole kingdom.

In the Nineteenth Report of the Inspectors of Prisons, which has just been issued, several passages occur which bear strongly on the Reformatory question. Among them is a statement of the results of 29 cases of juvenile offenders sent to different Reformatories from the Liverpool prison. Out of this number, 7 have done well; 11 are in the way of doing well; 7 are still doubtful; 2 have so far failed; 2 are hopelessly lost. All, with one exception, though young in years, were old in crime. The chaplain gave it as his opinion that not one out of the 29 could ever have been reclaimed by prison discipline. On economical grounds alone, such facts as these show the value of Reformatory institutions.

The following most interesting letter, will be read with infinite pleasure by all the friends of M. Demetz, and of Mettray. The letter was addressed to the editor of The Spectator, and appeared in the number of that journal, for June 27th.

“London, 19th June, 1856.

Sir,—At this moment, when so much of public attention is directed to the subject of Reformatory Schools for young offenders, it seems to me that interest will be felt in the following narrative of the services rendered to the inhabitants of Tours, during the recent inundations, by a detachment of boys from the colony of Mettray, the principal establishment of the kind in France, founded sixteen years ago by M. de Metz. It is an extract from a private letter, received a few days ago from M. Verdier, well known for his zealous co-operation in the objects of the colony, evinced in the patronage of the boys after they have quitted it for the active duties of life.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN G. PERRY.

"I will not endeavour to give you a description of the disasters caused by the inundations under which France is now suffering, or of the touching scenes to which they have given rise. These have been already fully described in the newspapers. Our Colonists of Mettray have earned their page in this history of desolation and of devotedness. You would hardly believe with what ardour, with what courage, these boys encountered the dangers to which they have been exposed. One of the most perilous posts was assigned to them, and they maintained themselves in it with undaunted resolution. They had to defend what is called 'the head of the town'—that is to say, they had to sustain the dykes which protect Tours against the threatened invasion of the Loire and the Cher. For forty-eight hours they were at their post, to the number of three hundred, having no other shelter than the canopy of heaven, and all working with a degree of vigour which would have done honour to men. From the example of their excellent chiefs they derived strength to put in practice the principles which education has implanted, and which increase in their hearts from day to day. Their youth and agility enabled them to do wonders. The waters of the Loire having burst their banks, united themselves to those of the Cher, producing a frightful gulph which threatened the destruction of a part of the town. Our boys, with unparalleled alacrity, filled with earth the bags designed to arrest the raging waters, ran off with them to the most dangerous places; sometimes forming embankments, sometimes filling-in the holes which were being hollowed out in the dykes by the liberated flood. In short, it was due to their efforts that the principal dyke was not broken through. They were more fortunate in escaping injury than a poor man (Frère de la Doctrine Chrétienne) who was working with them. This man, after giving an example of devotion and courage almost superhuman, was all at once overbalanced by the weight of a bag of earth which he was throwing into the impetuous torrent, and perished, a victim of his heroism! Happily, we had no similar calamity to deplore. All our boys returned punctually to the call of the trumpet; not a single individual thought of availing himself of the opportunity of escape afforded by the general confusion. Every one of them felt that he had been brought to work, and executed nobly what he had undertaken. Meat and wine had been prepared to sustain the strength of the workmen. Our colonists refused all food but what came to them from the colony, with the single exception of wine at the rate of a bottle to every eight boys. * * * The colony has now resumed its normal condition and its ordinary labour, and has had the satisfaction of rendering services of other kinds to the victims of the inundation. A reserve of vegetables and grain has been presented to the sufferers for recropping the land left by the retiring water. Besides this, there have been received at the colony more than a hundred horses, chiefly belonging to the garrison of Tours; it has been the place of refuge for the soldiers and officers of the garrison, as well as for the pupils and professors of the college. It has also been the asylum of many unfortunates possessing no longer any place to call their own. All our masters have distinguished themselves on the occasion; their wives too have devoted themselves to rendering assistance to the unfortunate. You know our teacher of navigation, a sailor, the chief of one of the families; he was appointed to organise the service of the life-boat in the flooded parts of the town; in short, every one has laboured in the cause heartily and disinterestedly. Monsieur De Metz was overjoyed to see so much good effected by his boys. You know well his devotedness to them. It was, indeed, a great joy, a gratifying reward to him, to see these poor boys, who had been looked upon with despair by others, redeeming themselves so brilliantly, and regaining that position in society which ought to be enjoyed by all who imbibe good principles and know how to profit by them. At this moment more than at any previous time our boys are accepted by public opinion.* For my own part, I find the utmost consolation in the reflection that these boys, who have deserved so well of their country, have not been branded by its laws. You are well aware that they have never undergone condemnation. The Courts, in consideration of their youth, have declared their offences committed without discernment, and have accordingly acquitted them: ordering, however, that they should be detained in the Maison de Correction, which you call the Reformatory School. Thus, the services rendered to us in the midst of our calamities have not been received from a condemned criminal. We can bless our benefactor without regret and without mental reservation. We are not obliged to say, 'What a pity he should have commenced life by a condemnation!' It is the condemnation that brands the individual. I can assure you that it was with anguish of heart that I learned that your young offenders must inevitably undergo condemnation before they can be admitted into Reformatory Schools."

In The Spectator of July 5th, there appeared, from the Recorder of Birmingham, the following letter bearing upon that of M. Verdier:—

PUNISHMENT AND REFORMATION—FRENCH AND ENGLISH SYSTEMS.

Heath House, Stapleton, Bristol, 30th June, 1856.

Sir—The calamity which has afflicted France by the overflow of her great rivers will not be without its alleviating consequences. Doubtless, the sympathy evinced in England for the sufferers must strengthen the bonds of alliance between ourselves and our neighbours.

---

* We learn with high gratification that the Municipal Council of the City of Tours has commemorated the service of the youths of Metray by striking a medal to their honour.

The very interesting letter which you published last week narrating the services rendered by the youths of Mettray in aiding to protect the city of Tours against its threatened destruction by the floods, will, I trust, cause many a mind to reflect on the value and efficacy of the Reformatory principle. To the French, the circumstance that an important body like the Municipal Council of Tours should have struck a medal in honour of these poor lads, so lately worse than outcasts, will speak in language calculated to produce a very strong impression.

On our side of the Channel, we consider ourselves as less affected by demonstrations of this kind than by the facts which draw them forth; but surely an examination of the facts themselves can only deepen any impression produced by such a testimonial. The zeal, courage, devotedness, and power of endurance, manifested by these lads, their cheerful submission to discipline, and the absence of all attempt to use the position in which accident had placed them to advance any sinister objects, must be received wherever the narrative is read as a conclusive proof that Reformatory institutions are not the toys of sentimental visionaries; that they hold out no incentives either to crime or to indolence; but that in whatever light they are contemplated, whether in that of a wise benevolence or in that of the narrowest economy, they are equally to be approved, supported, and multiplied.

With regard to the system of Mettray, in particular, what has occurred will disabuse the minds of many excellent persons of a belief that the military observances which are practised at the Colonie are useless and even pernicious. That they are not useless, may, I think, be fairly inferred from the success with which three hundred lads combined their labour, and, while not shrinking from danger, avoided accident. That they are not pernicious, is an inference to be drawn from every circumstance of the case.

The inventors of military discipline were driven by a cogent necessity to adopt and to perfect the principle of order and simultaneous action as illustrated in their drill; but this principle is not essentially connected with the military spirit, and when divorced from it becomes a valuable assistant whenever large bodies of human beings, old or young, are called upon to act in harmonious combination. An army is and must be a many-handed, many-footed animal, directed by a single head. Therefore, to teach the individual soldier to keep his will in very close subjection to that of his commander, is a lesson essential to the very existence of the body of which he is a member; but the object in view at Mettray, as at every other well-conducted Reformatory, is to develop in its inmates the power of self-government—that is to say, of putting the will under the control of its owner—the owner being so taught and so trained as to acquire the faculty of using this power to his own permanent advantage and to that of the community to which he belongs.

In writing thus, I am far from meaning to disparage our armies, of whom no man thinks more highly. But the end in view being different, there is and must be a corresponding diversity in the means.

The concluding remarks in M. Verdier's letter seem to call for some notice.

M. Verdier deplores the fate of English juvenile offenders in their being subjected to condemnation, or as we should say, in being convicted; and contrasts their treatment in this respect with that which the same class meets with under the law of France. There, if the jury believe that a prisoner under sixteen years of age has committed his offence from thoughtlessness or want of knowledge, he is acquitted, as having acted "sans discernment," just as in England a person of unsound mind who has committed an offence is found "not guilty on the ground of insanity"; and as with us the lunatic thus acquitted is detained in confinement, so the courts of France have the power of detaining the juvenile offender until he is twenty years of age, or for any less period of time. But as regards all other penal consequence his acquittal is considered to be unqualified. Condemnation, however, in France and in England, with regard to such of its attributes as press on the kind spirit of M. Verdier, differs materially. In France, a convicted offender suffers "la dégradation civique,"—which, among other privations, excludes him from voting at elections; prevents him from wearing any decoration—an incapacity very galling to French nature; he cannot be a jurymen; as a witness his evidence is received with many restrictions—for instance, he can attest no instrument; he can take no part in the family council, a domestic forum endowed with important privileges and much considered; except to his own children he cannot fill the office of guardian; he is deprived of the right to carry arms; he can neither serve in the National Guard nor in the Army or Navy; he cannot keep a school, and cannot be employed in any except servile offices. This is a fearful catalogue of disabilities, and is evidently regarded by M. Béranger, the President of the Court of Cassation, from whose valuable work, De la Répression Pénale, I extract it, as by no means creditable to the French code.

In England both the law and the habits of thinking prevalent among the people place all offenders, and more especially the juvenile class, in a far better position. Nevertheless, although I am unable to view the consequences of a conviction in England in the light in which they naturally strike a Frenchman, yet I should be glad to see our law made to conform, as regards juvenile offenders, with that of the Code Napoléon,

I am, &c.

M. D. HILL.

---

The name of the Recorder of Birmingham reminds us, that, in his Charge delivered to the Grand Jury, assembled at the Borough Sessions, held at Birmingham, Monday, July 7th, Mr. Hill addressed to the jury, some very important observations on the subjects of the necessity for a more stringent code of legislation against receivers of stolen goods, and likewise upon a subject of equally grave importance, the inutility of short imprisonments, particularly when considered in relation with our present, in many cases maudlin, system of light punishment.

Mr Hills Charge is as follows—quoted from The Midland Counties Herald of July 10th, 1856, a journal devoting considerable space to all matters connected with the Reformatory Movement, and with Education in the Mining Districts.

Gentlemen, in one or two of the cases to come before you, persons will be indicted for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen. I have no doubt that you will agree with me that that is a dangerous offence; and that such persons stand in the place of employers of thieves—stand in the same relation to the thief that the honest master manufacturer does to the honest workman—that is to say, furnish him with the capital by which his operations are carried on. It has been often said, and with perfect truth, that if there were no receivers, there would be no thieves; because a thief cannot live upon the consumption of the articles which he may steal, many of them not being capable of being so used; he lives then by taking the articles to the capitalist—the criminal capitalist—who buys them at a reduced rate, and who thereby supplies the thief with money for the purposes of his maintenance. It has always, therefore, been thought of great importance that such offenders should be severely punished, but the difficulties of conviction are very great, insomuch that since I have sat here, now a period of seventeen years, I have had before me very few indeed of these capital receivers. Now and then some casual receivers have been brought before me, but their cases were not of a nature to render their detection very useful to the community. With regard to the individual cases to come before you I shall say nothing, knowing as I do how competent you are to deal with them according to their deserts. At the same time, allow me to observe, that the difficulties which stand in the way of convicting the practised receiver of stolen goods who keeps a shop for taking in this kind of property, have turned the attention of many persons to consider whether a trade of this kind ought to be permitted to be an open trade, and whether it should not be controlled and regulated by license. If there were licenses for such shops, they should only be granted on one condition. No person should receive a license unless he could show that he was a respectable person, by bringing the signatures in his favour of a given number of persons—householders of known honesty and integrity. Again, it has been proposed that all such houses should be so constructed as not to be out of the observation of the police, and that the occupiers of them should be required to keep a book containing an account of the articles purchased by them, and the names of those persons who bring them. All this has been done in the town of Liverpool, and perhaps elsewhere. Certainly we know that this course has been followed at Liverpool, under the powers of a local act; and I am informed that the results are very beneficial—that it has restrained and diminished the number of thefts, by throwing impediments in the way of the thieves disposing of stolen property, because they dare not take it to a really respectable man for fear of detection, and must take it to a person who either positively and absolutely knows that it has been stolen, or at all events shuts his eyes, and takes care not to know that the article is stolen. As to nice distinctions between one man and another in such cases, I will not attempt to draw them. The line, indeed, which separates them is very fine, and I will not occupy your time in endeavouring to trace it. If, however, we could have in Birmingham such a regulation, I think we should find it to act as usefully here as it has done in Liverpool, where, I understand, it was principally adopted to prevent thefts in cotton, Liverpool being the great port for that staple article, which is required to an enormous amount for the manufactures of Lancashire. Here it would be principally useful in preventing thefts of metal, in which most of the trades are carried on, and the effect is to furnish great temptations to the working people, and especially to the young. The great body of the artisans of the town are, I firmly believe, far raised by moral character above such temptations, but they do fall with great weight upon the young and inexperienced; and it would be a great blessing, not only to the owners of property which is liable to be stolen, but to all, high and low, connected with the town, and indirectly to the inhabitants of the country, if a check could be given to those nefarious practices. I am informed by his worship the Mayor, who sits by my side, that the local bill, which was prepared to be submitted to Parliament this session, contained a provision for this object, copied from the local act in operation at Liverpool. I regret to find that the bill was not prosecuted, as to the cause of which I may not be correctly informed, as it is no part of my duty to obtain an accurate knowledge of such questions; but I do say, that the particular clause, of the insertion of which I am cognisant from a draft of the bill having been sent me, was likely to have been exceedingly useful to the town of Birmingham, and I regret that the measure was not submitted to Parliament. I trust that on a future occasion it may have a better fate. There is only one further observation which I have to make, and it is this, that I see no amelioration in one important particular, for if our treatment of criminals had been well adapted to reform them, we should not have had such a list as comes before us to-day. There are ninety-five prisoners for trial; and with regard to more than one-half the number, they are persons who have previous convictions recorded against them, and who consequently have not been deterred by the fear of encountering punishment from repeating their offences, or reformed by the discipline to which they were subjected. Now, gentlemen, the main reason why the latter object is not attained is this, that they are not under the control of the prison authorities for a sufficient length of time. How can you expect a person, old or young, to undergo any decided change of character during a confinement of a fortnight, a month, two months, or three months?—and until public opinion, instead of complaining of harshness when prisoners are committed for long periods, is led to perceive that it is a kindness even to the offenders, to place them under circumstances by which their character may be reformed, and that it is a false notion of kindness to desire that they should be speedily exempted from discipline, I can see no ground on which we can fairly expect any diminution of the evil. I am afraid that until this conviction forces itself upon the public mind, the duties of grand jurors will year by year become more onerous. I believe that commitments for short periods are a sort of education in crime. A prisoner discovers that imprisonment can be better borne than he imagined; and finding, when he comes out of prison, that the difficulties of maintaining himself by honest means are greatly increased, and having lost his dread of the gaol, and, what is worse than all, having lost friends in the honest classes of society, and acquired them among those who look favourably upon him in proportion as he became more unprincipled, sinks still lower into the depths of iniquity. Sentences must be passed in accordance with public opinion, and it is often impracticable to resort to such as would be very humane, and indeed are sanctioned by law, because the principle on which they would be based is not generally recognised, and its partial operation would engender the feeling that offences were punished not according to their magnitude, but to the district in which they were committed. Every year, the public are becoming more and more sensitive on this subject, and punishments are becoming lighter and lighter. I am now an old man, and have been engaged in the duties of my profession nearly forty years, and when I contrast the state of punishments, as I first knew them, with what they now are, the change is enormous. In many respects that change has been for the better, but I think that we are now running into a dangerous extreme of an opposite kind, and that if the system of light punishments is to be persevered in, we had better have no punishments at all. They neither deter nor reform, whereas they have the bad effect of bringing poor creatures into contact with those who are worse than themselves, and teaching them to pursue a life of crime.

There are few men in these kingdoms more worthy to be heard on the subject of Reformatory training, than the Rev. Sydney Turner; and he now comes before us as a lecturer on that most important of all subjects, connected with the full developement of the Reformatory Principles—the Training of Reformatory School Teachers. His lecture, delivered before the National Reformatory Union, last June, is as follows;—we take it from The Law Amendment Journal:—

GENERAL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION

The Lord Bishop of St. David's took the chair soon after half-past two o'clock, in the afternoon of the 24th.

Among the others present were—Lord A. Churchill, Hon. W. W. Addington, Dean of Salisbury, Mr. W. Miles, M.P., Mr. Adderley, M.P., Rev. Sydney Turner, Captain Maconochie, Mr. E. B. Wheatley, Mr. Silver, Mr. L. Lewis, Mr. Dunn, Mr. E. Webster, &c.

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and confirmed.

The Rev. Sydney Turner read the following paper on a normal school for Reformatory schoolmasters.

TRAINING OF TEACHERS FOR REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

My Lord and Gentlemen,—The subject on which you have done me the honour to request me to address you, the training of Reformatory Schoolmasters, is one of the most important that the friends of Reformatory action can have before them.

The Reformatory teacher is undoubtedly just now the one thing specially wanting to give efficiency and permanence to our efforts for the rescue of the youthful criminal. Every one who has practically interested himself in this good work must have felt how much the success of his exertions depends on the qualities and capacities of the agent, the teacher, and master he employs. Many have had the painful experience that money may be raised, premises secured, friends enlisted, a school founded and filled, and yet all end in disappointment, or be attended with continual discouragement and difficulty, from the want of a superintendent and manager capable of really influencing the minds and softening the hearts of the pupils placed under his control.

There is nothing to surprise us in this. A man must be qualified to build a cottage or make a road; how much more to form a man an honest, faithful, intelligent, useful, above all a Christian man; how much more still to do this when the elements and materials to be employed have been distorted and injured—when we have much to undo before we can begin to mould and form at all—when perverted feelings, blunted conscience, low habits, have to be dealt with; and you undertake the task, not merely of enlightening and teaching ignorance, but of turning the neglected and corrupted child from license to self-restraint, from lawlessness and vice to order, decency, and goodness.

I know that there are many, even among the friends of the Reformatory cause, who think that in views like these we exaggerate the difficulty—many who think that any man who can wield a spelling book, or handle a spade, will do—that you have merely to say to the young criminal, come learn, and he learns; or go dig, and he digs; and as he learns and digs, he reforms. I have not found it so. I have seen the young criminal become week by week a more ripened scholar, and a more finished and industrious labourer, and yet in no effectual manner armed against the seductions of lust and sensuality—in no way weaned from the practice of dishonesty and fraud. I speak of course of the town boy more than the country one—of the boy of London, Leeds, Manchester, &c., more than all. I speak, that is, of the vast majority, those whose depravity and vice really trouble us—whose reclamation and care we really are concerned in; for I may frankly say that if the youthful crime of the large towns, &c., be done away with, we might almost cease to vex ourselves with that of the country; the latter is comparatively so light, so easy to be dealt with as to depth and permanence, that one might almost leave it to the pauper schools to remedy. It is the town-bred union of vice and crime that offers us the real field of battle ; and to cope with the boy who has haunted the theatre and the singing-room, who is tainted with the filth of the brothel and the lodging-house, who has kept or being kept by his girl, and swag-gered at the gaff and the skittle-ground, an agent of a far higher class is required. The man who can meet such boys as these, thus unhappily precocious in sin and backward in virtue or wisdom, often unbelievers, and almost always virtually heathens, who can wrestle with them on their own ground, and can at once win their confidence, compel their respect, and attach their affections, is not to be found every day in the highways and hedges. You cannot send to Birmingham or Manchester and order so many gross of them to pattern. They are to be found, or they are to be formed, but you must seek for them and take measures for their preparation.

The question for us to answer is, How are such men as can and will do the work to be obtained ?

In considering this, I would first dispose of two opposite prescriptions, both of which I believe to be equally fallacious.

We are sometimes told that the man can't be formed at all, that, like the poet, Nascitur, non fit. I do not believe this. Speaking from my own experience, I should say that the less we have to do with heaven-born geniuses, miracles of talent and mental power, the better. They are sure to be fitful, crotchety, and capricious ; and are generally either above, or unsuited to, the plain practical work—the daily routine of individual oversight and care—the minute domestic management, in which the successful reformatory master finds so many sources of his influence, so many means and methods of attaching his boys personally to him.

The man we want is indeed one of special qualifications and endowments ; but his qualities are, happily, not so extraordinary, nor his endowments so difficult to impart, as to reduce us to the necessity of sitting down in silent resignation to see what God will send us.

On the other hand, there are many who think that such men can be infallibly formed by a mere process of training alone—that you have only to put them through a certain course of study and examination to ensure their turning out what you want, as the clay put in at one end of the machine is delivered at the other the finished brick or drain tile. This I must equally deny, till at least I see some methods of training adopted, and some normal schools and colleges in action, which will ensure me teachers satisfied with their station, content to do their duty in the state of life they are called to—anxious for moral success rather than intellectual show—learned in the spirit and temper of the Gospel, rather than skilled in Blackstone or mechanics—modest, not conceited—patient, not ambitious—ready to help the backward and feel for the dull, rather than to push on the clever, and make a display of the well-taught and forward.

I cannot but be struck with the remarkable fact that one principal result of our present training systems is to dispose those who profit the most by them to take almost any other path in life than that which they have been trained for. On a recent occasion I advertised for a secretary and accountant at Redhill. Nearly half of the applicants were schoolmasters, a large proportion of these trained, and many successful, some distinguished in their position.

Now, if one thing more than another is wanted to make a man really efficient and so victorious as a Reformatory agent, it is that his mind and his heart should be given to his work—that he should feel himself fixed in it and contented with it. If he is for ever looking out for something that is easier, or higher in rank, or better in emolument, there is at once an end of his usefulness, and so too if he is always anxious for praise and notoriety, and looks on his charge as a scene for the display and advertisement of his talents and attainments, rather than as a field that he must cultivate in faith, working as the missionary whose praise is not of men but God.

Till, therefore, we have managed to place our training schools on that footing, and to give them that spirit that those who are prepared in them love and follow their profession, and make it the business of their life, and in following their profession aim less at public exhibition, and more at lasting moral influence and effect, I must remain a sceptic as to the success of our present educational institutions in turning out the right men for our Reformatory work.

Let us pass on, however, to enquire what are the requisites of an efficient Reformatory teacher, and how these may be secured. I should be disposed to divide them into three branches—natural, artificial, and spiritual. I think he must have at least two natural qualifications, constitutional characteristics.

1st. He must be a man of good, kindly temper, not easily ruffled, not apt to worry himself or fidget others by his fits of nervous irritability or morbid depression, more ready to laugh than frown, able to take and return a joke, backward to be annoyed or affronted at every fancied slight or boyish impertinences.

This really is a sine quâ non. The man must be of the sun-shiny or cheerful order, and not of the cloudy, gloomy, and uncertain. He must be able to deal with the faults and follies of his pupils, as a surgeon does with the ailments and disorders of his patients, seeing in their ingratitude, their obstinacy, their dullness, their avarice and corrupt dispositions, their love of disorder, idleness, and mischief, things to pity, not be angered by—symptoms of disease that require more thought and more exertion to remedy.

2nd. I should say he must have natural firmness and decision—must be manly and resolute. The weak, dawdling, chattering, vacillating, and timid, never have their boys' respect. Soft as wool without in manner and appearance and expression, hard as steel within in purpose and determination, is the essential description of an effective Reformatory teacher. You will always find him anxious to make duty easy and pleasant, but fixed and resolved that duty shall be done.

I should be disposed to add to this, that the man must have a fairly good figure and appearance—certainly must not be of the maimed or lame, or halt or blind. There are men who have conquered hearts in spite of all defects of form and feature, but as a general rule, infirmity of body and oddity of look are serious drawbacks.

Assuming that the man has these two natural qualifications, I would next subject him to training, to give him what I have called the artificial requisites, preparing him for action in the special field of Reformatory teaching. The ablest physician finds his skill avail him little if the disease he has to prescribe for is wholly unknown to him; and, on the other hand, his ability increases in proportion to the number of cases in which he has been brought in contact with it.

So, in Reformatory action you must give your future master some familiarity with the common modes of thinking and feeling, which obtain among the boys he labours for. He needs a practical foresight and experience of their changes and vagaries—a readiness in turning to account every incident and circumstance connected with them, which nothing but intercourse and daily observation can give. He must learn not to shrink from responsibility; to do what each day makes his duty, rather than to go by any list of rules and regulations; to value theory as nothing unless supported by facts.

And the most effectual way to give him this preparation is to let him see the work done by another, who is doing it well, before he attempts to do it himself. Let him be as it were the apprentice to the master, and mix himself in all the discipline, instruction, and employment of the school, bit by bit and step by step, till, becoming first the adjutant, he is qualified to be in turn the colonel and commander himself.

It is evident that for this purpose we shall do better if we employ all our various Reformatories, provided that they be satisfactorily organised and managed, than if we concentrated our training operations on ANY SPECIAL ONE. You want to scatter our candidates and set them to learn, to teach themselves, in fact, individually in practical spheres of action and experience, and not to collect them in a college, and give them lectures on Reformatory science, and marshal them in classes for mechanical instruction.

In an institution like Redhill, our system of family division presents six or seven separate schools, in each of which a candidate teacher could be received. As each of those first taken into training became partially familiarised with the work, another could be also admitted into the same division, and perhaps also a third, to be under the one who had been first entered. Thus, Redhill could in no long time have, if necessary, some eighteen or twenty teachers in preparation.

But great care must be taken not to go too fast. The candidate's disposition and temper will often be developed and understood, and his fitness or unfitness ascertained only BY DEGREES. And the forming of a few thoroughly fitted for the work will answer better for the cause, than the turning out of many imperfectly prepared and inadequately tested.

Supposing the candidate trained on this system of individual association with an experienced and able master in the particular department or family which that master had the charge of—his training would merely consist in sharing in and carrying out all that the master has to do. He would be for the first three or four weeks rather a spectator than an actor, at least as regards all matters of discipline. But he should take his place as instructor in the daily classes, and act as superintendent or chief monitor in the bedroom and play ground. He should associate himself in the industrial work, making it his business to get a practical acquaintance with the various employments which the boys of the family are set to. He should assist in making out all the reports, accounts, &c. ; and be employed in the central office under the governor's or secretary's eye, to give him facility and readiness in the conduct of the general business of the institution.

Some time each day he should be required to give to keeping up and enlarging his own personal knowledge. It is quite evident it would be impossible to provide adequately for his general intellectual or strictly scholastic training. He must be a fairly prepared and fairly capable teacher in the ordinary branches of instruction before he comes to the Reformatory for this specific training ; and his ability and resources on this head of general teaching will be sufficiently developed and enlarged by his daily exercise in the school. But there are many points on which he may be well called on to add to his stores and capabilities, such as music, agriculture, gardening, mechanical occupation, &c. ; and it should be the business of the chaplain, or chief religious superintendent of the institution, to enquire into and stimulate his mastery of the Scriptures—his facility in Bible teaching and exposition. Once or twice a-week the candidate teachers should meet him for personal examination, and practical exercises, and devotional communion. And this brings me to what is at once the most important and the most difficult point of all—the most essential, and yet the hardest to secure of all the man's qualifications for his office—that, namely, which I have called the spiritual, I mean the man's religious efficiency—his mastery of religion for himself—his power of stimulating and advancing it in others. Nothing is more certain than this, that real reformation must be the fruit and accompaniment of conversion of heart ; all other may serve for a time and answer for certain circumstances, but cannot be depended on—is almost certain to break down. It is very well to convince a lad that honesty is better policy than theft, industry more productive than idleness, truth more advantageous than lying ; the ordinary circumstances and experiences of life confirm your teaching ; and in the cases, which often occur, where the boy is of a plain tame disposition, has sunk into crime through untoward circumstances, poverty, neglect of parents, and has not become tainted with the love of vice, nor drank deep of the pleasures and excitements of a life of license, this may suffice to keep him in the right path for the future.

But in the more serious and frequent instances where native disposition, strong passions, indulged appetites, facility in yielding to vicious and depraved companions, have been the instruments and causes of the boy's corruptions, this will not be enough ; the conscience must be powerfully aroused, a better will created, higher tastes and inclinations imparted, a mightier motive brought to bear. The youth must leave off crime and vice, not because he may in general be the loser, but because they bring him into antagonism with God, and ruin his immortal being. I speak advisedly when I say, that till you have awakened in him a sense of sin—a sense of danger and of degradation, not merely bodily, but mental and spiritual—you have done little to effectually change the bent and bias of the boy. Till you have led him to appreciate and to seek from and for himself what the Gospel offers for his faith to lean upon, and his prayers and efforts to gain, you have done little to lastingly reclaim him; of course this result does not come at human bidding—you cannot MAKE a boy religious. The selfsame influence and teaching shall be effectual with one, and fail with his nearest companion.

But in this, as in all else, you can do much towards the end, if you use proper instruments; and the first step to the boy's being impressed, will be the religiousness of THE MASTER. In proportion as the boy feels that the master is a man who works for God's sake, depends on God's strength, studies God's will, loves God's Word, and seeks to act in God's spirit, and on God's pattern, he will yield to him, lean upon him, and learn from him; and I think, therefore, it must be the special aim and effort of the Reformatory Training School to enquire for, and invite, and enlist, such candidates as have a spirit of seriousness, earnestness, and devotion—such as desire to enter on the field of Reformatory agency, and feel some impulse to take part in it as a religious mission. It must be the business and the wish of those who govern the Training School to invest it with as much of a religious character as they can, to keep up a tone of spiritual and mental elevation, to make the men they seek to form alive to and ready for the deep Christian responsibilities of the task they undertake. I must not dwell longer on the subject. It is one indeed more easily realised in feeling than described in words; but this I would say, no candidate should be received into the Training School—certainly none be recommended from it—unless there be reason to believe and feel that he is a religious man, likely to be not merely the schoolmaster but the missionary, and so in some degree qualified to be the reformer of the spiritual man, as well as the manager of the bodily and the instructor of the mental man; and, so, too, no school should be employed for the purpose of training and formation, unless there be a distinctly Christian, though not a party or sectarian stamp upon it—a scriptural, not a formal or merely ceremonial spirit in it.

In concluding these remarks, it may be right, perhaps, to notice that part of the very important minute, that the Committee of Council have agreed to in reference to the terms and methods of assisting the Reformatory cause from the educational grants which refers to this subject.

Of the Training future Masters.—On the first reading of what is proposed in aid of “preparing suitable schoolmasters for employment in Ragged or Reformatory Schools,” I was impressed very favourably with the terms laid down.

The allowance of 35*l.* per annum for the board and lodging of each candidate, while under training, is fair and liberal.

And the conditions, that the schools are to be of a certain size (containing forty inmates) be sanctioned or certified by the Secretary of State—be inspected and annually reported on as suitable, and that the principal of the school certify each quarter on the candidate's conduct and character, are all right enough. I hope, however, that by inspectors of the Schools we are to understand inspectors of Workhouse Schools; from the industrial character and domestic arrangements of Reformatory Institutions, these are evidently the proper and really qualified inspectors to judge of them and report upon them. But on closer consideration of the three classes from which the candidate teachers are to be drawn and to which we are to be confined for the enlistment of them, my satisfaction is mingled with some disappointment. Teachers holding certificates of merit are not likely to become again pupils under instruction for such situations as the masterships of Reformatory Schools, very few of which are worth more than 50*l.* per annum, with allowances and lodging, and which include nearly twice as much labour, trial, and anxiety, as the ordinary schools, for which such men are already qualified. Still less likely are union and workhouse schoolmasters, who have certificates of efficiency, to do this. One would think there must be some mistake in the wording here, and that competency is rather intended than efficiency. The Union school teacher is likely à priori to be the most fitted for the Reformatory, as he has some experience of superintendence and domestic management, the schools he has learnt and practised in being somewhat of the nature of boarding schools, such as the Reformatory Institutions also are.

But there are four classes of certificates—permission, probation, competency, and efficiency; each class containing three grades. Those certified for efficiency compose the highest class, and are entitled to salaries varying from 45*l.* to 60*l.* per annum, with rations and lodgings.

When I say, that taking the list of workhouse schoolmasters in 1852-3, only forty-nine out of 850 were certified as efficient, that one of my own best helpers, holds only a certificate of competency, that another and most able fellow-worker holds no certificate and has never been registered at all, and that the best men for the work that I know and have recommended are in like manner uncertified, and very little likely to submit to such examinations as are now the fashion, or to get any credit in them if they did, I think I offer pretty good grounds for saying that the conditions as to the scholastic preparation and fitness of the candidates have been placed unnecessarily high, and are likely to defeat the object which is in view. As to young men from the training schools, the less of them the better. We want men of some worldly knowledge and experience, with some seriousness and gravity of disposition, of settled character and habits, not boys or youths scarcely older than many of those under their charge, and, as usually found flippant, conceited, and impatient.

It will certainly be advisable that the candidate for instruction and practice in the Reformatory, has attained a fair level as a common teacher, but great care must be taken not to place the mark too high. Teachers of very moderate attainments in everything beyond the elements of plain education are all that is required, especially as their twelvemonths' training in the Reformatory will give them better practice and development as instructors, and allow them to increase their own stores of general and useful knowledge. It would be better that those who apply to be received into the training school should be specially examined previous to their admission, by the inspector who inspects the schools, aided perhaps by the master or principal of the school itself.

This seems the more reasonable, as no specific conditions are laid down in regard to the actual masters of such schools (with whom these candidates would be placed) or their assistants, as in fact any person may be received and prepared and so introduced into the work in this last capacity; the only drawback being, that the school so receiving and training him will receive only 15*l.* or 20*l.* per annum towards the expenses of his salary, &c., instead of the 35*l.* which is fixed as the payment on behalf of those admitted specifically for training under these new regulations.

I hope that we may agree to represent to the Committee of Council the difficulties we feel upon this matter, and that we may succeed in obtaining such alterations in the late "minute" as may allow the Reformatory cause to reap the full benefit of the many liberal and judicious arrangements which it contemplates.

The thing we have to seek for, in reference to the training of teachers for Reformatory schools, is to have the field of enlistment made and left as wide and general as possible. We want to induce recruits to enter, not to deter them, nor to devise fences and barriers to keep them out, or to narrow the ground of selection. Let us take all reasonable means to secure their scholastic fitness when we have brought them under our banner; but the first thing and the great thing, is to get the right men, that is, the able and earnest and religious men, who feel for the desolate and outcast, to volunteer into the service. All regulations which tend to hinder and discourage men like these are positively mischievous.

We have but one objection to this paper, and that is, Mr. Turner does not admit, and acknowledge as he should, freely, and openly, his great debt to Demetz and Mettray. However, we must fully admit the ability and importance of the paper, and we recommend it to the careful consideration of all our readers; and the following letter, reprinted from The Law Amendment Journal, of July, 10th, may be read in conjunction with it:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW AMENDMENT JOURNAL.

SIR,—I have read with great attention and interest the valuable paper by Mr. Sydney Turner, on the "Training of Teachers for Reformatory Schools," published in your journal for June 26, and heartily rejoice that this most important question has at length obtained such able advocacy. His practical knowledge of what a Reformatory agent should be, gives peculiar weight to his advice on this point; and it is only with reference to the method to be adopted in training such agents that I venture to offer a few remarks. The undertaking is one of much difficulty and of vast importance; and any error in the course pursued, even should it operate only to retard the supply of trained teachers, would be a serious evil. Unfortunately, we are almost without experience on this subject in England. Should we not, then, seek it where it may be found? At Mettray the process of training officers has been carried on for 17 years with the most successful results. Not only has that institution been amply supplied from its Ecole Préparatoire with efficient officers, but they have been sent in large numbers to conduct other Reformatory Schools. Mr. Turner, although in one passage he appears to anticipate the establishment of Normal Schools, objects to a separate school for officers been attached to Redhill, or any similar institution. The question then arises, Will the alternative he proposes provide a sufficient number of teachers? He most truly says, that by degrees only will the candidate's fitness or unfitness for his profession be ascertained. This implies that some will be found unsuitable and must be dismissed, or will depart of their own accord. Many do so depart from the Normal School at Mettray, finding that the toil, anxiety, and self-denial they must endure as Reformatory School teachers is greater than they can bear; though it must not be supposed that the time even of those who do not become teachers is lost to the country at large, for they have received mental instruction and undergone a moral discipline which renders them valuable members of society, whatever be the position they may occupy in after life. Further, if we are to train Reformatory teachers to be as perfect as human means can make them, and our aim should be no less, we must have men who are devoted to the occupation, who love it heart and soul, who prefer it to all others. But before they can be selected from the candidates who may very honestly believe they should like the profession until they have had experience of what that profession really demands of them, time must elapse, they must study the Reformatory School under every aspect, they must see the dark as well as the bright side of the enterprise; and they ought to be able to acquire this thorough knowledge of the vocation while yet young enough to afford to abandon it and turn to some more congenial pursuit if they become convinced that they cannot satisfactorily perform its duties; otherwise they would be constrained to abide by it solely for the sake of a livelihood.

The numbers, then, of pupils must be sufficiently large to allow for many failures as regards the immediate object of their training; remembering this, and considering the growing demand throughout the country for Reformatory teachers, I do not think that any supply less copious than a large Normal School might afford, will meet the necessities of the case.

Mr. Turner has admirably explained how it is indispensable that the training should be practical—that the student should first watch and share with the master the management of the Reformatory School. This first principle, which is fully acted upon at Mettray, renders it of course necessary that the Normal School should be attached to a Reformatory institution. At present there are very few Reformatories in England of sufficient size to receive such an addition, but pupils could be admitted into smaller establishments on the plan proposed by Mr. Turner.

A strong argument in favour of a Normal School may be founded on Mr. Turner's very just remark that teachers holding certificates of merit are not likely again to become pupils under instruction for Reformatory School masterhips; and however earnest his desire may be, it is scarcely possible for a full-grown man who has attained a position in the world to bring to the task the pliability of opinion, the submission to the will of his teacher, and the conviction of the higher capabilities of the latter, which are essential to his successful training. Moreover, it has been found at Mettray that the students must embrace their arduous profession while yet so young as to have formed no ties in the world. But to do so special training must commence before they can have acquired the amount of instruction they will afterwards need; and while they may some of them retain, notwithstanding judicious selection, the flippancy, conceit, and impatience, common to youth, and which Mr. Turner so justly deprecates in a Reformatory School teacher. These serious evils may be obviated by the Normal School. The pupils may there pursue every necessary branch of information, and, by spending a portion of their time in the Reformatory School, meanwhile acquire a practical knowledge of their future duties, acting first as monitors and then as assistant teachers, until at length they are competent to become masters.* And should the before-mentioned objectionable qualities be exhibited by any student, ample opportunity would exist for checking their development, and for so regulating the employment of the youth in the Reformatory School as to prevent their producing mischief.

In order to render available for pupils in the Normal School the aid proffered by the recent minute of the Committee of Council, some modification of the conditions of the latter would be necessary; but the very earnest desire manifested on the part of Government to promote the Reformatory cause may surely authorise the hope that this would not be found an insuperable difficulty.

I am, Sir, &c.,

A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

We most earnestly recommend this letter, Mr. Turner's paper, and that of Mr. Bengough, with which we commenced this RECORD, to all who are, or who purpose to become, Managers of Reformatory Schools.

At page xxvi of this Record, we inserted the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education, dated, June 2nd, 1856. The following article, bearing upon these minutes,

---

* For an exposition, by M. Demetz, of this portion of the system, pursued at Mettray, see Law Amendment Journal, for June 5, 1856. See also IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, No 22, June, 1856, Record, pages lrv. to lxi.—ED.

extracted from The Midland Counties Herald, shew the importance of the new regulations, and encourage all advocates of the Reformatory system to believe that many of their now forlorn hopes will, with time and judicious management, become accepted realities :—

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS: MINUTE OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION.

The promoters of establishments for Juvenile Reformation have not unfrequently been censured by those whose knowledge on the subject is neither very extensive nor very accurate, for waiting until the mischief is done—that is, until the youth has actually been convicted of crime—before means are taken to train him in the paths of honesty. Whoever has considered the question thoroughly will entertain no doubt on two matters of importance. First, that however perfect our preventive system may be made, there will always be a sufficient number of youths falling into evil courses to render Reformatories necessary and permanent institutions; and, secondly, that whoever thinks he is better employed in doing a little himself than in criticising with folded hands the exertions of others, will find, on experiment, that in a great and complicated undertaking, in which the co-operation of many is required, he must consent to begin at the point where he can find co-operators.

A few years ago, public feeling was shocked with the spectacle of very young persons, who had no instruction, or worse than none, being treated as altogether accountable for their actions, and submitted to a process of retributory punishment, which ended in making them confirmed criminals, and enrolling them in the class which engages in the pursuit of crime as its means of subsistence. In joining, heart, and hand, with those whose sympathies had been thus awakened, they foresaw that public attention, when once directed to any one part of the great subject, would not long be restricted to a mere sectional view, but would expand, until in the end it would reach the farthest limits of the enterprise.

The origin of the very gratifying interest in preventive and reformatory measures with regard to our juvenile population, which has now diffused itself throughout the whole country—or, if not the origin, at all events that great impetus to the movement which has struck the most unobservant with surprise—is, according to the opinion of the Quarterly Review, to be attributed to the Birmingham Conference of 1851. At that meeting a complete system of Preventive and Reformatory Schools was sketched out; but public opinion running very strongly in favour of taking action, as our American friends call it, in relief of young persons brought before Criminal Courts, it was thought wise, and indeed essential, to confine the labours of those whose duty it was to carry into effect the principles which the Conference had sanctioned to the accomplishment of that particular object. How much has now been done, both in the Legislature and out of doors, to advance the cause is well known to our readers; and if, looking forwards, the heights we have reached are far below those which remain to be scaled, yet, looking backwards, we must rejoice to see that we have fairly emerged from the gloomy vale in which we had so long sojourned.

The third resolution of the Conference of 1851 was, "That the adoption of a somewhat altered and extended course of proceeding, on the part of the Committee of Privy Council, is earnestly to be desired for those children who have not yet made themselves amenable to the law, but who, by reason of the vice, neglect, or extreme poverty of their parents, are not admitted into the existing Day Schools." The Lords of the Council, however, were not prepared to act on this suggestion, which furnished another reason for concentrating efforts upon improving the treatment of young offenders.

But now the views of the Committee of the Privy Council have changed. The training which the public mind has undergone during the last four years and a half has not been thrown away on their Lordships, whose recent Minute is a precious testimonial to the value of the mental discipline to which, in common with their humbler fellow-mortals, these high personages have been subjected.

From the Provincial Conference of the National Reformatory Union, to be held on 20th, 22d, and 23d of this month (August,) at Bristol, much valuable information will be obtained. We know that all exertions are being made to render it worthy the Union which is national in the true sense of the word, and which numbers, amongst its members, men and women of all religions. We shall, if possible, insert the proceedings of this Conference in an Appendix to our present Record.

Since the issuing our Record for June, the First Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Transportation has appeared. The following is an analysis of Col. Jebb's evidence on the results of the Ticket-of-Leave System :—

The number of convicts who had received orders of license between the passing of the Act and the 11th of March in the present year was shown by a Parliamentary return to be 5,049, of whom 4,303 were released from the prisons of Great Britain, 435 from Bermuda and Gibraltar, and 311 (juveniles) from Parkhurst. Of the whole, 447 were charged with subsequent offences, and 404 were convicted, 230 being returned to prison under sentences which did not require their licenses to be revoked. The licenses of 173 were revoked. The number of convicts whose licenses were refused or withheld for misconduct was 554. The latter item, the witness explained, merely indicated the number who, by some act or acts of misconduct, had, during their three or four years' confinement, forfeited a month or months, which delayed the period when they would otherwise have been eligible for release. The number of convictions (404) was about eight per cent. of the whole number released ; and that, extending over a period of two years and five extracted from The Midland Counties—the importance of the new regulation of the Reformatory system, which forlorn hopes will, with the aid of the Government, become accepted reality.

REFORMATION

The new system of reformatory discipline, which is earnestly to be adopted, is one of the most important measures of the day, and is one which will be of great service to the State.

making altogether 104 of that class; for common law, 100; for felony and offences of a grave character, 103; awaiting sentence, 30; which makes a total of 237. The numbers released in the different counties up to the 31st December last have been as follows:—In Bedfordshire, 13; Berkshire, 58; Buckinghamshire, 26; Cambridgeshire, 53; Cheshire, 68; Cornwall, 21; Cumberland, 10; Derbyshire, 37; Devonshire, 98; Dorsetshire, 28; Durham, 42; Essex, 69; Gloucestershire, 64; Hampshire, 130; Herefordshire, 22; Hertfordshire, 44; Huntingdonshire, 12; Kent, 102; Lancashire, 557; Leicestershire, 53; Lincolnshire, 65; Middlesex, 926; Northumberland, 6; Nottinghamshire, 55; Norfolk, 73; Northamptonshire, 42; Oxfordshire, 42; Rutlandshire, 4; Shropshire, 31; Somersetshire, 21; Staffordshire, 146; Suffolk, 63; Surrey, 104; Sussex, 38; Warwickshire, 198; Westmoreland, 9; Wiltshire, 52; Worcestershire, 65; Yorkshire, 311; Wales, 96; making altogether 4,104.—The population of these different counties is taken from the census returns; and the proportion of ticket-of-leave men to 10,000 of the inhabitants would be as follows:—1 per 10,000 in Bedfordshire, 3 4-10ths in Berkshire, 1 6-10ths in Buckinghamshire, 2 9-10ths in Cambridgeshire, 1 5-10ths in Cheshire, 6-10ths in Cornwall, 5-10ths in Cumberland, 1 2-10ths in Derbyshire, 1 7-10ths in Devonshire, 1 5-10ths in Dorsetshire, 1 1-700th in Durham, 1 9-10ths in Essex, 1 4-10ths in Gloucestershire, 3 2-10ths in Hampshire, 1 9-10ths in Herefordshire, 2 6-10ths in Hertfordshire, 1 9-10ths in Huntingdonshire, 1 6-10ths in Kent, 2 7-10ths in Lancashire, 2 3-10ths in Leicestershire, 1 6-10ths in Lincolnshire, 4 9-10ths in Middlesex, 2 1-10th in Northumberland, 2 in Nottinghamshire, 1 7-10ths in Norfolk, 2 in Northamptonshire, 2 4-10ths in Oxfordshire, 1 7-10ths in Rutlandshire, 1 3-10ths in Shropshire, 4 7-10ths in Somersetshire, 2 4-10ths in Staffordshire, 1 9-10ths in Suffolk, 1 5-10ths in Surrey, 1 1-10th in Sussex, 4 2-10ths in Warwickshire, 1 5-10ths in Westmoreland, 2 4-10ths in Wiltshire, 2 3-10ths in Worcestershire, 1 8-10ths in Yorkshire, and 3 2-10ths in Wales.

NAL REFORMATORY UNION.

1 Conference of this Association was held at Bristol and 22nd of August. The unpropitious state somewhat damping to the ardour of those who "setting up" of the conferences; but every one by the excellent audiences which on every friends of the movement by their presence, v their attention and applause. We could t and overflowing assemblages as a stri- vest which the Reformatory movement the country; nor could we, as humble refrain from reflecting, with unmingled unt of good which cannot fail to result mass of information, collected together nce spread abroad by the newspaper country.

r, Daily News, and Morning Herald daily furnished sketches of everything .. place.

INAUGURAL MEETING.

T he Inaugural Meeting was held Aug. 20, at 3 o'clock, in the Merchants' Hall, King-street, Bristol. The attendance was very numerous, and, although the weather was exceedingly unfavourable, a large number of ladies were present upon the occasion.

The Chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Stanley, who was supported by, amongst others, Lord Robert Cecil, M. P., Right Hon. John Pakington, Bart, M. P., Mr. W. Miles, M. P., Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart., M. P., Mr. Adderley, M. P., Mr. J. Vining, the Mayor of Bristol, Mr. Commissioner Hill, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Dean of Bristol, the Rev. Canon Girdlestone, Rev. Dr. English, Rev. W. Osborne, Rev. W. Tyler, of Spitalfields, Rev. Sidney Turner, H. M Inspector of Schools, Mr James Hassell, Master of the Society of Merchant Venturers, Mr. Barwicke Baker, of Hardwick, Mr. Jellinger Symons, Messrs. Sanford, Wheatley, G. W. Hastings, W. Morgan, Gibbon, Bowyer, Lee Thornton, W. Naish, T. P. Jose, R. Leonard, C. J. Thomas, Col. Pinney, Col. Burrowes, &c.

The Right Worshipful the Mayor, J. Vining, Esq., said—Ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasing duty to have the honour of introducing to you the noble Lord in the chair, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley. His lordship's object in visiting us on this occasion, is to explain to you a system of National Reformatory Union, which having been begun in Bristol, will, we trust, be extended throughout the country. That his lordship and those associated with him, should have thought fit to visit Bristol, I take to be a high compliment. I gather from it that his lordship is aware that the ground has already been here broken, that we have Establishments existing here, and that though struggling under some difficulties, they yet show the practicable results of such a movement. I trust also that his lordship is aware that we are preeminent for our charitable Establishments—(hear, hear). It is not many months since we were honored by a visit from my Lord Granville, upon occasion of the establishment of a Trade School—our late respected Diocesan also established a Cathedral training and a middle school, and besides those we have also those splendid charitable endowments for which we are indebted to Whitson, Carr, and Colston. I consider that we are pre-eminently entitled to the attention of his Lordship and the gentlemen combined with him. I trust that the ground now broken will receive the good seed, and that we may date from their efforts the commencement of an era of great national social improvement.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley then proceeded to address the assemblage as follows:—

Ladies and gentlemen,—I will not detain you with any preface to the remarks which it will be my duty to make, nor apologise for the inevitable length to which they may extend. The subject of reformatories is to you deeply interesting; your presence in this room proves that. The subject is beset with difficulties, else why the controversies, the debates, the writing and speaking that has taken place concerning it during the last five years? The subject is one on which action, and prompt action, is needed, otherwise it would hardly, in this practical country and age, occupy the most intelligent minds, and lead to the most strenuous exertions. The legislature has taken up, as regards the reformatory movement, a peculiar, though I think a wise, position. It assists the founders of schools; it gives them legal powers; it makes use of their agency; but it does not supersede their efforts. The law under which we act takes for granted the existence of so much public spirit in the community as that individuals may be left to initiate a movement which in other countries would fall within the especial province of the executive. It is our duty and our purpose to-day to show that the confidence of Parliament is not misplaced; that those who frame the laws and those who administer them, have not reckoned in too sanguine a spirit on the philanthropy and the patriotism of English citizens. I propose, so far as time allows, to lay before you an outline sketch of this vast subject: wishing to be accurate, I have set down on paper the substance of the facts and arguments which I shall use; and holding it a deception to speak in public, on a question which one has not studied, I can assure you, however small the results may be, that there is scarcely a pamphlet, a debate, or a printed report of the last few years, bearing on the subject, from which I have not endeavoured to glean something in the shape either of information or advice.

Now, in the first place, in order to know clearly the magnitude of the evil for which we have to provide a remedy, let us endeavour to ascertain the actual and relative amount, in this country, of adult and juvenile crime. I do not apprehend that this can be done in a very exact manner. Prison returns can draw no distinction, though morally the distinction is a very wide one, between trivial breaches of law, compatible with innocence, and offences which are of a nature to indicate habitual crime. Nor is the shape of our statistical information on these subjects convenient. The difficulty I have found in ascertaining, even imperfectly as I may have done it, the facts required supply me, if it were needed, with a fresh reason to envy and to hold up for imitation the complete, uniform, and simple mode in which the judicial statistics of France are compiled. Nevertheless, such materials as we possess we may use; and looking to the 19th report, just published, of the prison inspectors of England and Wales, which supplies us with the returns of 1853, I find it there stated that the numbers, "for trial or tried at assizes or sessions" were 26,804; the summary convictions, 71,850; making a total of those who have come under the law 98,654; or in round numbers about 100,000. Now in that same year there were of juvenile offenders, that is under 17 years, tried or for trial 2,105; summarily convicted 9,348; total 11,453; we have then the proportion of juvenile to all crime for that year, fixed at  $11\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., and the figures for 1852, show a generally similar result. I will not weary you with statistics, but it is worth notice, and proof of which I state may be found in this same report, that while the proportion of juvenile crime, that is, of crime committed under the age of 17, does not exceed the figure I have mentioned, the amount committed between the age of 17 and 20 is absolutely enormous, forming, for those 4 years of life alone, nearly 25 per cent. of the whole. This fact is partially corroborated by the census returns of 1851, where of all the prisoners under sentence in Great Britain on a particular day, just 25 per cent. were found to be under 20 years of age: and a result almost identical with this was obtained by Mr. Redgrave from the census of 1841.

It is a startling fact in the investigation of crime, that while the number of persons living at any one time, between the age of 15 and 20, formerly only one tenth of the entire population at that time, this tenth is guilty of nearly fourth the amount of detected crime. I do not think that the prison or any of their returns can give us an exact idea of the number of those with whom the reformatory movement may have to deal. There are lads who break the law and get punished who are yet in no sense habitual offenders; there is perhaps still a good deal of undetected crime in counties where no efficient police exists, and no statement of the numbers annually imprisoned can help us, except in the roughest way, to estimate the number of those who may be at large. This only we know, that more than 11,000 children, a large majority to pass annually through the hands of justice, with how little reformatory effects in general, to a large proportion of recommitments nearly 4,000 out of 11,000 show plainly enough.

I can hardly imagine anything more vitally important for us in carrying on this reformatory movement, to ascertain then the scale, on which we shall have to conduct our operations. Unfortunately, there is no part of the whole subject on which so little light can be thrown. We are now working very much in the dark, we have little experience to appeal to, all estimates as to numbers have hitherto been mere guesses and they differ. I speak with some hesitation when I say that, when the reformatory comes widely into operation, you will not be sufficiently prepared to meet all contingencies unless you reckon on a yearly influx of from 2,000 to 3,000 boys. The term of detention being at the estimate 5 years, you might according to that have 15,000 in process of reclamation. When I reflect that the cost per head to the state is only £13 yearly, and that from this must be deducted the sums recovered from parents, there appears to me to be no danger of burdening the finances with a demand disproportionate to the importance of the object in view. When we speak of the possible cost of reformatories, it is well to think of the certain cost of crime. We are apt to think only of the taxes which we pay to government, and forget those we pay to those whom it is the object of the government to put down. I quote it valeat quantum that a committee appointed by the authorities of Liverpool to investigate losses caused by theft, placed those losses at the sum of £700,000. Mr. Clay, of Preston, has assumed the average income of a successful thief at £100, and in the case of prisoners whose history he investigated, he found that, besides the loss which their depredations might have caused, the average cost of their apprehension, maintenance, prosecution, and punishment was £62 a piece. Similarly Mr. Rushton, writing in 1842, to the corporation of Liverpool, referred to the case of 14 prisoners, whom he estimated as having caused a dead loss to the community of between £2000 and £3000. We have heard of gaols costing between £150 or £200 per cell; there are some which have far exceeded this estimate. We know how little productive prison labour can be made, and on estimating the injury produced by crime, we must take into account the annoyance, the fear, and the trouble caused, which generally far exceed in importance to the sufferer the pecuniary loss itself. Financiers have an axiom, that a little uncertainty in a tax is worse than a great deal of irregularity; now obviously no tax is so uncertain, both in amount and time of collection, nor is so vexatious as regards the manner of collecting, as that which falls upon us in the shape of loss by robbery. I just name these facts in passing, as an answer to those who, not here but elsewhere, might be inclined to talk about the expense of criminal reform.

Passing from the question of numbers, let us consider whether there exists any chance of juvenile crime decreasing through other agencies than ours. We all know—we have heard them again and again—what are the principal causes of adult crime. Early ignorance, vicious associations, habitual intemperance (the most powerful demoralizing agent of all), and imperfections in police arrangements, whereby the example is held out of offences committed without detection. Poverty and distress are also operating influences, but to what extent they operate is a question much disputed. The specific agencies at work in creating juvenile criminality have been analyzed with great minuteness by Mr. Clay, of Preston, than whom no man is better known in connexion with reformatory movements. He found that in 75 per cent. of the cases investigated by him, the fault of the children lay unmistakably at the door of the parents. In 57 per cent. of those cases there had been habitual drunkenness, often accompanied by brutality, on the part of the father; in the remaining 18 per cent. habitual indifference and neglect. That is to say, in three cases out of every four of juvenile delinquency which came before him, the prisoner had had hardly a chance of becoming anything but what he was. Mr. Clay's operation is corroborated by another, which I extract from an able and useful pamphlet by Mr. Adshead. He states that from an inquiry made into the cases of 100 criminal children at Manchester in 1840, the following results were elicited :

Born of dishonest parents	...	...	...	...	60
Parents profligate, but not of the criminal class	...	...	...	...	30
Parents honest and industrious	...	...	...	...	10

100

An inquiry tends to show that in crime, as in pauperism, there is a tendency to become hereditary ; and the effect of neglect in developing crime is demonstrated by the large proportion of illegitimate children in gaols. It seems that unless we could deal with the parents, we cannot prevent the corrupting process from going on ; we cannot hinder children being driven out of miserable houses to seek a living by plunder in the streets. Now nothing is more certain than that to deal directly with the parent is impossible ; he is out of our reach ; he is beyond our control ; he is proof against such influences as we can bring to bear. So far as he is concerned, the work of demoralization must and will go on. Indirectly no doubt we may operate upon that class from which the parents of the criminal population are usually taken. But we can hope to operate upon it only by means of measures and movements continued through a long series of years, and needing time for their results to appear ; by means of better schooling, of temperance societies, of places of rational amusement substituted for the beer-house ; of cheap literature, of every encouragement which society can offer to industry and forethought. Meantime the children are being misled, convictions, imprisonments, recommitments continue. The more I look into the subject, the more fully assured I feel, that, for both the present and future diminution of crime, the only direct and immediate agency that can be employed, I do not say the best, but virtually the only one—consists in the detection, the training, and the giving honest employment to criminal children ; whom the neglect of such means will render offenders for life. There are other agencies which, in the long run, may, and I hope will, affect powerfully the less wealthy classes of society ; but these agencies are indirect only, and do not meet the necessity which is upon us of immediate action. Next let us consider (and I assure you I am endeavouring to be as brief as is in my power), what is the past history and present state of this reformatory movement. I am afraid we, as a nation, can hardly claim the credit of having been foremost to discern and to act upon the principle which this Union meets to promote. It is true that in 1788 the Philanthropic Society of London, the Society now familiarly known to us by the name of its school, Red Hill, was set on foot by private means. It is true that 15 years earlier Howard had called attention to this branch of prison discipline. It is true that in 1815 the Prison Discipline Society was established, one of whose chief objects was to save young offenders from the corruption of contact with those more hardened ; that in 1817, the Stretton Institution is Warwickshire was commenced, and that at a later period the Children's Friend Society, under Captain Brenton, undertook the protection of neglected boys and girls, whether innocent or criminal.

But it has been chiefly on the Continent that the reformatory movement, until of late years, has thriven and flourished. M. de Fellenberg, at Hofwyl, near Berne in Switzerland, established a labour school for beggars and criminal children, of which the foundation dates from 1810, when the long prevalence of war had every where swelled the number of destitute and vagrant families. That school, beginning with 10 pupils, ultimately received above 100, and continued in existence during more than 40 years. In Prussia, at Dusselthal, near Dusseldorf, Count Von de Recke set up a refuge for the destitute, which appears to have included criminals also, and which, after some partial failure, caused by want of means, is now supported by the inhabitants of the town of Dusseldorf. Next in point of date to these attempts, and perhaps more successful than either, is the Rouke Haus, opened at the village of Horn, near Hamburg, by a man named Wicherein, himself possessed of small means. He began in 1833 with only an acre of land, with no staff except the founder and his mother, yet this small colony had, in 1851, risen to the rank of a village, and contained about 95 pupils. It would be wasting time to tell you here of Mettray and Red Hill, names familiar to all who study these subjects. Enough to say that Mettray was opened in 1840 ; that at the end of two years its success was ascertained, that 900 boys have passed through it, and that of these between 80 and 90 per cent. have turned out well. Red Hill school, as you know, dates from 1849 ; 948 boys have entered it, of whom 228 remain, 720 having passed through. Of these about 70 per cent. are known to be doing well.

Those who wish for details on the foreign reformatories will find them in a paper read by Mr. K. Malelland before the British Association at Glasgow, and since reprinted as a pamphlet. You are aware of the main provisions of the act of 1854 ; and how far it assists the setting up of Reformatory Schools. Power is given to detain boys at such Schools during five years, and to receive them at any age not above 16—government pays 5s. weekly for the support of each, but does not, in practice, otherwise interfere. Of this act most of the English Counties are availing themselves already ; nearly all, we hope will do so. I say "nearly all," because in some instances, where the number of boys is small, it may be better for more than one county to join funds, and set up a school between them. The object of the National Reformatory Union in connection with this movement is to form, as it were, a centre of action for those various local efforts, to enable managers in different counties to compare their systems more readily, to promote the establishment of reformatories where none yet exist, to enable those who wish to give personal assistance in the cause to discover where their help is most required, to assist in placing out those who leave reformatories ; to supply opportunities of discussing the general subject, and suggesting improvements in the methods adopted ; and should changes in the law of reformatories be required, to press in Parliament the propriety of such changes. There is in existence, founded nearly at the same time, another similar body to this, "The Reformatory and Refuge Union," founded on a more sectarian basis, but which I hope to be useful within its own sphere. I name that body only in order to mention that, though they work by nearly the same means for nearly the same objects, there is not, there cannot be, any opposition between the two.

So far, gentlemen, we have had to deal chiefly with questions of facts, and but little with questions of argument. We have seen the state of crime; we have glanced at the efforts made here and elsewhere in the cause of reformation. I come now to practical inquiries, which we are bound to answer, and to answer satisfactorily, under penalty of being prepared to stand here the supporters of an impracticable project. Those questions are these:—Is the undertaking necessary? Is it a priori likely to succeed? Has it succeeded where tried in other countries? Now, as to the first point, the necessity of setting about this business, I apprehend there can be but little diversity of opinion. The circumstances of the time are peculiar. Whatever are the effects of transportation as a punishment upon Australia, there can be no doubt but that the effect of the system on this country was beneficial. In fact, transportation as an English institution, dates further back than the discovery of the Australian continent. We transported once to America; we transported once to the West Indies; we had, after the American Independence, to transport to the African coast: for half-a-century we transported to the Antipodean settlements. It is only within the last half-dozen years that we found ourselves cut off from an easy and effectual, though not economical, mode of getting rid of our criminal population—cut off, if I may express an individual opinion, without much prospect of being able to re-establish a practice which we have abolished, or of being allowed to find a new outlet for convicts which will not interfere with some young community. Be that as it may, we have for some time past had to contemplate the possible alternative of being compelled to keep all our discharged prisoners at home. It was a natural result of that position that people should begin to say, "Since you can't get rid of your criminals, you must reform them." But reform whom? Adults? That was felt to be, I do not say a hopeless, but an arduous and improbable task. Then followed the enquiry, "when do these men become criminals; in youth or in latter life?" The answer is sufficiently given in our criminal tables, and in the evidence taken before Parliament in the years 1852-53. It is ascertained that from one third to one-half of the convicts in our prisons have belonged to the class of juvenile offenders. It is proved, by a concurrence of testimony such as one rarely finds on any social question admitting of dispute, that short imprisonments (the average of all imprisonments in England is 50 days), are not reformatory in their effect; that they are even deterring; that usually they send back the offender more hardened than he went in. The difficulty is not to find witnesses on the fact, but to choose them. I believe there is not a governor of a gaol, not a chaplain, not a judge, not a chairman of quarter sessions, who is not extracted from The Midland Counties Herald, shew the importance of the new regulations, and encourage all advocates of the Reformatory system to believe that many of their now forlorn hopes will, with time and judicious management, become accepted realities :—

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS: MINUTE OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION.

The promoters of establishments for Juvenile Reformation have not unfrequently been censured by those whose knowledge on the subject is neither very extensive nor very accurate, for waiting until the mischief is done—that is, until the youth has actually been convicted of crime—before means are taken to train him in the paths of honesty. Whoever has considered the question thoroughly will entertain no doubt on two matters of importance. First, that however perfect our preventive system may be made, there will always be a sufficient number of youths falling into evil courses to render Reformatories necessary and permanent institutions; and, secondly, that whoever thinks he is better employed in doing a little himself than in criticising with folded hands the exertions of others, will find, on experiment, that in a great and complicated undertaking, in which the co-operation of many is required, he must consent to begin at the point where he can find co-operators.

A few years ago, public feeling was shocked with the spectacle of very young persons, who had no instruction, or worse than none, being treated as altogether accountable for their actions, and submitted to a process of retributory punishment, which ended in making them confirmed criminals, and enrolling them in the class which engages in the pursuit of crime as its means of subsistence. In joining, heart, and hand, with those whose sympathies had been thus awakened, they foresaw that public attention, when once directed to any one part of the great subject, would not long be restricted to a mere sectional view, but would expand, until in the end it would reach the farthest limits of the enterprise.

The origin of the very gratifying interest in preventive and reformatory measures with regard to our juvenile population, which has now diffused itself throughout the whole country—or, if not the origin, at all events that great impetus to the movement which has struck the most unobservant with surprise—is, according to the opinion of the Quarterly Review, to be attributed to the Birmingham Conference of 1851. At that meeting a complete system of Preventive and Reformatory Schools was sketched out; but public opinion running very strongly in favour of taking action, as our American friends call it, in relief of young persons brought before Criminal Courts, it was thought wise, and indeed essential, to confine the labours of those whose duty it was to carry into effect the principles which the Conference had sanctioned to the accomplishment of that particular object. How much has now been done, both in the Legislature and out of doors, to advance the cause is well known to our readers; and if, looking forwards, the heights we have reached are far below those which remain to be scaled, yet, looking backwards, we must rejoice to see that we have fairly emerged from the gloomy vale in which we had so long sojourned.

The third resolution of the Conference of 1851 was, "That the adoption of a somewhat altered and extended course of proceeding, on the part of the Committee of Privy Council, is earnestly to be desired for those children who have not yet made themselves amenable to the law, but who, by reason of the vice, neglect, or extreme poverty of their parents, are not admitted into the existing Day Schools." The Lords of the Council, however, were not prepared to act on this suggestion, which furnished another reason for concentrating efforts upon improving the treatment of young offenders.

But now the views of the Committee of the Privy Council have changed. The training which the public mind has undergone during the last four years and a half has not been thrown away on their Lordships, whose recent Minute is a precious testimonial to the value of the mental discipline to which, in common with their humbler fellow-mortals, these high personages have been subjected.

From the Provincial Conference of the National Reformatory Union, to be held on 20th, 22d, and 23d of this month (August,) at Bristol, much valuable information will be obtained. We know that all exertions are being made to render it worthy the Union which is national in the true sense of the word, and which numbers, amongst its members, men and women of all religions. We shall, if possible, insert the proceedings of this Conference in an Appendix to our present Record.

Since the issuing our Record for June, the First Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Transportation has appeared. The following is an analysis of Col. Jebb's evidence on the results of the Ticket-of-Leave System:—

The number of convicts who had received orders of license between the passing of the Act and the 11th of March in the present year was shown by a Parliamentary return to be 5,049, of whom 4,303 were released from the prisons of Great Britain, 435 from Bermuda and Gibraltar, and 311 (juveniles) from Parkhurst. Of the whole, 447 were charged with subsequent offences, and 404 were convicted, 230 being returned to prison under sentences which did not require their licenses to be revoked. The licenses of 173 were revoked. The number of convicts whose licenses were refused or withheld for misconduct was 554. The latter item, the witness explained, merely indicated the number who, by some act or acts of misconduct, had, during their three or four years' confinement, forfeited a month or months, which delayed the period when they would otherwise have been eligible for release. The number of convictions (404) was about eight per cent. of the whole number released; and that, extending over a period of two years and five

extracted from The Midland Counties
 portance of the new regulation of the Reformatory system
 forlorn hopes will, become accepted real

REFORMATION

The pro-
 not un-sub-have for con-existing Day prepared extreme
 amen-

which remain to be scaled, yet, we had so long sojourned.
 of 1851 was, "That the course of proceeding, is earnestly to be reflect, or extreme themselves amen-

xlvi

Decem-shire, 58; Buckingham-68; Cornwall, 21; Cumber-
 98; Dorsetshire, 28; Durham, 42; Gloucestershire,
 64; Hampshire, 130; Herefordshire, 22; Hertfordshire, 44;
 Huntingdonshire, 12; Kent, 102; Lancashire, 557; Leicestershire,
 53; Lincolnshire, 65; Middlesex, 926; Northumberland, 65;
 Nottinghamshire, 55; Norfolk, 73; Northamptonshire, 42; Oxfordshire, 42; Rutlandshire, 4; Shropshire, 31; Somersetshire, 211; Staffordshire, 146; Suffolk, 63; Surrey, 104; Sussex, 38; Warwickshire, 198; Westmoreland, 9; Wiltshire 52; Worcestershire, 66; Yorkshire, 311; Wales, 96; making altogether 4,104.—The population of these different counties is taken from the census returns; and the proportion of ticket-of-leave men to 10,000 of the inhabitants would be as follows:—1 per 10,000 in Bedfordshire, 3 4-10ths in Berkshire, 1 6-10ths in Buckinghamshire, 2 9-10ths in Cambridgeshire, 1 5-10ths in Cheshire, 6-10ths in Cornwall, 5-10ths in Cumberland, 1 2-10ths in Derbyshire, 1 7-10ths in Devonshire, 1 5-10ths in Dorsetshire, 1 1-700th in Durham, 1 9-10ths in Essex, 1 4-10ths in Gloucestershire, 3 2-10ths in Hampshire, 1 9-10ths in Herefordshire, 2 6-10ths in Hertfordshire, 1 9-10ths in Huntingdonshire, 1 6-10ths in Kent, 2 7-10ths in Lancashire, 2 3-10ths in Leicestershire, 1 6-10ths in Lincolnshire, 4 9-10ths in Middlesex, 2 1-10th in Northumberland, 2 in Nottinghamshire, 1 7-10ths in Norfolk, 2 in Northamptonshire, 2 4-10ths in Oxfordshire, 1 7-10ths in Rutlandshire, 1 3-10ths in Shropshire, 4 7-10ths in Somersetshire, 2 4-10ths in Staffordshire, 1 9-10ths in Suffolk, 1 5-10ths in Surrey, 1 1-10th in Sussex, 4 2-10ths in Warwickshire, 1 5-10ths in Westmoreland, 2 4-10ths in Wiltshire, 2 3-10ths in Worcestershire, 1 8-10ths in Yorkshire, and 2 2-100ths in Wales.

NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

The first provincial Conference of this Association was held at Bristol on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of August. The unpropitious state of the weather was somewhat damping to the ardour of those who had laboured in the "getting up" of the conferences; but every one was put into good spirits by the excellent audiences which on every occasion encouraged the friends of the movement by their presence, and cheered the speakers by their attention and applause. We could not help regarding these vast and overflowing assemblages as a striking evidence of the deep interest which the Reformatory movement is at present exciting through the country; nor could we, as humble labourers in the great cause, refrain from reflecting, with unmingled satisfaction, upon the vast amount of good which cannot fail to result from so varied and valuable a mass of information, collected together at a centre like Bristol, and thence spread abroad by the newspaper and periodical press through the country.

The Times, Morning Advertiser, Daily News, and Morning Herald sent down picked reporters, who daily furnished sketches of everything that took place.

INAUGURAL MEETING.

The Inaugural Meeting was held Aug. 20, at 3 o'clock, in the Merchants' Hall, King-street, Bristol. The attendance was very numerous, and, although the weather was exceedingly unfavourable, a large number of ladies were present upon the occasion.

The Chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Stanley, who was supported by, amongst others, Lord Robert Cecil, M. P., Right Hon. John Pakington, Bart, M. P., Mr. W. Miles, M. P., Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart., M. P., Mr. Adderley, M. P., Mr. J. Vining, the Mayor of Bristol, Mr. Commissioner Hill, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Dean of Bristol, the Rev. Canon Girdlestone, Rev. Dr. English, Rev. W. Osborne, Rev. W. Tyler, of Spitalfields, Rev. Sidney Turner, H. M. Inspector of Schools, Mr James Hassell, Master of the Society of Merchant Venturers, Mr. Barwicke Baker, of Hardwick, Mr. Jellinger Symons, Messrs. Sanford, Wheatley, G. W. Hastings, W. Morgan, Gibbon, Bowyer, Lee Thornton, W. Naish, T. P. Jose, R. Leonard, C. J. Thomas, Col. Pinney, Col. Burrowes, &c.

The Right Worshipful the Mayor, J. Vining, Esq., said—Ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasing duty to have the honour of introducing to you the noble Lord in the chair, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley. His lordship's object in visiting us on this occasion, is to explain to you a system of National Reformatory Union, which having been begun in Bristol, will, we trust, be extended throughout the country. That his lordship and those associated with him, should have thought fit to visit Bristol, I take to be a high compliment. I gather from it that his lordship is aware that the ground has already been here broken, that we have Establishments existing here, and that though struggling under some difficulties, they yet show the practicable results of such a movement. I trust also that his lordship is aware that we are preeminent for our charitable Establishments—(hear, hear). It is not many months since we were honored by a visit from my Lord Granville, upon occasion of the establishment of a Trade School—our late respected Diocesan also established a Cathedral training and a middle school, and besides those we have also those splendid charitable endowments for which we are indebted to Whitson, Carr, and Colston. I consider that we are pre-eminently entitled to the attention of his Lordship and the gentlemen combined with him. I trust that the ground now broken will receive the good seed, and that we may date from their efforts the commencement of an era of great national social improvement.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley then proceeded to address the assemblage as follows:—

Ladies and gentlemen,—I will not detain you with any preface to the remarks which it will be my duty to make, nor apologise for the inevitable length to which they may extend. The subject of reformatories is to you deeply interesting; your presence in this room proves that. The subject is beset with difficulties, else why the controversies, the debates, the writing and speaking that has taken place concerning it during the last five years? The subject is one on which action, and prompt action, is needed, otherwise it would hardly, in this practical country and age, occupy the most intelligent minds, and lead to the most strenuous exertions. The legislature has taken up, as regards the reformatory movement, a peculiar, though I think a wise, position. It assists the founders of schools; it gives them legal powers; it makes use of their agency; but it does not supersede their efforts. The law under which we act takes for granted the existence of so much public spirit in the community as that individuals may be left to initiate a movement which in other countries would fall within the especial province of the executive. It is our duty and our purpose to-day to show that the confidence of Parliament is not misplaced; that those who frame the laws and those who administer them, have not reckoned in too sanguine a spirit on the philanthropy and the patriotism of English citizens. I propose, so far as time allows, to lay before you an outline sketch of this vast subject: wishing to be accurate, I have set down on paper the substance of the facts and arguments which I shall use; and holding it a deception to speak in public, on a question which one has not studied, I can assure you, however small the results may be, that there is scarcely a pamphlet, a debate, or a printed report of the last few years, bearing on the subject, from which I have not endeavoured to glean something in the shape either of information or advice.

Now, in the first place, in order to know clearly the magnitude of the evil for which we have to provide a remedy, let us endeavour to ascertain the actual and relative amount, in this country, of adult and juvenile crime. I do not apprehend that this can be done in a very exact manner. Prison returns can draw no distinction, though morally the distinction is a very wide one, between trivial breaches of law, compatible with innocence, and offences which are of a nature to indicate habitual crime. Nor is the shape of our statistical information on these subjects convenient. The difficulty I have found in ascertaining, even imperfectly as I may have done it, the facts required supply me, if it were needed, with a fresh reason to envy and to hold up for imitation the complete, uniform, and simple mode in which the judicial statistics of France are compiled. Nevertheless, such materials as we possess we may use; and looking to the 19th report, just published, of the prison inspectors of England and Wales, which supplies us with the returns of 1853, I find it there stated that the numbers, "for trial or tried at assizes or sessions" were 26,804; the summary convictions, 71,850; making a total of those who have come under the law 98,654; or in round numbers about 100,000. Now in that same year there were of juvenile offenders, that is under 17 years, tried or for trial 2,105; summarily convicted 9,348; total 11,453; we have then the proportion of juvenile to all crime for that year, fixed at  $11\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., and the figures for 1852, show a generally similar result. I will not weary you with statistics, but it is worth notice, and proof of which I state may be found in this same report, that while the proportion of juvenile crime, that is, of crime committed under the age of 17, does not exceed the figure I have mentioned, the amount committed between the age of 17 and 20 is absolutely enormous, forming, for those 4 years of life alone, nearly 25 per cent. of the whole. This fact is partially corroborated by the census returns of 1851, where of all the prisoners under sentence in Great Britain on a particular day, just 25 per cent. were found to be under 20 years of age: and a result almost identical with this was obtained by Mr. Redgrave from the census of 1841.

It is a startling fact in the investigation of crime, that while the number of persons living at any one time, between the age of 15 and 20, formerly only one tenth of the entire population at that time, this tenth is guilty of nearly fourth the amount of detected crime. I do not think that the prison or any of their returns can give us an exact idea of the number of those with whom the reformatory movement may have to deal. There are lads who break the law and get punished who are yet in no sense habitual offenders; there is perhaps still a good deal of undetected crime in counties where no efficient police exists, and no statement of the numbers annually imprisoned can help us, except in the roughest way, to estimate the number of those who may be at large. This only we know, that more than 11,000 children, a large majority to pass annually through the hands of justice, with how little reformatory effects in general, to a large proportion of recommittals nearly 4,000 out of 11,000 show plainly enough.

I can hardly imagine anything more vitally important for us in carrying on this reformatory movement, to ascertain then the scale, on which we shall have to conduct our operations. Unfortunately, there is no part of the whole subject on which so little light can be thrown. We are now working very much in the dark, we have little experience to appeal to, all estimates as to numbers have hitherto been mere guesses and they differ. I speak with some hesitation when I say that, when the reformatory comes widely into operation, you will not be sufficiently prepared to meet all contingencies unless you reckon on a yearly influx of from 2,000 to 3,000 boys. The term of detention being at the estimate 5 years, you might according to that have 15,000 in process of reclamation. When I reflect that the cost per head to the state is only £13 yearly, and that from this must be deducted the sums recovered from parents, there appears to me to be no danger of burdening the finances with a demand disproportionate to the importance of the object in view. When we speak of the possible cost of reformatories, it is well to think of the certain cost of crime. We are apt to think only of the taxes which we pay to government, and forget those we pay to those whom it is the object of the government to put down. I quote it valde quantum that a committee appointed by the authorities of Liverpool to investigate losses caused by theft, placed those losses at the sum of £700,000. Mr. Clay, of Preston, has assumed the average income of a successful thief at £100, and in the case of prisoners whose history he investigated, he found that, besides the loss which their depredations might have caused, the average cost of their apprehension, maintenance, prosecution, and punishment was £62 a piece. Similarly Mr. Rushton, writing in 1842, to the corporation of Liverpool, referred to the case of 14 prisoners, whom he estimated as having caused a dead loss to the community of between £2000 and £3000. We have heard of gaols costing between £150 or £200 per cell; there are some which have far exceeded this estimate. We know how little productive prison labour can be made, and on estimating the injury produced by crime, we must take into account the annoyance, the fear, and the trouble caused, which generally far exceed in importance to the sufferer the pecuniary loss itself. Financiers have an axiom, that a little uncertainty in a tax is worse than a great deal of irregularity; now obviously no tax is so uncertain, both in amount and time of collection, nor is so vexatious as regards the manner of collecting, as that which falls upon us in the shape of loss by robbery. I just name these facts in passing, as an answer to those who, not here but elsewhere, might be inclined to talk about the expense of criminal reform.

Passing from the question of numbers, let us consider whether there exists any chance of juvenile crime decreasing through other agencies than ours. We all know—we have heard them again and again—what are the principal causes of adult crime. Early ignorance, vicious associations, habitual intemperance (the most powerful demoralizing agent of all), and imperfections in police arrangements, whereby the example is held out of offences committed without detection. Poverty and distress are also operating influences, but to what extent they operate is a question much disputed. The specific agencies at work in creating juvenile criminality have been analyzed with great minuteness by Mr. Clay, of Preston, than whom no man is better known in connexion with reformatory movements. He found that in 75 per cent. of the cases investigated by him, the fault of the children lay unmistakably at the door of the parents. In 57 per cent. of those cases there had been habitual drunkenness, often accompanied by brutality, on the part of the father; in the remaining 18 per cent. habitual indifference and neglect. That is to say, in three cases out of every four of juvenile delinquency which came before him, the prisoner had had hardly a chance of becoming anything but what he was. Mr. Clay's operation is corroborated by another, which I extract from an able and useful pamphlet by Mr. Adshead. He states that from an inquiry made into the cases of 100 criminal children at Manchester in 1840, the following results were elicited :

Born of dishonest parents	...	...	...	...	60
Parents profligate, but not of the criminal class	...	...	...	...	30
Parents honest and industrious	...	...	...	...	10

100

An inquiry tends to show that in crime, as in pauperism, there is a tendency to become hereditary ; and the effect of neglect in developing crime is demonstrated by the large proportion of illegitimate children in gaols. It seems that unless we could deal with the parents, we cannot prevent the corrupting process from going on ; we cannot hinder children being driven out of miserable houses to seek a living by plunder in the streets. Now nothing is more certain than that to deal directly with the parent is impossible ; he is out of our reach ; he is beyond our control ; he is proof against such influences as we can bring to bear. So far as he is concerned, the work of demoralization must and will go on. Indirectly no doubt we may operate upon that class from which the parents of the criminal population are usually taken. But we can hope to operate upon it only by means of measures and movements continued through a long series of years, and needing time for their results to appear ; by means of better schooling, of temperance societies, of places of rational amusement substituted for the beer-house ; of cheap literature, of every encouragement which society can offer to industry and forethought. Meantime the children are being misled, convictions, imprisonments, recommitments continue. The more I look into the subject, the more fully assured I feel, that, for both the present and future diminution of crime, the only direct and immediate agency that can be employed, I do not say the best, but virtually the only one—consists in the detection, the training, and the giving honest employment to criminal children ; whom the neglect of such means will render offenders for life. There are other agencies which, in the long run, may, and I hope will, affect powerfully the less wealthy classes of society ; but these agencies are indirect only, and do not meet the necessity which is upon us of immediate action. Next let us consider (and I assure you I am endeavouring to be as brief as is in my power), what is the past history and present state of this reformatory movement. I am afraid we, as a nation, can hardly claim the credit of having been foremost to discern and to act upon the principle which this Union meets to promote. It is true that in 1788 the Philanthropic Society of London, the Society now familiarly known to us by the name of its school, Red Hill, was set on foot by private means. It is true that 15 years earlier Howard had called attention to this branch of prison discipline. It is true that in 1815 the Prison Discipline Society was established, one of whose chief objects was to save young offenders from the corruption of contact tary of State—he inspected and annually reported on as suitable, and that the principal of the school certify each quarter on the candidate's conduct and character, are all right enough. I hope, however, that by inspectors of the Schools we are to understand inspectors of Workhouse Schools; from the industrial character and domestic arrangements of Reformatory Institutions, these are evidently the proper and really qualified inspectors to judge of them and report upon them. But on closer consideration of the three classes from which the candidate teachers are to be drawn and to which we are to be confined for the enlistment of them, my satisfaction is mingled with some disappointment. Teachers holding certificates of merit are not likely to become again pupils under instruction for such situations as the masterships of Reformatory Schools, very few of which are worth more than 50*l.* per annum, with allowances and lodging, and which include nearly twice as much labour, trial, and anxiety, as the ordinary schools, for which such men are already qualified. Still less likely are union and workhouse schoolmasters, who have certificates of efficiency, to do this. One would think there must be some mistake in the wording here, and that competency is rather intended than efficiency. The Union school teacher is likely à priori to be the most fitted for the Reformatory, as he has some experience of superintendence and domestic management, the schools he has learnt and practised in being somewhat of the nature of boarding schools, such as the Reformatory Institutions also are.

But there are four classes of certificates—permission, probation, competency, and efficiency; each class containing three grades. Those certified for efficiency compose the highest class, and are entitled to salaries varying from 45*l.* to 60*l.* per annum, with rations and lodgings.

When I say, that taking the list of workhouse schoolmasters in 1852-3, only forty-nine out of 850 were certified as efficient, that one of my own best helpers, holds only a certificate of competency, that another and most able fellow-worker holds no certificate and has never been registered at all, and that the best men for the work that I know and have recommended are in like manner uncertified, and very little likely to submit to such examinations as are now the fashion, or to get any credit in them if they did, I think I offer pretty good grounds for saying that the conditions as to the scholastic preparation and fitness of the candidates have been placed unnecessarily high, and are likely to defeat the object which is in view. As to young men from the training schools, the less of them the better. We want men of some worldly knowledge and experience, with some seriousness and gravity of disposition, of settled character and habits, not boys or youths scarcely older than many of those under their charge, and, as usually found flippant, conceited, and impatient.

It will certainly be advisable that the candidate for instruction and practice in the Reformatory, has attained a fair level as a common teacher, but great care must be taken not to place the mark too high. Teachers of very moderate attainments in everything beyond the elements of plain education are all that is required, especially as their twelvemonths' training in the Reformatory will give them better practice and development as instructors, and allow them to increase their own stores of general and useful knowledge. It would be better that those who apply to be received into the training school should be specially examined previous to their admission, by the inspector who inspects the schools, aided perhaps by the master or principal of the school itself.

This seems the more reasonable, as no specific conditions are laid down in regard to the actual masters of such schools (with whom these candidates would be placed) or their assistants, as in fact any person may be received and prepared and so introduced into the work in this last capacity; the only drawback being, that the school so receiving and training him will receive only 15*l.* or 20*l.* per annum towards the expenses of his salary, &c., instead of the 35*l.*, which is fixed as the payment on behalf of those admitted specifically for training under these new regulations.

I hope that we may agree to represent to the Committee of Council the difficulties we feel upon this matter, and that we may succeed in obtaining such alterations in the late "minute" as may allow the Reformatory cause to reap the full benefit of the many liberal and judicious arrangements which it contemplates.

The thing we have to seek for, in reference to the training of teachers for Reformatory schools, is to have the field of enlistment made and left as wide and general as possible. We want to induce recruits to enter, not to deter them, nor to devise fences and barriers to keep them out, or to narrow the ground of selection. Let us take all reasonable means to secure their scholastic fitness when we have brought them under our banner; but the first thing and the great thing, is to get the right men, that is, the able and earnest and religious men, who feel for the desolate and outcast, to volunteer into the service. All regulations which tend to hinder and discourage men like these are positively mischievous.

We have but one objection to this paper, and that is, Mr. Turner does not admit, and acknowledge as he should, freely, and openly, his great debt to Demetz and Mettray. However, we must fully admit the ability and importance of the paper, and we recommend it to the careful consideration of all our readers; and the following letter, reprinted from The Law Amendment Journal, of July, 10th, may be read in conjunction with it:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW AMENDMENT JOURNAL.

SIR,—I have read with great attention and interest the valuable paper by Mr. Sydney Turner, on the "Training of Teachers for Reformatory Schools," published in your journal for June 26, and heartily rejoice that this most important question has at length obtained such able advocacy. His practical knowledge of what a Reformatory agent should be, gives peculiar weight to his advice on this point; and it is only with reference to the method to be adopted in training such agents that I venture to offer a few remarks. The undertaking is one of much difficulty and of vast importance; and any error in the course pursued, even should it operate only to retard the supply of trained teachers, would be a serious evil. Unfortunately, we are almost without experience on this subject in England. Should we not, then, seek it where it may be found? At Mettray the process of training officers has been carried on for 17 years with the most successful results. Not only has that institution been amply supplied from its Ecole Préparatoire with efficient officers, but they have been sent in large numbers to conduct other Reformatory Schools. Mr. Turner, although in one passage he appears to anticipate the establishment of Normal Schools, objects to a separate school for officers been attached to Redhill, or any similar institution. The question then arises, Will the alternative he proposes provide a sufficient number of teachers? He most truly says, that by degrees only will the candidate's fitness or unfitness for his profession be ascertained. This implies that some will be found unsuitable and must be dismissed, or will depart of their own accord. Many do so depart from the Normal School at Mettray, finding that the toil, anxiety, and self-denial they must endure as Reformatory School teachers is greater than they can bear; though it must not be supposed that the time even of those who do not become teachers is lost to the country at large, for they have received mental instruction and undergone a moral discipline which renders them valuable members of society, whatever be the position they may occupy in after life. Further, if we are to train Reformatory teachers to be as perfect as human means can make them, and our aim should be no less, we must have men who are devoted to the occupation, who love it heart and soul, who prefer it to all others. But before they can be selected from the candidates who may very honestly believe they should like the profession until they have had experience of what that profession really demands of them, time must elapse, they must study the Reformatory School under every aspect, they must see the dark as well as the bright side of the enterprise; and they ought to be able to acquire this thorough knowledge of the vocation while yet young enough to afford to abandon it and turn to some more congenial pursuit if they become convinced that they cannot satisfactorily perform its duties; otherwise they would be constrained to abide by it solely for the sake of a livelihood.

The numbers, then, of pupils must be sufficiently large to allow for many failures as regards the immediate object of their training; remembering this, and considering the growing demand throughout the country for Reformatory teachers, I do not think that any supply less copious than a large Normal School might afford, will meet the necessities of the case.

Mr. Turner has admirably explained how it is indispensable that the training should be practical—that the student should first watch and share with the master the management of the Reformatory School. This first principle, which is fully acted upon at Mettray, renders it of course necessary that the Normal School should be attached to a Reformatory institution. At present there are very few Reformatories in England of sufficient size to receive such an addition, but pupils could be admitted into smaller establishments on the plan proposed by Mr. Turner.

A strong argument in favour of a Normal School may be founded on Mr. Turner's very just remark that teachers holding certificates of merit are not likely again to become pupils under instruction for Reformatory School masterships; and however earnest his desire may be, it is scarcely possible for a full-grown man who has attained a position in the world to bring to the task the pliability of opinion, the submission to the will of his teacher, and the conviction of the higher capabilities of the latter, which are essential to his successful training. Moreover, it has been found at Mettray that the students must embrace their arduous profession while yet so young as to have formed no ties in the world. But to do so special training must commence before they can have acquired the amount of instruction they will afterwards need; and while they may some of them retain, notwithstanding judicious selection, the flippancy, conceit, and impatience, common to youth, and which Mr. Turner so justly deprecates in a Reformatory School teacher. These serious evils may be obviated by the Normal School. The pupils may there pursue every necessary branch of information, and, by spending a portion of their time in the Reformatory School, meanwhile acquire a practical knowledge of their future duties, acting first as monitors and then as assistant teachers, until at length they are competent to become masters.* And should the before-mentioned objectionable qualities be exhibited by any student, ample opportunity would exist for checking their development, and for so regulating the employment of the youth in the Reformatory School as to prevent their producing mischief.

In order to render available for pupils in the Normal School the aid proffered by the recent minute of the Committee of Council, some modification of the conditions of the latter would be necessary; but the very earnest desire manifested on the part of Government to promote the Reformatory cause may surely authorise the hope that this would not be found an insuperable difficulty.

I am, Sir, &c.,

A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

We most earnestly recommend this letter, Mr. Turner's paper, and that of Mr. Bengough, with which we commenced this RECORD, to all who are, or who purpose to become, Managers of Reformatory Schools.

At page xxvi of this Record, we inserted the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education, dated, June 2nd, 1856. The following article, bearing upon these minutes,

---

* For an exposition, by M. Demetz, of this portion of the system, pursued at Mettray, see Law Amendment Journal, for June 5, 1856. See also IRISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, No 22, June, 1856, Record, pages lxx. to lxxix.—ED.

extracted from The Midland Counties Herald, shew the importance of the new regulations, and encourage all advocates of the Reformatory system to believe that many of their now forlorn hopes will, with time and judicious management, become accepted realities :—

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS: MINUTE OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION.

The promoters of establishments for Juvenile Reformation have not unfrequently been censured by those whose knowledge on the subject is neither very extensive nor very accurate, for waiting until the mischief is done—that is, until the youth has actually been convicted of crime—before means are taken to train him in the paths of honesty. Whoever has considered the question thoroughly will entertain no doubt on two matters of importance. First, that however perfect our preventive system may be made, there will always be a sufficient number of youths falling into evil courses to render Reformatories necessary and permanent institutions; and, secondly, that whoever thinks he is better employed in doing a little himself than in criticising with folded hands the exertions of others, will find, on experiment, that in a great and complicated undertaking, in which the co-operation of many is required, he must consent to begin at the point where he can find co-operators.

A few years ago, public feeling was shocked with the spectacle of very young persons, who had no instruction, or worse than none, being treated as altogether accountable for their actions, and submitted to a process of retributory punishment, which ended in making them confirmed criminals, and enrolling them in the class which engages in the pursuit of crime as its means of subsistence. In joining, heart, and hand, with those whose sympathies had been thus awakened, they foresaw that public attention, when once directed to any one part of the great subject, would not long be restricted to a mere sectional view, but would expand, until in the end it would reach the farthest limits of the enterprise.

The origin of the very gratifying interest in preventive and reformatory measures with regard to our juvenile population, which has now diffused itself throughout the whole country—or, if not the origin, at all events that great impetus to the movement which has struck the most unobservant with surprise—is, according to the opinion of the Quarterly Review, to be attributed to the Birmingham Conference of 1851. At that meeting a complete system of Preventive and Reformatory Schools was sketched out; but public opinion running very strongly in favour of taking action, as our American friends call it, in relief of young persons brought before Criminal Courts, it was thought wise, and indeed essential, to confine the labours of those whose duty it was to carry into effect the principles which the Conference had sanctioned to the accomplishment of that particular object. How much has now been done, both in the Legislature and out of doors, to advance the cause is well known to our readers; and if, looking forwards, the heights we have reached are far below those which remain to be scaled, yet, looking backwards, we must rejoice to see that we have fairly emerged from the gloomy vale in which we had so long sojourned.

The third resolution of the Conference of 1851 was, "That the adoption of a somewhat altered and extended course of proceeding, on the part of the Committee of Privy Council, is earnestly to be desired for those children who have not yet made themselves amenable to the law, but who, by reason of the vice, neglect, or extreme poverty of their parents, are not admitted into the existing Day Schools." The Lords of the Council, however, were not prepared to act on this suggestion, which furnished another reason for concentrating efforts upon improving the treatment of young offenders.

But now the views of the Committee of the Privy Council have changed. The training which the public mind has undergone during the last four years and a half has not been thrown away on their Lordships, whose recent Minute is a precious testimonial to the value of the mental discipline to which, in common with their humbler fellow-mortals, these high personages have been subjected.

From the Provincial Conference of the National Reformatory Union, to be held on 20th, 22d, and 23d of this month (August,) at Bristol, much valuable information will be obtained. We know that all exertions are being made to render it worthy the Union which is national in the true sense of the word, and which numbers, amongst its members, men and women of all religions. We shall, if possible, insert the proceedings of this Conference in an Appendix to our present Record.

Since the issuing our Record for June, the First Report from the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Transportation has appeared. The following is an analysis of Col. Jebb's evidence on the results of the Ticket-of-Leave System :—

The number of convicts who had received orders of license between the passing of the Act and the 11th of March in the present year was shown by a Parliamentary return to be 5,049, of whom 4,303 were released from the prisons of Great Britain, 435 from Bermuda and Gibraltar, and 311 (juveniles) from Parkhurst. Of the whole, 447 were charged with subsequent offences, and 404 were convicted, 230 being returned to prison under sentences which did not require their licenses to be revoked. The licenses of 173 were revoked. The number of convicts whose licenses were refused or withheld for misconduct was 554. The latter item, the witness explained, merely indicated the number who, by some act or acts of misconduct, had, during their three or four years' confinement, forfeited a month or months, which delayed the period when they would otherwise have been eligible for release. The number of convictions (404) was about eight per cent. of the whole number released; and that, extending over a period of two years and five

extracted from The Midland Counties
 portance of the new regulation of the Reformatory system forlorn hopes will, with become accepted reagents

REFORMA

The pro-
not un-subi-the ave.
for prepared
Day

xlvii

SECOND—TO SEPTEMBER, 1856, those who:

COM-

He 404
Against ults on assertion.
A class of a larceny,
; making total of 404."
to the 31st

2, 13; Berk-58; Cheshire,
; Devonshire,

Dec. 13; Berkshire, 53; Cheshire, 68; Cornwall, 21; Cumberland, 98; Dorsetshire, 28; Durham, 42; Gloucestershire, 64; Hampshire, 130; Herefordshire, 22; Hertfordshire, 44; Huntingdonshire, 12; Kent, 102; Lancashire, 557; Leicestershire, 53; Lincolnshire, 65; Middlesex, 926; Northumberland, 65; Nottinghamshire, 55; Norfolk, 73; Northamptonshire, 42; Oxfordshire, 42; Rutlandshire, 4; Shropshire, 31; Somersetshire, 211; Staffordshire, 146; Suffolk, 63; Surrey, 104; Sussex, 38; Warwickshire, 198; Westmoreland, 9; Wiltshire, 52; Worcestershire, 66; Yorkshire, 311; Wales, 96; making altogether 4,104.—The population of these different counties is taken from the census returns; and the proportion of ticket-of-leave men to 10,000 of the inhabitants would be as follows:—1 per 10,000 in Bedfordshire, 3 4-10ths in Berkshire, 1 6-10ths in Buckinghamshire, 2 9-10ths in Cambridgeshire, 1 5-10ths in Cheshire, 6-10ths in Cornwall, 5-10ths in Cumberland, 1 2-10ths in Derbyshire, 1 7-10ths in Devonshire, 1 5-10ths in Dorsetshire, 1 1-700th in Durham, 1 9-10ths in Essex, 1 4-10ths in Gloucestershire, 3 2-10ths in Hampshire, 1 9-10ths in Herefordshire, 2 6-10ths in Hertfordshire, 1 9-10ths in Huntingdonshire, 1 6-10ths in Kent, 2 7-10ths in Lancashire, 2 3-10ths in Leicestershire, 1 6-10ths in Lincolnshire, 4 9-10ths in Middlesex, 2 1-10th in Northumberland, 2 in Nottinghamshire, 1 7-10ths in Norfolk, 2 in Northamptonshire, 2 4-10ths in Oxfordshire, 1 7-10ths in Rutlandshire, 1 3-10ths in Shropshire, 4 7-10ths in Somersetshire, 2 4-10ths in Staffordshire, 1 9-10ths in Suffolk, 1 5-10ths in Surrey, 1 1-10th in Sussex, 4 2-10ths in Warwickshire, 1 5-10ths in Westmoreland, 2 4-10ths in Wiltshire, 2 3-10ths in Worcestershire, 1 8-10ths in Yorkshire, and 3 2-100ths in Wales.

NATIONAL REFORMATORY UNION.

The first provincial Conference of this Association was held at Bristol on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of August. The unpropitious state of the weather was somewhat damping to the ardour of those who had laboured in the "getting up" of the conferences; but every one was put into good spirits by the excellent audiences which on every occasion encouraged the friends of the movement by their presence, and cheered the speakers by their attention and applause. We could not help regarding these vast and overflowing assemblages as a striking evidence of the deep interest which the Reformatory movement is at present exciting through the country; nor could we, as humble labourers in the great cause, refrain from reflecting, with unmingled satisfaction, upon the vast amount of good which cannot fail to result from so varied and valuable a mass of information, collected together at a centre like Bristol, and thence spread abroad by the newspaper and periodical press through the country.

The Times, Morning Advertiser, Daily News, and Morning Herald sent down picked reporters, who daily furnished sketches of everything that took place.

INAUGURAL MEETING.

The Inaugural Meeting was held Aug. 20, at 3 o'clock, in the Merchants' Hall, King-street, Bristol. The attendance was very numerous, and, although the weather was exceedingly unfavourable, a large number of ladies were present upon the occasion.

The Chair was taken by the Right Hon. Lord Stanley, who was supported by, amongst others, Lord Robert Cecil, M. P., Right Hon. John Pakington, Bart, M. P., Mr. W. Miles, M. P., Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart., M. P., Mr. Adderley, M. P., Mr. J. Vining, the Mayor of Bristol, Mr. Commissioner Hill, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Dean of Bristol, the Rev. Canon Girdlestone, Rev. Dr. English, Rev. W. Osborne, Rev. W. Tyler, of Spitalfields, Rev. Sidney Turner, H. M. Inspector of Schools, Mr James Hassell, Master of the Society of Merchant Venturers, Mr. Barwicke Baker, of Hardwick, Mr. Jellinger Symons, Messrs. Sanford, Wheatley, G. W. Hastings, W. Morgan, Gibbon, Bowyer, Lee Thornton, W. Naish, T. P. Jose, R. Leonard, C. J. Thomas, Col. Pinney, Col. Burrowes, &c.

The Right Worshipful the Mayor, J. Vining, Esq., said—Ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasing duty to have the honour of introducing to you the noble Lord in the chair, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley. His lordship's object in visiting us on this occasion, is to explain to you a system of National Reformatory Union, which having been begun in Bristol, will, we trust, be extended throughout the country. That his lordship and those associated with him, should have thought fit to visit Bristol, I take to be a high compliment. I gather from it that his lordship is aware that the ground has already been here broken, that we have Establishments existing here, and that though struggling under some difficulties, they yet show the practicable results of such a movement. I trust also that his lordship is aware that we are preeminent for our charitable Establishments—(hear, hear). It is not many months since we were honored by a visit from my Lord Granville, upon occasion of the establishment of a Trade School—our late respected Diocesan also established a Cathedral training and a middle school, and besides those we have also those splendid charitable endowments for which we are indebted to Whitson, Carr, and Colston. I consider that we are pre-eminently entitled to the attention of his Lordship and the gentlemen combined with him. I trust that the ground now broken will receive the good seed, and that we may date from their efforts the commencement of an era of great national social improvement.

The Right Hon. Lord Stanley then proceeded to address the assemblage as follows :—

Ladies and gentlemen,—I will not detain you with any preface to the remarks which it will be my duty to make, nor apologise for the inevitable length to which they may extend. The subject of reformatories is to you deeply interesting; your presence in this room proves that. The subject is beset with difficulties, else why the controversies, the debates, the writing and speaking that has taken place concerning it during the last five years? The subject is one on which action, and prompt action, is needed, otherwise it would hardly, in this practical country and age, occupy the most intelligent minds, and lead to the most strenuous exertions. The legislature has taken up, as regards the reformatory movement, a peculiar, though I think a wise, position. It assists the founders of schools; it gives them legal powers; it makes use of their agency; but it does not supersede their efforts. The law under which we act takes for granted the existence of so much public spirit in the community as that individuals may be left to initiate a movement which in other countries would fall within the especial province of the executive. It is our duty and our purpose to-day to show that the confidence of Parliament is not misplaced; that those who frame the laws and those who administer them, have not reckoned in too sanguine a spirit on the philanthropy and the patriotism of English citizens. I propose, so far as time allows, to lay before you an outline sketch of this vast subject: wishing to be accurate, I have set down on paper the substance of the facts and arguments which I shall use; and holding it a deception to speak in public, on a question which one has not studied, I can assure you, however small the results may be, that there is scarcely a pamphlet, a debate, or a printed report of the last few years, bearing on the subject, from which I have not endeavoured to glean something in the shape either of information or advice.

Now, in the first place, in order to know clearly the magnitude of the evil for which we have to provide a remedy, let us endeavour to ascertain the actual and relative amount, in this country, of adult and juvenile crime. I do not apprehend that this can be done in a very exact manner. Prison returns can draw no distinction, though morally the distinction is a very wide one, between trivial breaches of law, compatible with innocence, and offences which are of a nature to indicate habitual crime. Nor is the shape of our statistical information on these subjects convenient. The difficulty I have found in ascertaining, even imperfectly as I may have done it, the facts required supply me, if it were needed, with a fresh reason to envy and to hold up for imitation the complete, uniform, and simple mode in which the judicial statistics of France are compiled. Nevertheless, such materials as we possess we may use; and looking to the 19th report, just published, of the prison inspectors of England and Wales, which supplies us with the returns of 1853, I find it there stated that the numbers, "for trial or tried at assizes or sessions" were 26,804; the summary convictions, 71,850; making a total of those who have come under the law 98,654; or in round numbers about 100,000. Now in that same year there were of juvenile offenders, that is under 17 years, tried or for trial 2,105; summarily convicted 9,348; total 11,453; we have then the proportion of juvenile to all crime for that year, fixed at  $11\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the figures for 1852, show a generally similar result. I will not weary you with statistics, but it is worth notice, and proof of which I state may be found in this same report, that while the proportion of juvenile crime, that is, of crime committed under the age of 17, does not exceed the figure I have mentioned, the amount committed between the age of 17 and 20 is absolutely enormous, forming, for those 4 years of life alone, nearly 25 per cent. of the whole. This fact is partially corroborated by the census returns of 1851, where of all the prisoners under sentence in Great Britain on a particular day, just 25 per cent. were found to be under 20 years of age: and a result almost identical with this was obtained by Mr. Redgrave from the census of 1841.

It is a startling fact in the investigation of crime, that while the number of persons living at any one time, between the age of 15 and 20, formerly only one tenth of the entire population at that time, this tenth is guilty of nearly fourth the amount of detected crime. I do not think that the prison or any of their returns can give us an exact idea of the number of those with whom the reformatory movement may have to deal. There are lads who break the law and get punished who are yet in no sense habitual offenders; there is perhaps still a good deal of undetected crime in counties where no efficient police exists, and no statement of the numbers annually imprisoned can help us, except in the roughest way, to estimate the number of those who may be at large. This only we know, that more than 11,000 children, a large majority to pass annually through the hands of justice, with how little reformatory effects in general, to a large proportion of recommitments nearly 4,000 out of 11,000 show plainly enough.

I can hardly imagine anything more vitally important for us in carrying on this reformatory movement, to ascertain then the scale, on which we shall have to conduct our operations. Unfortunately, there is no part of the whole subject on which so little light can be thrown. We are now working very much in the dark, we have little experience to appeal to, all estimates as to numbers have hitherto been mere guesses and they differ. I speak with some hesitation when I say that, when the reformatory comes widely into operation, you will not be sufficiently prepared to meet all contingencies unless you reckon on a yearly influx of from 2,000 to 3,000 boys. The term of detention being at the estimate 5 years, you might according to that have 15,000 in process of reclamation. When I reflect that the cost per head to the state is only £13 yearly, and that from this must be deducted the sums recovered from parents, there appears to me to be no danger of burdening the finances with a demand disproportionate to the importance of the object in view. When we speak of the possible cost of reformatories, it is well to think of the certain cost of crime. We are apt to think only of the taxes which we pay to government, and forget those we pay to those whom it is the object of the government to put down. I quote it valent quantum that a committee appointed by the authorities of Liverpool to investigate losses caused by theft, placed those losses at the sum of £700,000. Mr. Clay, of Preston, has assumed the average income of a successful thief at £100, and in the case of prisoners whose history he investigated, he found that, besides the loss which their depredations might have caused, the average cost of their apprehension, maintenance, prosecution, and punishment was £62 a piece. Similarly Mr. Rushton, writing in 1842, to the corporation of Liverpool, referred to the case of 14 prisoners, whom he estimated as having caused a dead loss to the community of between £2000 and £3000. We have heard of gaols costing between £150 or £200 per cell; there are some which have far exceeded this estimate. We know how little productive prison labour can be made, and on estimating the injury produced by crime, we must take into account the annoyance, the fear, and the trouble caused, which generally far exceed in importance to the sufferer the pecuniary loss itself. Financiers have an axiom, that a little uncertainty in a tax is worse than a great deal of irregularity; now obviously no tax is so uncertain, both in amount and time of collection, nor is so vexatious as regards the manner of collecting, as that which falls upon us in the shape of loss by robbery. I just name these facts in passing, as an answer to those who, not here but elsewhere, might be inclined to talk about the expense of criminal reform.

Passing from the question of numbers, let us consider whether there exists any chance of juvenile crime decreasing through other agencies than ours. We all know—we have heard them again and again—what are the principal causes of adult crime. Early ignorance, vicious associations, habitual intemperance (the most powerful demoralizing agent of all), and imperfections in police arrangements, whereby the example is held out of offences committed without detection. Poverty and distress are also operating influences, but to what extent they operate is a question much disputed. The specific agencies at work in creating juvenile criminality have been analyzed with great minuteness by Mr. Clay, of Preston, than whom no man is better known in connexion with reformatory movements. He found that in 75 per cent. of the cases investigated by him, the fault of the children lay unmistakably at the door of the parents. In 57 per cent. of those cases there had been habitual drunkenness, often accompanied by brutality, on the part of the father; in the remaining 18 per cent. habitual indifference and neglect. That is to say, in three cases out of every four of juvenile delinquency which came before him, the prisoner had had hardly a chance of becoming anything but what he was. Mr. Clay's operation is corroborated by another, which I extract from an able and useful pamphlet by Mr. Adshead. He states that from an inquiry made into the cases of 100 criminal children at Manchester in 1840, the following results were elicited :

Born of dishonest parents	...	...	...	...	60
Parents profligate, but not of the criminal class	...	...	...	...	30
Parents honest and industrious	...	...	...	...	10

100

An inquiry tends to show that in crime, as in pauperism, there is a tendency to become hereditary ; and the effect of neglect in developing crime is demonstrated by the large proportion of illegitimate children in gaols. It seems that unless we could deal with the parents, we cannot prevent the corrupting process from going on ; we cannot hinder children being driven out of miserable houses to seek a living by plunder in the streets. Now nothing is more certain than that to deal directly with the parent is impossible ; he is out of our reach ; he is beyond our control ; he is proof against such influences as we can bring to bear. So far as he is concerned, the work of demoralization must and will go on. Indirectly no doubt we may operate upon that class from which the parents of the criminal population are usually taken. But we can hope to operate upon it only by means of measures and movements continued through a long series of years, and needing time for their results to appear ; by means of better schooling, of temperance societies, of places of rational amusement substituted for the beer-house ; of cheap literature, of every encouragement which society can offer to industry and forethought. Meantime the children are being misled, convictions, imprisonments, recommitments continue. The more I look into the subject, the more fully assured I feel, that, for both the present and future diminution of crime, the only direct and immediate agency that can be employed, I do not say the best, but virtually the only one—consists in the detection, the training, and the giving honest employment to criminal children ; whom the neglect of such means will render offenders for life. There are other agencies which, in the long run, may, and I hope will, affect powerfully the less wealthy classes of society ; but these agencies are indirect only, and do not meet the necessity which is upon us of immediate action. Next let us consider (and I assure you I am endeavouring to be as brief as is in my power), what is the past history and present state of this reformatory movement. I am afraid we, as a nation, can hardly claim the credit of having been foremost to discern and to act upon the principle which this Union meets to promote. It is true that in 1788 the Philanthropic Society of London, the Society now familiarly known to us by the name of its school, Red Hill, was set on foot by private means. It is true that 15 years earlier Howard had called attention to this branch of prison discipline. It is true that in 1815 the Prison Discipline Society was established, one of whose chief objects was to save young offenders from the corruption of contact made in Manchester some years back gave 80 per cent. of the criminals whose cases had been investigated, as being the children of dishonest, criminal, or profligate parents; and only 10 per cent., or one-tenth of the whole, as the children of honest parents. All these figures, and many more computations of the same kind that have been made, agree in this, that in crime, as in the analogous case of pauperism, there is a strong tendency to become hereditary, and the inference to be drawn from that is this, that there is a large number, an immense proportion of the whole number of the juvenile criminals, who are so from circumstances, and not from choice; whose organization, whose character, does not more incline them to dishonesty than does that of others who have never entered upon vicious courses; who, in fact, have never had the chance given them, from the time of their birth, of obtaining a livelihood by honest means. These poor boys are, in fact, known and marked in the places where they reside; honest children will not associate with them; respectable employers will have nothing to do with them; and for any boy to be seen with them is in itself a stigma, and a mark of such boy not being himself respectable. Such is their position, and they grow up thieves, not because they want to be thieves, but because literally, they have no option offered to them.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, you will see at once that if we can make out that case, and we believe that there is abundance of evidence to substantiate it, if we can make out that case there is no reason to despair of the reformation of those who are brought within our reach under these circumstances. We do not want to overstate our case. It is not fair, and it never answers to do so. We quite allow that amongst the entire number there may be some who may be wholly or very nearly incorrigible. We quite admit the existence of this evil; but what we say is that these are the minority, and that the curable cases are the majority. And as regards those who are incorrigible, we conceive a certain advantage is gained—even though you may be unable to improve their characters, you can at least place them where they have not the opportunity of corrupting others. There is another inference to be drawn from the hereditary and local character of crime, and it is this: criminality does not, as we believe, at all follow the ordinary law of supply and demand. It does not follow that, because you have a certain amount of property, and only a certain number of police to guard it, you will also have a fixed amount of crime. That does not follow at all. We believe, when you have once succeeded in clearing the streets of this regular and hereditary criminal class, you will find that the crimes with which you will have to deal in future will be fewer in number and less criminal in character. It is one thing for a boy who has been well brought up from childhood to take to vice, and it is a quite another thing for a boy who has been brought up in vice, subsequent to his seeming reformation, to go back, it may be for a short time, to his old associates and habits. The two cases must not be confounded together. When, therefore, the success of our Reformatories is stated at 60, 70, or 80 per cent., we are not justified in supposing that the other 40, 30, or 20 per cent., must necessarily be given up as hopeless ; we believe there are many cases where relapses have only been temporary, and that the lessons which have been so long and assiduously taught, though they bear no immediate fruit, will do so at some later day.

Now, you are probably aware, most of you, to what extent the Legislature has taken up this movement. The law has now given to magistrates the power of sentencing boys under 16 years of age to detention in Reformatories for periods not exceeding five years. The State grants 5s. weekly, 13*l.* 10*s.* per annum, for their support. It endeavours to recover that sum from the parents. By the minute of last June, large and liberal assistance is afforded in other shapes to those who desire to set up and carry on Reformatory schools ; and the object of this Society, which holds its meeting here to-night, is to render that law practically available, as far as it is possible to do so. We want to put its provisions in force. We want to assist in the establishment of new Reformatory Schools, and where they are established, we seek to give facilities for comparing the various methods which are pursued at the different schools, and to furnish opportunities for the discussion of the general subject. We want, if changes in the law should be required, to discuss those changes amongst ourselves, and to press their adoption upon Parliament ; and lastly—and this is the most important of all—we wish to furnish all those inmates of Reformatories, who in course of time may have to leave them, with a fair opportunity of getting a start in life, by procuring for them honest and respectable employment. We have sometimes been asked to include within the scope of our operations that other subject which I mentioned—adult reform. That, I confess, I should be unwilling to do. I attach great importance to keeping the two distinct. I think if we were to go beyond that line of operations which we have traced out for ourselves, we should run some risks of diminishing our own utility by attempting too much ; and by combining the more hopeful with the less hopeful enterprise, we should run the risk of incurring—I don't say prejudice, I don't say unpopularity—but we should run the risk of being held accountable for failures, which in that other enterprise are inevitable, and failures with which we have nothing to do, and cannot be held accountable for if we confine ourselves to juvenile criminals. There may be a future field of operations opened up to us in that wide question of industrial schools for vagrant children ; that, however, is a question rather for the future than for the present, rather for the Government than for private benevolence ; and although we are happy to have information and discussions upon the subject, for the present we must confine our operations to schools of a strictly reformatory character ; that is to say, schools provided for criminal children.

Now, in discussing this subject, there are three general heads, under which the whole inquiry falls ; 1st. On what conditions and in what manner are children to be admitted to Reformatory Schools ? 2ndly. On what principles are those schools to be conducted while they are there ? and, 3rdly. When the boys leave the schools, what is to become of them ? As to the question of admission, we have had, not only here, but, I believe, wherever the friends of this cause have assembled, very animated and very important debates on the question of previous imprisonment. By the law, as it now stands, it is necessary that a boy, after conviction, before entering a Reformatory, should have gone through a short term of imprisonment. There are some of our friends who think that that should be optional, and not compulsory upon the magistrates. There are others again who object to the system of previous imprisonments altogether, and who think that in every case a boy should be sent directly to the Reformatory School. I note these points simply for the information of those who may not be aware of the state of opinion amongst us; I do not attempt to decide between those who differ, or to pronounce any judgment of my own upon the points in dispute. Some contend, that to send a boy to gaol at all is to cast a stigma upon him for his whole life; that the process is in general not one of a reformatory character; that his future prospects in life are affected by it; that there is a danger of creating a feeling of prejudice in his mind that, having undergone the term of his sentence, he had therefore a right to be set at liberty, and that superadding this term of compulsory education is unfair towards him. But I have only to observe, that if this opinion comes to be entertained, nothing could be more fatal to the practical success of our schools.

On the other hand, it is urged that a short period of separate confinement—not exposed to the contaminating influences of elder criminals—is healthy, and not injurious in its operations. That the temporary seclusion gives time for reflection, and that the boy who has been so secluded comes again into the society of other boys—even though that society be accompanied with hard fare and hard labour—with a feeling of pleasure rather than of pain; and those who support the previous imprisonment contend that it is an argument as far as it goes, that if you are to have penal discipline any where, it is much better to have it at the prison than in the Reformatory, because if you introduce penal discipline there you entirely alter the character of the Institution, and to a great extent you mar the effect of the teaching given. This, I believe, is an outline of the ground on which the controversy has been carried on. I came here merely to give you a sketch of the opinions entertained, and not to take one side or the other; but if I were to express any personal opinion of my own—and I would do so with great deference—I should steer a middle course between the two extremes. I would allow previous imprisonments in some cases to be optional at the discretion of the magistrates and in other cases I would make it compulsory as at present.

I shall now come to the next branch of the subject, which relates to the actual management of these schools. The boy is detained there for a period varying from two to five years, and he is to be taught habits of hard work and industrial occupation. In some cases he may learn a trade; in other cases, as in the Ship Reformatory at Liverpool, he is prepared for the sea. It is held, and I think rightly, that he should be fed, lodged, and treated simply and plainly—roughly, in fact, so that no honest parent need have any cause of envy on behalf of his own children as compared with the condition of the convict children.

Another point on which we lay great stress, and which we make a fundamental rule, is that, whether you have an institution as a whole upon a smaller scale, or whether, as at Mettray and Red Hill, you have some hundreds of boys collected together, in every case you should adopt what has been called the family system; that is, the system of congregating at the utmost not above 40, and, if possible, not more than some 20 or 30 boys in one house, so that personal character, influence, and superintendence may keep up its effect upon all, and that a personal supervision may be exercised over all.

Another rule which we regard as of primary importance to the carrying out of these institutions concerns rather the State than the individual promoters of the cause, it is to obtain from parents, wherever it is possible, either the whole or a part of the sum which Government pays for the maintenance of the child while in the Reformatory. I feel that if this is not done, at least in every case where it is possible to do it, there is a great risk of parents, who are anxious to get rid of the duty and responsibility of maintaining their children, purposely throwing them in the way of their being convicted, in order to get them sentenced to these schools. This is the feeling which we must do our utmost to check. We must say to the parent, "You have neglected your child, and you shall no longer have control over his conduct; but though you have lost that control over his conduct which you desire to retain, we shall still hold you pecuniarily responsible for his support."

Another question is the character of the instruction which should be given in these Reformatories. I think, for my own part, and I hold the opinion most strongly, and shall always express it decidedly, that the education given ought to be as plain and simple in its character as it possibly can be. The object you have in view is not an intellectual, but an industrial and moral object; and I do not hesitate to say that, on the whole, it would be a disadvantage rather than a benefit to the cause, if any large number of those who have been trained in our Reformatories should be seen to rise high above their class in life, and thus to hold out examples of unusual social success to those amongst whom their lot was originally cast. You would not regret it, of course, on account of the boys themselves, but on account of incurring that danger of which I have already spoken, namely, that of exciting in the minds of honest parents a feeling of envy which might lead them to say, "Nobody cares for us as long as we observe the law; and if we want to get noticed by the Legislature, or by benevolent people, the best thing we can do is to make ourselves dangerous." There is a constant risk of this feeling being excited; and anything which would tend to excite it ought to be most carefully avoided. I will not disguise this fact, although it is one of the weak points of our case. I repeat, there is a constant danger of that feeling being excited; and the safeguard against it is to enforce the responsibility of the parent, and to give only such instruction as shall qualify the boy for daily labour, and nothing more.

The last point I have to notice, as being an important one, relates to the disposal of these children after they leave the Reformatories. There are various modes in which their services may be made available:

There is field and ordinary agricultural occupation at home; there are the Colonies; there are the Army and Navy, and Merchant Service. What I say of one of these outlets applies equally to them all—namely, that we must take care, whether we deal with the Army or the Navy, or the Colonies, or the Mercantile Marine, that we do not introduce the criminal element too largely into any one of these; that we do not introduce it in such proportions that the influx shall be noticed and made the subject of comment. The rule we must take is to scatter these children, and to disperse them as much as possible, and not to condense and concentrate them in large masses in any one particular direction.

I will take, in the first place, the Army and Navy; I do not believe that there is any objection, that the boy who has regained, in one of these Institutions, his character for honesty, and who leaves it with the approbation of the Committee under whose direction it has been conducted—I say, I do not believe that there is any objection to take in a few such boys here and there. Wherever it has been done, it has been done with good effect; but if, for the future, it should be made a general practice, there would be prejudice, and a feeling that any particular profession into which these boys were freely and extensively received would be certain, thereby, to become lowered in the public estimation. And if this were done in the case of the Army and the Navy, your prospects of general enlistment would suffer serious injury; and with respect to the Colonies, we all know what has been the feeling in several directions with regard to the continuance of transportation. We carried on that practice till of late years; in some respects we abused it, and the result has been a reaction against it altogether. Just or unjust, I will not argue that; but there is throughout the various colonies of England a strong feeling against what they consider being made to take in, and to receive those with whom England will have nothing further to do. This is a feeling, the existence of which should dictate great caution in all your operations, in order that nothing like a reckless system of emigration, sending out great numbers of these convicted children to any one particular colony, might be allowed; because it would create a hostile feeling, and debar you from that outlet for the future.

A suggestion was made to-day—and I think it was a very valuable one—that in every colony where the friends of this cause might be found, we should endeavour to establish an agency, not a paid agency, but endeavour to find those who would be willing, without fee or reward, to assist us, by exerting themselves among their friends, and undertaking personally, or through their friends, guardianship or protection of a certain number of these poor children. I think that plan is a feasible one, but, I repeat again, a great caution must be used. If you attempt to send a large number in any one direction, I say again there is great danger of provoking a hostile feeling.

Now, what is there that has been done as yet with regard to this Reformatory movement? If you look to actual results accomplished, you must confess that not much, as yet, can be said to have been effected. I say this, because I have read some statements made on a previous occasion, which must have arisen from a misapprehension as to the facts—the effect of which is to convey the idea that our movement is in a much more favourable condition than is actually the case. I think the number in Reformatories in England at the present moment does not exceed some 600 or 700 ; and the number of girls in them does not exceed 100. But though the results which have been actually accomplished are so small, there is a great deal now in process of being done. All the counties, or nearly all of them, are now exerting themselves. Reformatories have been founded, and teachers are been called for in all directions ; and it is with a view at once of encouraging and, to some extent, of directing this movement, that this Union has been founded and the present meetings have been held.

Ladies and gentlemen, before I sit down, I beg to mention the existence of another Institution, which is similar in kind to the one in connection with which we are at present assembled. That Society calls itself The Reformatory and Refuge Union. The difference between that Society and ours is, that, doubtless after full consideration as to the course which they thought it best to pursue, its promoters determined to establish it on a somewhat more sectarian basis than ours. Our basis is essentially unsectarian ; and I think that the principle we should act upon is this, that we should reject no one on account of diversities of theological opinion ; and feeling, as I do, that our real danger, and our only danger in this cause, arises from apathy, from indifference, and from neglect, I, for one, shall quarrel with no display of sectarian zeal out of this Society, which may have the effect of enlisting more recruits in the cause. If that feeling can help us, if that rivalry of opinion and desire of proselytism can be of any assistance, I, for one, say that I do not care about the means ; but I shall rejoice in the assistance which is thus afforded us in obtaining our end. The two Societies, while they differ as to the means, are agreed as to the end, and work together in friendship. We thought it wiser and better to differ as to the method, and to choose for ourselves distinct spheres of action, rather than to remain members of the same body while differing as to the manner in which the operations of that body shall be conducted. I may mention before I sit down a trivial accident which has been the cause of considerable regret.

The Report of Committee read at the meeting yesterday, which has since been made public, contained some remarks on the circumstances which led to the separation of the two Societies. That document was printed from the rough draft, and not from the copy which was approved and adopted by the Committee ; consequently, it contains some expressions relative to the other Society—I can hardly call it a rival Institution—which we do hope will not be regarded as at all intended to express our deliberate sentiments on the subject. The two Societies work together in perfect friendship ; they simply work separately because they think they can work better so. Contrary to my intention, I have already detained you for a long time, and I shall now bring my observations to a close. The most practical result, after all, as regards most of us, of a meeting like this is to give an answer to the question which many of you, I hope, will be inclined to ask, viz.—What can I do to aid this great cause ? Pecuniary assistance is, of course, an object, but it is not our only, or hardly our first, object. We want assistance from those who are desirous to become teachers ; and this requires the earnest devotion of a lifetime ; and there are few, unfortunately, from whom we have any reason to expect such assistance as this.

But there is a practical form in which almost all persons who are above the class of labourers, all, in fact, who have anything to do with the employment of others in any capacity, can assist us; in undertaking the protection and placing out of at least one of that number of boys who will shortly be leaving the Reformatories. The difficulty of disposing of these boys does not immediately press; and there are some who are sanguine enough to hope that it will never press inconveniently upon us. For my own part I most heartily wish that I could be altogether of that opinion. I think the difficulty of disposing of them is one against which we ought to take ample and early precaution, and so thinking, I would merely suggest that the best and most practical service which any one could render to this movement, is to express a willingness, which any one may do by addressing himself to the Secretary of the Union, to undertake the giving or procuring employment—specifying, of course, the nature of employment—to one of those children who will shortly be issuing in great numbers from our schools. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I have laid before you an outline of the subject, and I shall, with great pleasure, resign the duty of further addressing you to those who can boast of a much earlier and a much more active, and a much more practical connection with the movement, than mine has been.

Lord Robert Cecil, M. P., said, with regard to the concluding sentence of the speech of the noble lord who had just sat down, he could not for his own part claim to be one of those who had had the practical experience alluded to; but he felt earnestly on the subject, and he was anxious to do whatever he could to aid the movement by every means that lay in his power. The Resolution which had been put into his hands was—

“That this meeting strongly approves of the objects of the National Reformatory Union.”

The rapidity with which this movement had progressed in England must have been a matter of surprise to all; but he did not think it was till last year that any scheme was found, or at least definitely entertained, of uniting the efforts of those who are earnest in the common cause around a common centre. Another Society had been formed with similar objects, but principles somewhat distinct, and an effort was made early in the present year to unite the two Societies, which at first sight seemed to be an easy matter; a meeting was held, and a discussion was entered into, but they found that the other Society had resolved on confining its efforts to a single group of Christian denominations, and highly respecting their motives, and wishing them well in the course they were taking, they yet felt that they should be abandoning the object which they had selected, if they were to join in any such exclusive system. He was very anxious that on this point he should not be misunderstood. He was anxious that it should not be considered that they thought one bit the less, or that they were the one atom the less sensible of the all importance of religion as an agent. Religion must be the teacher's motive for his self-denying life; religion must be, in reality, the sole motive which induced him to devote himself to the cause of his pupils. Religion was the motive power, without which the best machinery must inevitably fail; while with it an organization and staff, inferior intellectually, might every often be attended with a very gratifying amount of success. Nor, again, were any of them willing to accept the imputation that they regarded with indifference the points on which they were divided. They were as deeply attached as any one to all those points, and they believed that their desire was to set before Christendom the example of a combination in this great work of all who loved the name of our Lord and Saviour

Jesus Christ. He did not think that in the course which they had pursued they had shown any lack of love for religion. The two Societies were not rivals, but colleagues in the cause; they were actuated by mutual good-will, and they both desired that the cause should progress. But they moved in different paths. The Reformatory and Refuge Union had been mainly concerned with those Societies which, instituted without any recognition or aid from Government, undertook by private charity to reform the outcast boys upon the streets. It had far less connection with the Reformatory Institutions with which they (the National) were especially concerned, and those Reformatory Institutions with which it was connected were so far different from those represented upon that platform, that they existed mainly in London—a sphere nearer those whom they sought to succour, but exposed to many dangers from which more rural retreats were free.

Again, it so happened that most of those who took an interest in public affairs, most of those who were Members of Parliament, belonged to the National Society, and consequently one of the tasks which their Chairman mentioned to them as one of those which the National Society proposed to itself as one of the main parts of its duty—was that of pressing upon the Legislature those changes which might appear necessary to be made in the law on the subject. They had not got all from the Legislature which they required, and there were many questions which they must bring before Parliament, such as the question of preliminary punishment, apprenticeship, and emigration, as furnishing an outlet from the Reformatories, &c. They must also direct their attention to Girls' Reformatories. This was an all-important subject, because it went straight to the root of their whole system. One of the most powerful agencies in the formation of character was that never-ceasing, insensible influence which nothing but a virtuous home could furnish. The mother made the home a virtuous home, which reared the virtuous citizen, or the profligate home, which turned out the thieving boy; and therefore it was that in their Girls' Reformatories lay the whole secret of the future reformation of what were called the criminal classes. The reformation of boys was more important than the reformation of adults, and the reformation of girls was more important than the reformation of boys. Government must also turn its attention to the systematic operations going on for the purpose of training thieves and making them expert in their calling. The emissaries of those places caught the boys in the streets, and educated them in thieving, and they had even been known to dupe them away from the Reformatories.

SIR JOHN PAXINGTON, M.P., seconded the motion, and briefly sketched the history of the movement.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, the Rev. Canon GIRDLESTONE, and Mr. Jellinger Symonds, then addressed the meeting on the subject of Preventive Schools.

The Mayor of BRISTOL moved the warmest thanks of the meeting to Lord Stanley, for the very able manner in which he had presided over the Conference.

Mr. W. MILES, M.P., seconded the motion, which was put, and carried unanimously.

Lord Stanley returned thanks for the compliment, and the meeting separated shortly after 11 o'clock.

On Friday the proceedings of the Conference were brought to a close by an excursion to the Reformatory Schools, Pynes, near Exeter, to Hardwicke-court Reformatory, and to the following Bristol Reformatories : Arno's court, Kingswood, St. James's-back, Pennywell-lane Industrial School, the Orphan Asylum, Ashley-down, and the Red Lodge Girls' Reformatory School.

We are indebted to The Bristol Gazette, and to The Philanthropist, for these reports of the Bristol meetings ; and all who read them, understanding the Reformatory movement, and the objects of the National Reformatory Union, must rejoice to find, that the question of Reformation is making such progress towards complete success, and has become so publicly known and appreciated beyond the comparatively small circle of its own peculiar thinkers and workers.

Lord Stanley's speech was admirable, but in one point we differ with him, and we know that the most acknowledged leaders of the cause differ with him on exactly the same point.

He considers that our objects should be Juvenile Reformation, and appears to think that Adult Reformation is beyond our scope, or above human agency. This is a most grave and unenlightened view of the Reformatory principle. In fact, all who know the system are well aware, that with modified phases of the Reformatory principle, the full benefits of the Reformatory system can be extended to, and developed in, the full reformation of the Adult criminals of either sex.

We know well that this is the opinion of Mr. Recorder Hill, of Mr. Frederic Hill, of Mr. Robert Hall, of Miss Carpenter, of Captain Crofton, and of Mr. Baker, who has told us repeatedly that, if permitted by the Government to try the experiment, he would be as successful with an Adult Farm School as with a Juvenile Reformatory.

And Mr. Baker is quite right—Captain Crofton has proved it for him, and more than proved it, because the Smithfield Institution is situated in the poorest part of Dublin, surrounded by low lodging-houses, common brothels, and public houses ; yet Captain Crofton trusts his men beyond the walls of the Institution as messengers, with their own money in their pockets. Mr. Baker's men would not be thus exposed ; his would be, like his present Reformatory, a country place.

The Sisters of Mercy at Golden Bridge have their Adult Female Reformatory, and we have seen seventeen or twenty women, who came wild and godless to gaol, thoughtful to the Reformatory, and who will leave it fully reformed, or rather re-made.

We are happy, most happy, to find a man of Lord Stanley's position, energy and ability, entering the ranks of the advocates of the Reformatory Principle, but it would be a most disastrous error if the public were to believe, that he expressed the opinions of the leaders of the movement, when he stated that Juvenile Reformation should be considered the ne plus ultra of their labors and their aspirations.

QUARTERLY RECORD OF THE PROGRESS OF RE- FORMATORY AND RAGGED SCHOOLS, AND OF THE IMPROVEMENT OF PRISON DISCIPLINE.

We commence the RECORD of the past quarter by a few facts, very cheering, although not connected with these Kingdoms. However, as we take revolvers from America, it is possible that in time we may adopt her plan of Government in prison matters, and will acknowledge, first, that the action of government in the prevention and punishment of crime is paternal ; second, that the object of punishment is reformatory and not vengeful ; third, that the law of reformation, in the State as in the family, is the law of kindness ; fourth, that as criminals differ in age and experience as criminals, they should be treated accordingly ; fifth, that prisons and gaols are not in their essence reformatory institutions, and only become so by means of circumstances not necessarily nor ordinarily acting—the prison being a battle-field between Vice and Virtue, with the odds of position and numbers on the side of Vice ; and consequently and finally, that since prisons ordinarily can only exert a feeble moral influence on their inmates, and fail as reformatory institutions, on the whole, we ought to search for a new and different agency, and if we find one, put it in use. This is a short abstract of the policy of America, as expressed in the very able address of the Hon. George S. Boutwell, Secretary to the Massachusetts Board of Education, and delivered by him at Lancaster, at the opening of the State Industrial School for Girls, August 27th, 1856. From The Boston Daily Advertiser, we take the following account of this School :—

Before proceeding further, we may as well state that it is the design of this institution to afford to exposed and helpless girls that protection on the part of the State which their natural protectors either cannot or will not afford. Its subjects will be taken between the ages of 7 and 16, on the warrant of judges of probate, after an examination at which any person professing a right of control or guardianship over the girl will be heard. They will be committed until they shall attain the age of 18 ; and will be detained in the school so long as may appear necessary or expedient, and will then be placed in families. In the principal cities and large towns, commissioners will be appointed by the governor, having the same authority to send girls to the school as the judges of probate.

The examination of the fitness of a girl for the school must not be regarded as a criminal proceeding; the sending of the girl there is not a punishment, nor is the school in any sense a prison.

For the better execution of this design it was determined not to erect any gigantic building for the accommodation of a numerous crowd of inmates; but rather to give the girls the feeling of residing like a family in a home.

The commissioners who were appointed by Governor Washburn to select a site, erect buildings, and prepare a plan for the institution, were Messrs. John H. Wilkins, Henry B. Rogers, and Francis B. Fay. They have nobly discharged their duty, and have fully justified the wisdom of Governor Washburn in selecting them, and the generous confidence of Governor Gardner in retaining them to the completion of their task. After a diligent examination of various localities, and comparison of advantages, they selected the old "Stillwell Place," in the town of Lancaster. Here they were so fortunate as to be able to purchase 100 acres of excellent land, with a large old-fashioned mansion-house, built of brick, two wooden dwelling-houses, with barns and fixtures, for a sum a little exceeding ten thousand dollars. The two wooden houses are well adapted for the residences of the Superintendent and of the Farmer, respectively; the mansion-house was enlarged and fitted for the purposes of the school at an expense of about 4000 dollars, and two new brick buildings were put up at an expense of about 12,500 dollars each. These sums, with some other expenses of construction, were met by the original State appropriation of 20,000 dollars and the private subscription of 20,500 dollars. The State also appropriated 5000 dollars for furnishing the buildings, and likewise bears the current expenses of maintenance.

The two new buildings with the mansion-house make three separate "homes" for three separate "families" of girls, which are designed to be kept distinct in most respects, with separate matrons and assistants residing in each house, but united under the general care of one superintendent. The two new buildings are precisely alike. They are constructed of brick, in the best style, without ornament, and neatly and appropriately furnished. The following general description will give an idea of their appearance and internal arrangement. Each of them is two stories in height and constructed in the form of an L. Entering at the front door, which is near the angle of the L—on your right is the parlour, from which opens the "work-room," likewise on the right hand of the entry—next this a small lighted room or closet—and a school room, at the end of the entry, occupies the remainder of the L. All the rooms appear small to one who has the idea of a public institution in his mind; but compared with the private dwellings of persons in ordinary circumstances, they are of sufficient size. The school room is fitted with desks for 30 scholars. Opposite the work-room, on the left of the entry, is the landing, and a large closet adjoining.

Starting again at the front door, at the left hand, opposite the parlour, is the dining room, from which we proceed through the other arm of the L into the kitchen, a large lighted closet intervening. In this part of the building are likewise a bath-room, sink-room, and store-room. There is a passage leading from a door in the end of this arm of the L into the main entry, between the dining room and the large closet adjoining the laundry.

On the second story, over the parlour, is the matron's room; over the work-room is the general dormitory, containing six beds designed for 12 inmates; over the dining-room is a room called the "hospital"—and at each end of the L are eight small single bed-rooms. The attic is finished as a safe and commodious play-room; and there are one or two rooms in this part of the house which may be used as additional dormitories on an emergency.

All the rooms are very thoroughly ventilated. The houses are heated by furnaces. There is a copious supply of pure water carried to the highest part of the houses; it is brought from an unfailing spring about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles distant, in iron pipes lined with porcelain. The head has an elevation of 100 feet above the plateau on which the houses stand, and the arrangement is thus an effective safeguard in case of fire as well as a great domestic convenience. There is a fountain or jet in the centre of the grounds, from which a small stream was played during a portion of the time yesterday.

The furniture is neat and not luxurious. A little bed, a bureau, a chair, a small piece of carpeting, a diminutive mirror, and a Bible, complete the appointments of the single dormitories. But everything is nice, and all the arrangements are of the most convenient description. Each of the three houses is designed to accommodate 30 girls. The rooms of the matron and her assistant are so arranged that they can have a general supervision over the whole establishment. We neglected to obtain an exact measurement, but the length of each arm of the L is about 75 feet, and the breadth about 30. We should mention that the shape of the buildings is not perfectly regular, but there are slight variations, which add to their convenience, and give them a better appearance.

The mansion-house is three stories in height, (the water is carried to the highest,) and differs somewhat in its internal arrangement from the others, but it has been made by new partitions to conform substantially to the general plan. The roof of each house commands a fine prospect, embracing beautiful scenery far and near, the summits of Wachusett and Monadnock distinctly visible in the distance. Large trees abound in the grounds about the houses.

We have already mentioned the name of Mr. Peirce, the superintendent, who resides with his family in one of the wooden houses. The farmer, Mr. A. E. Boynton, resides in another. The two matrons already appointed, are Mrs. C. M. S. Carpenter and Mrs. Mary M. Willard.

For a chapel for the institution, a small Church standing in the village of South Lancaster has been purchased, and will be moved to the grounds. There are handsome book-cases in the "work-rooms, and the beginning of a library—but we should think the donation of books might be acceptable.

Upon the conclusion of the formal opening of the School, the following proclamation, which expresses the principle of the Government, was read, and it will be observed that it nearly approaches the system as carried out in Scotland, and so ably detailed by Mr. Arthur Hill in his essay, Train up a Child in the Way he Should Go:—

BY HIS EXCELLENCY HENRY J. GARDNER,

Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Whereas, by the third section of an act passed by the legislature of this commonwealth on the 21st day of May, A.D. 1855, entitled "an act to establish a State Reform School for Girls," it is provided that "as soon as the governor shall have been notified by the commissioners appointed under certain resolves 'for the purchase of a site and the erection of buildings thereon for a State Reform School for Girls,' that said buildings are prepared for occupancy, he shall forthwith issue his proclamation, giving public notice of the fact."

And by the fourth section of the act aforesaid, it is provided that "after proclamation shall have been made, as provided in the third section of this act, whenever any girl, above the age of seven and under the age of sixteen years, shall be brought by any constable, police-officer, or other inhabitant of any city or town in this Commonwealth, before any judge of probate or commissioner authorised and empowered to act in the case by the eighth section of this act, upon the allegation or complaint that the said girl has committed any offence known to the laws of this Commonwealth, punishable by fine or imprisonment, other than such as may be punished by imprisonment for life, or that she is leading an idle, vagrant, or vicious life, or has been found in any street, highway or public place within this Commonwealth in circumstances of want and suffering, or of neglect, exposure or abandonment, or of beggary, it shall be the duty of the judge or commissioner aforesaid, before whom the said girl is brought, to issue a summons or order in writing, addressed to the father of said girl, if he be living and resident within the town or city where the said girl was found, and if not, then to her mother, if she be living and so resident, and if there be no father or mother of said girl resident within said town or city, then addressed to the lawful guardian of said girl if any there be resident within said town or city, or if not, to the person with whom, according to the examination of the girl, and the testimony, if any, received by the judge or commissioner aforesaid, the said girl shall reside; and if there be no person with whom she statedly resides, the judge or commissioner may, at his discretion, appoint some suitable person to act in her behalf, requiring him or her, as the case may be, to appear before him at such time and place as he shall in said summons or order appoint, and to show cause, if any there be, why the said girl shall not be committed to the Reform School for Girls, established by this act."

And whereas the commissioners appointed under the resolves above referred to have given me notice that the buildings erected for said State Reform School for girls at Lancaster, in the county of Worcester, are now ready for the reception of inmates.

Now therefore, I, HENRY J. GARDNER, Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, do issue this Proclamation, giving public notice to the commissioners under the act, magistrates and people of this Commonwealth of the fact that said State Reform School for Girls, now called and known by authority of the legislature as the State Industrial School, is prepared for occupancy.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Commonwealth this 27th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1856, and of the Independence of the United States the 81st.

HENRY J. GARDNER.

By His Excellency the Governor,

FRANCIS DE WITT,

Secretary of the Commonwealth.

God save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In The Boston Weekly Messenger of September 3rd, we read the following:—

STATE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—We learn that on the very next morning after the opening exercises at Lancaster on Wednesday last, an interesting little girl, 13 years of age, in all respects a fit subject for the institution, was brought to the school, the necessary papers having been signed by the Judge of Probate as soon as he saw the Governor's Proclamation. This fact attests the public interest in the school and readiness to turn its privileges to good account.

STATE REFORM SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AT WEST-BOROUGH.

[From the Salem Register, August 28.]

The school at present numbers five hundred and seventy boys. Of these 140 are employed on the farm; 120 in manufacturing shoes, of which more than five hundred pairs are made daily; 116 in sewing and knitting; 60 in making cane seats, while others are made useful in the laundry, cooking and other departments.

Eighteen hundred and three boys have been admitted since Nov. 1st, 1848, when the school was opened. Since Dec. 1, 1855, 239 have been apprenticed or discharged, and about the same number admitted. The discipline of the school is firm yet mild, the whole aim being to reform these youth by kindness, good advice and moral suasion. They attend prayers morning and evening, and the hours of the day are spent in some useful labor, the school-room and play ground.

There are eight school-rooms where the usual branches are taught as in our best public schools. The teachers appear very efficient, patient and persevering, being determined that every pupil shall be well instructed.

Every Sabbath morning six hundred scholars and teachers assemble in the chapel at nine o'clock, when each scholar recites his lesson from the Bible. At eleven, and again at four o'clock, all assemble in the Chapel where a discourse is preached. The singing by the whole audience is excellent.

Connected with the school is one of the best hospitals in the country, but owing to the exercise and pure air enjoyed by the boys, cases of sickness among them are very rare.

A prayer meeting is held by the officers, teachers and family every Friday evening, to implore Divine aid, and God's blessing on themselves and those committed to their trust. Their situation is one of great responsibility—they feel it to be so, and will not Christians throughout the State, particularly on Friday evenings, remember this praying band, and implore for them that wisdom so needful to guide their steps.

In our own countries, the Reformatory principle is certainly progressing. In another portion of this number of THE IRISH QUARTERLY, we have written at much length upon this topic, and had resolved to shorten the space of this Record, but we are bound, in justice to the cause, to place before our readers the proceedings of some meetings held to advocate the Principle. First, then, we place the Birmingham meeting of October:—

BIRMINGHAM DISCHARGED PRISONERS' AID SOCIETY.

A public meeting in aid of this Society was held on Friday evening in the Town Hall. The body of the hall was densely crowded, to a great extent by working men, and the side galleries were well filled. The chair was occupied by Lord Calthorpe, President of the Society, and on the Platform were Lord Lyttelton, Viscount Ingestre, the Right Honorable James Stuart Wortley, Recorder of London, Sir Peter Van Notten Pole, Bart., High Sheriff, The Right Hon. Sir J. S. Pakington, Bart., M. P., The Hon. Augustus Calthorpe, Sir Stafford Northcote, Bart., M. P., C. B. Adderley, Esq., M. P., M. D. Hill, Esq., Q. C., Recorder of Birmingham; the Revds. J. C. Miller, I. C. Barrett, S. Gedge, L. Tuttlett, W. Gover, J. D. Collis, J. T. Burt (Chaplain of the Borough Gaol), H. Goodacre (Stafford), W. Hatch (Wandsworth), D. Melville (Shelsley Reformatory), F. H. Williams, T. Bittleston, R. W. Dale, O. Vince, and G. Clarke; Dr. Heslop, Dr. Melson, T. C. Sneyd Kinnersley (Stipendiary Magistrate), C. Shaw, G. H. Bengough, T. Barwick Baker (Hardwick Reformatory), F. A. McGeachy, E. Gem, T. Hartshorne, R. W. Winfield, and I. Spooner, Esqrs.; Aldermen Philips, Lucy, and Sturge; Councillors Ryland, Lloyd, Elkington, Sturges, and Banks; Messrs. C. Hastings (secretary to the Reformatory Union), Charles Ratcliff, John Unett, H. Rotton, W. Morgan, G. W. Hilliard, Samuel Rogers, W. Barlow, T. Wright (Manchester), A. Walter, G. J. Johnson, A. Morgan, &c.—Letters of apology were received from the Earl of Lichfield, Lord Leigh, the Hon. and Rev.

G. M. Yorke (who was absent through illness), C. N. Newdegate, Esq., M. P., W. Scholefield, Esq., M. P., the Mayor, T. R. T. Hodgson, Esq., C. H. Bracebridge, Esq. (who offered a subscription of 2*l.* per annum), the Rev. J. Clay, Chaplain of Preston Gaol, J. O. Bacchus, Esq., Mr. Standbridge, Town Clerk, Mr. Amphlett, and other gentlemen.

Lord Calthorpe, in opening the proceedings, expressed his regret at the unavoidable absence of Lord Stanley. The noble Lord then said he would earnestly direct their attention to the important object which the Society had in view. In the first place it sought to afford assistance to discharged prisoners, who, having suffered the penalties of the law, were turned out of prison without any homes to go to, and without any hope for the future. The Society would obtain for them such employment as they had been accustomed to, but in doing so would have to exercise great care and circumspection, lest the criminal should consider his position better than that of the honest labourer. By the formation of that Institution they would be enabled to trace the progress and some of the causes of crime. There was one source of crime to which it had been said by those accustomed to judicial proceedings three-fourths of the crime committed in this country were traceable—he meant the habit of drunkenness—(hear, hear). If such were the case—and so far as his experience went he had no reason to doubt it—was it not incumbent upon the Legislature to adopt such measures as might tend to remove this temptation to which the working classes were exposed?—(cheers). He felt assured that all of them must regret to see in this town the many incentives that existed to the working classes to spend their earnings in the gin palace and the public house—(hear, hear). His Right Honorable friend, Sir John Pakington, had taken great interest in that question, and he (Lord Calthorpe) believed it was chiefly through the Right Honorable Baronet's instrumentality that a Committee of the House of Commons was obtained some time ago to investigate the subject—(cheers). Since that period the question had in a great measure been shelved, but the more experience they had of the effects of this pernicious vice, the more it appeared necessary for the Legislature to interfere—(cheers). One of the difficulties they had to battle with was the difficulty with reference to education and the religious teaching in Schools. He trusted that education in this country would never be separated from religion—(hear.) Let it be remembered that every secular system that had yet been tried had signally failed. As an instance of that, he might refer them to Calcutta, where the schools had been conducted on the secular plan, the result being that in that city there was now a numerous body of clever, educated young men who were total infidels. It ought, therefore, to be one of their first and most cherished objects to establish a good system of education, founded upon religion—(applause). After commending the objects of the Society to the earnest consideration of the meeting, his Lordship called upon

The Rev. J. T. Burt, the Honorary Secretary, who read a lengthened statement of the aims and principles of the Association. The Society sought to relieve the great pressure brought to bear upon prisoners by external circumstances ; to canvass employers with a view to obtain employment for them as soon as discharged ; to procure temporary lodgings for them in the cottages of poor persons of good character ; to purchase a few necessary tools or a small supply of materials and clothing, with which the convicted person might be enabled to earn an honest livelihood ; and to give to parties employing them a guarantee for a moderate amount, and for a limited period, thus ensuring them from loss by dishonesty on the part of the persons engaged. The Report stated that the result of a canvass already made had been most satisfactory, and since the formation of the Society employment had been found for thirteen discharged prisoners.

M. D. Hill, Esq., the Recorder, on rising to address the meeting, was greeted with enthusiastic applause. He said—I unite with you, my Lord Calthorpe, in regretting the absence of Lord Stanley, and perhaps I have most reason to regret it, because no man likes to be placed in a position in which unfavourable comparisons are likely to be made. We cannot but deeply regret the absence of a young nobleman who has already distinguished himself, not merely for the value of the principles he advocates, but for the labour he devotes to informing himself thoroughly as to the facts and arguments bearing upon any cause which has the benefit of his advocacy—(cheers). I trust that the indisposition which has deprived us of the intellectual treat we anticipated may be of short duration, and that the time may soon arrive when you will see before you a young man of whose future eminence his countrymen have formed the most sanguine expectations—(cheers). I am reassured, however, to some extent, by the very admirable Report which we have just heard read. We have had presented therein the facts in detail, and those facts must have struck every one—first of all with the magnitude of the wants to be supplied and next, with the humble hope that we are at last finding the true way for the diminution and repression of crime—(cheers). It is indeed humiliating to all who are concerned in the administration of justice, that the labours of our judges, our magistrates, our juries, and our police—all that machinery by which so many of our fellow-creatures are brought every month to the criminal bar—should only result in this, that after the convict has been found guilty, and punished according to law—after all that has been done for him by the exhortations and earnest supplications to him and in his favour by the Chaplains of the gaols—after all the lessons of the schoolmaster, and the still more important lesson derived from the pain which he endured from the consequences of his crime ; when the doors of the prison are opened, a vast proportion of those who have suffered the consequence of their guilt, quickly—oh, how quickly—offer themselves again to run the same miserable course. How many thus fall back I cannot tell you. We have ascertained by careful examination that at least 33 per cent. of those who have been convicted once come again and again to the criminal bar. But although we know that this 33 per cent. return to their criminal courses, we must recollect that there are of necessity many whose interest it is to conceal the fact of their previous conviction, and who, when they go elsewhere, are not discovered ; you may then well believe that, instead of this 33 per cent., probab-ities point to a still more lamentable proportion—(hear, hear). Well, then, what is to be done? I do not wonder that the masters and the manufacturers of this town express their astonishment that no such society as the one we stand forth to advocate has been before founded in this place, because we are all aware, who know any thing of the criminal class—and who is there who knows nothing?—that the moment of departure from the gaol is the most dangerous crisis in the life of the criminal—(hear, hear). It is then, if ever, that the friendly hand should be stretched forth—that the friendly voice should be heard. He is then re-commencing his career; good and evil are before him. If the good be rendered hopeless, and the only home which he has is the prison appointed for his punishment; if the only friends who are not dangerous to his future prospects are those prison officers appointed to correct him; if he remember that when his character was unstained he could not keep his place in society, but had forfeited his honour, what despair must fall upon our poor wretched fellow-being when the door closes after him of that gloomy abode which was his only home, and he finds himself shut out from the only true friends that he ever had in the world.—(hear, hear.) Well, then, you must be there—(cheers). You have heard that the tempter is at the gaol door—that the receiver of stolen goods dogs his steps—that his old companions in crime wait to carry him away to his former haunts, and to embark him again in the fearful course from which he has been for a short time held back by the strong arm of the law. Do you disperse that wretched congregation assembled around the doors of the gaol, and hold out to the discharged prisoner the hand of encouragement. If you cannot do anything else, you can show him a friendly countenance—(cheers). Let him feel that when he has to encounter, as he must, the frowns of the world, one human being at least will be his friend, will rejoice if he can resist temptation and escape its dangers, will mourn if he fall back into the paths of sin—(applause). I address myself now more particularly to a class of my fellow townsmen whom I know well, and to whom I feel under great and permanent obligation, never by me to be repaid. It is probably known to many of those present that during the seventeen years of my Recordership I have adopted a plan which I learnt from the worthy and excellent Magistrates of the Warwickshire Sessions, namely, that when there is reason to believe a young person at the bar is not utterly depraved, that he is there for his first or nearly his first offence, that there are those allied to him by the relationship of blood, or of friendship, or that his employer would take him again and give him a home and a refuge, I have practised the lesson I learnt, and delivered up such young persons to those guardians, so that they might be admitted again into a family circle, and there might be hope of reformation from the example of others. And let me say, and I mention it with gratitude, that in the majority of instances the friends who have received the youth just stamped with felony, are the very persons who have been the sufferers by the offence of which the young criminal has been convicted—(applause). How often has it occurred to me to find a prosecutor, with tears in his eyes, beg and entreat that the young prisoner might be given up to him again for a further trial; and when the Court has yielded to that entreaty, there has been a burst of gratitude and of thanks for being allowed to take so responsible a task as giving place in his family and household to a convicted felon—(cheers). I have felt, as I am sure you must feel, that the thanks and gratitude ought to pass from me to the benefactor, and not from him to me. Now in the course of my seventeen years' Recordership, this has occurred to a considerable extent. I have kept an exact register, and the individuals whose names are entered therein have been visited for the purpose of ascertaining the results of this lenity. In the course of these seventeen years, 483 persons have been so disposed of at the Birmingham Sessions. We have kept a watchful eye upon them, and the result has been that we have not been able to detect more than seventy-eight out of the whole number who have appeared again at the bar—(cheers). Surely there is a great benefit conferred on society.

I will not waste a word upon pecuniary benefits, for they are obvious under this arrangement. I would rather direct your attention to the moral gain to the community. It is manifestly a great good; and to what classes of the community do we owe that good? Why, to the artisan, the small employer, the small shopkeeper; these are the classes, I would say, speaking from seventeen years' experience, to whom is mainly due these great services which have been rendered to criminals and to society—(applause). Do not let it be supposed that I speak slightly of those who are higher in the social scale. It does so happen that masters who have under their management a large number of workpeople have felt, and I dare say rightly felt, that they are not in a position to undertake the responsibility of that constant watchfulness which is necessary to preserve him that has once fallen from falling again—(hear, hear). I therefore am far from making any invidious comparison; but the fact still remains, that it is to the least wealthy portion of the middle classes of this town that the reclamation of that large number of our criminal population is due—(cheers). Well, that encourages me to ask them, as they have done good, to do more—and, strange as it may appear, I know of no stronger hold over the human mind for benevolence than that it has been benevolent on former occasions. Well, then, do you, my good friends of this class to which I have referred, do you step forward again. I know you will—I know you thoroughly. I was born among you—I was brought up among you—(cheers). I have mingled with you—I have entered your dwellings—I have enjoyed your hospitality—I have learned much from my intercourse with you. I honour and respect you—you are good fathers, you are good mothers, you are good sons, you are good daughters, brothers, and sisters—and though it may be that you have but little of this world's wealth, you can do much which wealth cannot do to assist us in the great cause we are embarked in—(loud cheers). You can confer benefits upon us which no money can buy—money I ask not from you—I know that you have more ways for your money than you have money for your ways—(cheers); but assist us with your hearts, assist us by giving your countenance to these poor creatures—(cheers.) Such is the prevalence of crime that it is scarcely possible for any person not to be allied by ties of blood, friendship or by acquaintance with some family in which there is a fallen member. I ask those of you who can do no more, to fix upon some individual, to watch his trial, to acquaint yourselves with the extent and duration of his punishment, and his conduct during the term of his imprisonment, to exhort him to apply himself humbly to the great task of self-reformation, and to provide for him, if you can, a home and employment on his departure from prison: and if you can do no more, attend on the morning of his release, forming as it were a body-guard against those tempters who infest the prison gates—(cheers). You yourselves have been exposed to temptations of which the noble Lords and Right Hon. gentlemen present may know nothing. You have triumphed over these temptations, and you will bear me out when I say that among the most fearful and irresistible of the catalogue are the 1500 public houses, the 308 taverns, the 321 gin shops, and the 871 beer houses—the authorised temptations offered by the Legislature—(loud cheers). I speak in the presence of members of both Houses of Parliament, and will repeat my words. The fifteen hundred dens of temptation which you great men of the land suffered to be opened—lest the prisoner should persevere in his reformation, lest he should retire to some quarter of the town for the purpose of escaping enthrallment—are the main sources of crime. You permit every street, and alley to contain one or other of these places. Whatever door is shut against him, the door of the public house is open; of whatever guilt he may be convicted, so long as he is not guilty of the crime of being utterly destitute, so long as he has the smallest of her Majesty's coins in his pocket, the Legislature has exposed him to temptations which cast him back into vicious courses—(cheers). I trust you will not be satisfied by manifesting your kind feelings, but that you will let those feelings fructify into good acts. If you do so, you shall have your reward. You will not, it is true, be one penny the richer during the whole of your lives for your sacrifices and exertions—you will perhaps gather no fame—your names may never extend beyond your native street—but you will have your “exceeding great reward”—the consciousness of having obeyed the commands of our Divine Master—Him who uttered the immortal words “Do unto others even as you would that others should do unto you.”—(great cheering) —The learned gentleman concluded by moving—“That the plans and operations of the Birmingham Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, as detailed in the statements now read, be approved by the meeting.”

Lord Lyttelton seconded the resolution. Alluding to the great difficulties the country would have to encounter in consequence of the cessation of transportation, his Lordship expressed his belief that the necessity of such movements as the present would be greatly increased by the fact, that a larger number of criminals would have to be provided for at home than had been the case for many years. The advantages they might obtain by that movement would be the fruit of voluntary benevolence and Christian love, for, however admirable might be the internal economy of the gaol, there was an absence of that individual sympathy and and philanthropy so powerfully illustrated by Mr. Wright, the "prison philanthropist," and in past times by Mrs. Fry and others. The success of that movement would naturally lead them to enquire if some general machinery could not be adopted for the reformation of criminals, and for removing any obstacles that might exist to their introduction into the labour market of the country. He hoped the Society would not only be successful in Birmingham, but that similar attempts might be made elsewhere, without which their success would necessarily be partial and limited. His Lordship referred to the Worcestershire Society, which, although conducted on too modest a scale, had effected considerable good, and would, he trusted, be stimulated to increased exertions by the example afforded by the people of Birmingham—(cheers).—The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Right Hon. Stuart Wortley, M.P., Recorder of London, said that he was not so competent as his learned friend, the Recorder of Birmingham, to deal with the subject under discussion, but he fully confirmed and heartily concurred in the sentiments enunciated by Mr. Hill. His experience in the administration of justice fully confirmed what had been said as to the hopeless state of the culprit on his release from gaol, and the results of his being again thrown in contact with those whose object it was to lead him astray. There could be no doubt that drunkenness was a great cause of sin, but there were other causes for this state of things. Crime could not be traced to any one cause, unless it was the weakness of human nature. He thought there was no urgency more pressing than that of dealing with the criminal population. He approved of the Society's plan of not affording permanent relief, or erecting workshops for discharged prisoners. Their sole object would be to lay hold of the man at the very moment of his leaving the gaol, and to offer him the hand of friendship. Their operations must not be amongst the hardened criminals, but amongst those who had given way to temptation, but were desirous of amending their lives, and nothing could be more gratifying than the reflection that by their efforts they had rescued any of these poor creatures, and enabled them to become good parents and good citizens—(applause). The honourable and learned gentleman concluded his address by moving—"That the inhabitants of this borough, and especially the employers, be earnestly recommended to co-operate with this Society in its important work."

The Right Hon. Sir J. S. Pakington was the next speaker. He remarked that there was hardly any object to which the citizens of a great State could more wisely and more beneficially devote their energies than the attempt to redeem from his wretched course the fellow creature who had fallen into crime. He hoped that the effort which the men of Birmingham were wisely and generously making would be copied and imitated throughout England, and that that Society would be the forerunner of many similar Societies in various parts of Great Britain—(cheers). There was no object of charity which had stronger claims upon their attention and liberality; neither was there any effort of Christian benevolence which so well deserved the name of charity. He argued against the dictum of those who said it was useless to attempt to reform the adult criminal, repudiating such a proposition as being utterly false and inconsistent with their knowledge of human nature. In referring to the Worcestershire Society, with which he had been connected upwards of sixteen years, the Right Hon. Baronet observed that 228 prisoners had been relieved by it since its establishment in 1840. Only eleven of these had been re-committed; and out of the remaining 217, many were reported as having become useful and valuable members of society—(cheers). The welfare of the people had been neglected too long. They were lagging behind the rest of the world in associations for their internal improvement. While they had done nothing, as it were, in providing means for the improvement of their criminals, the United States of America had done much: France, Prussia, Bavaria, and even Italy, upon whom, in such matters, we were accustomed in our insular pride to look with something like contempt, had also done much. A similar example was in existence in Gloucester, where their exertions had been attended with that measure of success which he hoped would reward the efforts of the Birmingham Association—(cheers). This question, however, was only a part of a great movement which was arising in this country, having for its object the elevation of the working classes. The prevention of crime was one phase of that movement; another was that there should be brought home to every man's door a sound, a wholesome, and a liberal system of education—(cheers). This latter object he would never fail to press upon the attention of every audience of his fellow countrymen which he might address, and upon the attention of Government. Another phase of the movement was the temptations held out to the poorer classes by those public houses—those dram shops—those beer shops, where poisons both to body and soul were held out to the world—(cheers). As the great war in which we had been engaged was happily now at an end, he hoped such subjects as these would command more attention than they had hitherto done, and thus might they hope to see the prosperity of the country advance—thus might they hope for the continuance of the Divine blessing and mercy upon a civilised, enlightened, and virtuous nation—(cheers). The Right Hon. Baronet concluded an eloquent address by seconding the resolution which was then put and carried.

Alderman Lucy then moved that a brief statement of the plans and operations of the Society be forwarded to the Chairman and the Visiting Justices of the principal prisons in England and Wales, in the hope that the subject might be brought under the early and favourable consideration of the Magistracy in general.

C. B. Adderley, Esq., M.P., in seconding the resolution, expressed his cordial approval of the objects of the Association, and hoped the example put forward by the men of Birmingham would be imitated in all our large towns. The plan of the Society was plain and practical, and he had every confidence would produce most satisfactory results. The Hon. gentleman alluded to instances that had come to his knowledge of persons who had been reclaimed by the kindness of Mr. Hillyard, the Governor of the Birmingham Gaol.—

Mr. Thomas Wright, of Manchester, also spoke in favour of the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Sir Stafford Northcote proposed a vote of thanks to the officers of the borough who had promoted the formation of the Society, and especially to the Mayor for supporting it, and for granting the use of the Town Hall on that occasion.—The motion was seconded by T. C. S. Kinnersley, Esq., who, from an experience of twenty-seven years as a practising barrister in criminal courts, confirmed what had been said by the Recorder as to persons, after a first offence, being driven to crime through the difficulty of obtaining employment, and as to the difficulty of dealing with persons who were not confirmed criminals.—The resolution was then put and carried.—C. Shaw, Esq., having been called to the chair, on the motion of the High Sheriff of Warwickshire, seconded by Lord Lyttelton, thanks were voted to Lord Calthorpe for his kindness in presiding.—The proceedings then terminated.

The following important proceedings are condensed from the Report of the Birmingham Quarter Sessions, held Monday, October 20th 1856, and printed in The Birmingham Journal. The Recorder said:—

Gentlemen of the Grand Jury,—

At the Michaelmas Sessions of the last year I submitted to your predecessors observations on the working of a very important statute passed in 1853, which is usually called the Ticket-of-Leave Act; its characteristic feature being the authority which it vests in the Crown to grant to convicts under sentence of transportation or penal servitude a revocable ticket, permitting them to go at large prior to the expiration of their sentences. At the date of my charge, notwithstanding returns had been laid before Parliament setting forth that from 80 to 90 per cent. of prisoners thus liberated had so conducted themselves since they became their own masters as not to fall again under the censure of a Criminal Court, the public mind was far from satisfied with the results of the measure. Not that the reclamation of from 80 to 90 per cent. of our criminal population would not have been hailed as triumphant success, but unfortunately proof by figures of arithmetic when applied to subjects of this nature is not much more readily accepted by the English mind than proof by figures of rhetoric. Adverse opinions had become so widely spread that a cry was raised for the repeal of the act. And certainly, gentlemen, if the merits of the question had turned upon the accuracy of these figures, it will become tolerably evident before I cease to address you, that the public had but too much reason for its hardness of belief. But I shall also show you that the repudiation of these statistics ought by no means to draw after it a condemnation of the measure. I will confess to you that I watched the growing unpopularity of the act, not merely with anxiety but with alarm. However imperfectly the law is framed, and however open to animadversion the manner in which it has been carried into effect, it nevertheless embraces two principles, each founded as I thought on just and enlightened views of jurisprudence. The first is to enable the criminal to work out his freedom for himself by exhibiting proof that he is an altered man, and that he has become imbued with qualities the absence of which led to his fall. The second, to make the discharge only a conditional restoration to liberty. He is not, for the remainder of the term to which his sentence extends, to be placed on a footing with his fellow citizens. The theory of the law is, that he has been set at large because his conduct in prison has induced the belief that he is reformed; but if his course of life should be such as to destroy that confidence, he is again to be returned to his probation in the gaol.

An additional year of experience in the operation of this law, and a careful consideration of the various facts and arguments which have been elicited in the debates in Parliament, the examination of witnesses, and the discussions in the public press, have confirmed the opinion which I then held. This result will indeed be a matter of little moment to any one but myself. But, gentlemen, I am able to support the conclusions at which I myself had arrived by no less an authority than that of the committee appointed by the House of Commons during the last Session to investigate the working of the Act. That body, composed as it was of men who had made the administration of the criminal law a careful study for many years, came to the following resolution: "That the system of granting tickets-of-leave appears to be founded upon a principle wise and just in itself, viz., that of enabling a convict to obtain by continued good conduct, while undergoing his punishment, the remission of a portion of his sentence, upon the express condition, however, that in case of subsequent misconduct his liability to punishment shall revive for the residue of the term specified in the original sentence."

The committee, gentlemen, recommended not only the continuance but the expansion of the system. The statute embraced all convicts adjudged to transportation, or to the milder punishment of penal servitude usually applied in cases not sufficiently aggravated to call for the higher infliction, but it excluded all minor offenders. The Executive Government, however, still further narrowed the limits of the privilege, and instead of pursuing the line adopted by the statute, stretched the exclusion to that class of convicts adjudged to penal servitude. The ground, gentlemen, on which the framers of the act had submitted it for the adoption of the Legislature, was the efficiency of encouragement in stimulating the convict to industry and good conduct. That being so, the committee suffered, as I had suffered before them, under the inability to understand the justice of withholding from the lesser criminal the incentive to reformation held out to his more guilty fellow-prisoners, or to divine the policy of advertising our criminal population that no member of it must indulge the hope of obtaining his liberty by a course of well-doing unless he would first earn the right to such an encouragement by the enormity of his transgressions. And from the evidence, gentlemen, of the directors of the convict prisons, it appeared that the men sentenced to penal servitude participated in that lack of penetration to which I have alluded; so that when they learned that they were excluded from a boon granted to those who had sunk deeper into crime than themselves, they became morose, disobedient, and at length mutinous. It is needless to say that in this frame of mind the work of reformation came to a pause, and that retrogression began. Perhaps, gentlemen, you yourselves may be as much in the dark on the subject as others have been, and may ask from whence was this extraordinary doctrine imported into England. To such an enquiry I could give no satisfactory answer. I am not acquainted with the jurisprudence of any nation, civilised or barbarous, which is deformed by such an inversion of the order dictated by natural justice. Nor do I know of any countries save two which, having admitted the principle of encouragement into the treatment of their criminals, have ever abandoned it or narrowed its application. The value of this principle is now recognised in many nations of Europe and in many States of the great Republic across the Atlantic, and I feel confident that it is destined to make its way into the criminal code of every well-governed country in the world. France and Spain are the states which have made a retrograde movement. France to a small extent only; and the error having been pointed out and condemned by an eminent writer, who holds a very high if not the highest position in the French Judicature, it will probably be quickly amended. Convicts who with us would be sentenced to transportation, are kept in France to hard labour for long terms of years. It has been the usage, however, of the Sovereign to issue from time to time pardons to the most deserving of these forçats, as they are called. Of late years, says M. de Beranger, the Judge to whom I have referred, these pardons have become more and more sparingly granted. Mark, gentlemen, the consequence. The forçats are discouraged, and lose their energy. Their labour is become far less profitable than heretofore, and their attempts to escape far more numerous. The other country which I have excepted is Spain. Let me ask your attention to the good effects of encouragement in the Spanish prisons while it was in operation, and the evil consequences of withdrawing it. In the city of Valencia there has long been a penitentiary gaol, under the government of Colonel Montesinos, a gentleman who has made for himself a European reputation by his skill in the treatment of prisoners. He acted upon them by urging them to self reformation. He excited them to industry by allowing them a small portion of their earnings for their own immediate expenditure, under due regulations to prevent abuse. He enabled them to raise their position stage after stage, by persevering in good conduct. When they had acquired his confidence he entrusted them with commissions, which carried them beyond the walls of their prison, relying on the moral influence which he had acquired over them to prevent their desertion. And finally he discharged them before the expiration of their sentences, when he had satisfied himself that they desired to do well, had acquired habits of patient labour, so much of skill in some useful occupation as would ensure employment, the inestimable faculty of self-denial, the power of saying "no" to the tempter, and in short, such a general control over the infirmities of their minds and their hearts, as should enable them to deserve and maintain the liberty which they had earned.

His success was answerable to the wisdom and zeal of his administration. Instances of relapse but rarely occurred, and the Spanish Government, rightly judging that talents like his ought to have the widest scope, appointed him Inspector General of all the prisons in Spain. It so happened, however, that the Legislature of that country was minded to establish a new criminal code, and (for what reason I know not) held it advisable to convert sentences for long terms of years (which prevail on the continent) into incarceration for life. This was done. But unhappily this was not the only nor the most pernicious change. In the chapters of the new code, which relate to the management of prisons, governors are prohibited from offering those encouragements to the prisoners which had raised them step by step until they were fitted for the enjoyment of liberty, and they also make it imperative that every sentence of imprisonment shall be fulfilled to the last hour. The combined effects of these innovations teem with instruction. Prisons which had been models of order and cleanliness, of cheerful industry, praiseworthy demeanour in general, now exhibit a painful contrast to that happy state of things. They have become the scenes of indolence, disorder, and filth, and the prisoners are either reduced to despair or urged upon plots for escape which in a multitude of instances are followed by success.* Gentlemen, it will not be the fault of the Committee if

---

* The following observations from "The Literarium," Vol. III, No. 9, are worthy of insertion here:—

"This principle of making a convict the arbiter of his own fate, is proved to be sound by the history of the State Prison at Munich, as conducted by the Councillor of State, M. OBERMAIER. The returns made annually present the following facts. In the year 1850, 132 prisoners were committed; of these, 88 (a large majority) were reformed, 26 continued doubtful, whilst only 11 relapsed. In 1851, out of 70 committals, 52 were reformed, 7 continuing doubtful, and 6 relapsing. In the year 1852, there were 36 committals, of these 23 were reformed, 9 remained doubtful, while only one relapsed. In 1853, there were only 28 committals, 18 of these were reformed, 4 continued doubtful, and 4 relapsed. In the year 1854, out of 32 prisoners, 25 were reformed, 2 continued doubtful, and 4 relapsed.

Now, if statistics are good for proving anything, the figures we have just quoted from the Appendix to the Second Report clearly establish the soundness of the principle which gives the convict the option of working out his own reformation, and regaining the position in society which he had forfeited by his criminality. This system of M. OBERMAIER is in operation in the central prison at Kaiserslautern, in Bavaria, in all the German States, and in several foreign countries. In all of which it is attended with the same satisfactory results. By the laws of Bavaria the terms of imprisonment are shortened by industry and good conduct, according to certain conditions, one of which is that a criminal sentenced to 'penal servitude for an unfixed period' may expect his pardon after 16 years' imprisonment, if, during his incarceration, he has shown continued habits of industry, and not incurred punishment for malice or insubordination.

Another gratifying proof of the benefits arising from this system of permitting men to work out their own redemption by habits of industry, we fail to profit by this most instructive lesson. Let me read to you the conclusions at which they have arrived on this part of our subject. Their fifth resolution is—

“That every punishment by penal servitude should include, first, a certain fixed period of imprisonment and hard labour on Public is afforded by the returns of the average earnings of every prisoner confined in the Penitentiary at Munich from 1850 to 1855. These show that each prisoner earned in British money £1 12s. 11½d. per annum over all expences connected with his employment, and exclusive of various drawbacks, in the shape of ordinary prison work, such as washing, cooking, cutting wood, &c., and which are not taken into account in the foregoing averages.

---

No less assuring on this head is the evidence with regard to the prison at Valencia. By the system which Colonel MONTESINOS had established, it was found that the recommitments diminished to 2 per cent. which had previously amounted to 35 per cent. This worthy and excellent man, however, finding that his system had been entirely subverted by the new code established in Valencia, retired in despair from a post which he could no longer occupy with a quiet conscience. This code, among other severities, converted sentences for a long term of years into imprisonment for life, thus taking away from the Governor the discretionary power of alleviating the condition of a deserving convict, and depriving the unhappy prisoner of all hope that his industry or reformation would bring him any release. The promulgation of this code was like a death-knell. It killed hope in the convict's bosom. He had no longer the same desire to learn his trade. He went through his appointed task as usual, but he had no heart in the work.”

Mr. Bontwell, to whose address at the opening of the Lancaster School we have referred, thus expresses himself:—

“As the criminal staggers beneath the accumulated weight of his sin and its penalty, he should feel that the State is not only just in the language of its law, but merciful in its administration; that the government is in truth paternal. This feeling inspires confidence and hope, and without these there can be no reformation. And following this thought, we are led to say it is a sad and mischievous public delusion that the pardoning power is useless or pernicious. It is a delusion, for it is the only means by which the State mingles mercy with its justice: the means by which the better sentiments of the prison are marshalled in favor of order, of law, of progress. It is a public delusion, for it has infected not only the masses of society who know little of what is going on in courts and prisons, but its influence is observed upon the bench, and in the bar, especially among those who are accustomed to prosecute and try criminals. This is not strange, nor shall it be a subject of complaint; but we must not always look upon the prisoner as a criminal, and continually disregard his claims as a man. It is not often easy, nor always possible, to make the proper distinction between the character and condition of the prisoner. But the prison, strange as it may seem, follows the general law of life. It has its public sentiment, its classes, its leading minds, as well as the University or the State. It has its men of rank, either good or bad, as well as Congress or Parliament. As the family, the church, the school, is the reflection of the best face of society, so the prison is the reflection of the worst face of society. But it, nevertheless, is society, and follows its laws with as much fidelity as the world at large.”

Works to be undergone at all events; secondly, a further period which should be capable of being abridged by the good conduct of the convict himself.

"6.—That it appears from the evidence before the committee that had effects upon the discipline of convicts on the Public Works have already been caused by the regulations under which it has been made known that no tickets-of-leave or other remission of sentence would in any case be granted to men sentenced to penal servitude.

"7.—That with a view to give full effect to the principle indicated in resolution 5, the sentences of penal servitude prescribed by the act should be changed and lengthened, so as to be identical with the terms of transportation for which they are respectively substituted.

"8.—That the sentences of penal servitude now in force might be adopted with some few changes as the fixed periods recommended in resolution 5.

"9.—That the scale of secondary punishment would be more complete if a shorter period of penal servitude than any now in force were enacted, as an intermediate sentence between the present term of ordinary imprisonment now usually inflicted, and the former sentence of seven years' transportation, or its equivalent."

These resolutions may perhaps require some further explanation to enable their full bearing to be seen. You must know, gentlemen, that the bill of 1856, on its introduction into Parliament by the Lord Chancellor, was a measure which had for its object simply to enable the Courts to convert the punishment of transportation which, owing to the opposition of our colonies, could only be acted upon to a limited extent, into imprisonment in our Convict Gaols and Hulks, and labour on our Public Works, with the view of reserving transportation for heinous offences deserving a punishment all but capital. And rightly believing that the substituted punishment, which was denominated penal servitude, is for equal periods of time an infliction much more grievous than transportation, when it converted the latter punishment into the former, it greatly diminished its duration. But when the bill was passing through the House of Lords, it so happened that Earl Grey, who, when Colonial Minister, had had experience of the beneficial effect produced by tickets-of-leave in the island of Barbadoes, suggested the expediency of trying a similar experiment in England. He spoke highly of the principle of encouragement from his own observation, and he agreed with all who have a practical knowledge of prisoners, that no incitement can be held out to them which will bear any comparison for efficiency in stimulating them to good deeds, with that derived from the expectation of being restored to freedom. Listen, I pray you, to the opinion of the Rev. William Molderness, the chaplain of the Portland Prison, and a member of that exemplary body of men whose labours and sacrifices, if they do not obtain for them their well-earned promotion in the Church, will at all events ensure them respectful attention from every one competent to estimate the insight which their professional duties give them into the characters of those who enjoy the advantage of their ministrations. "As a general rule," he says, "the men sentenced to penal servitude have no hope of shortening their confinement; consequently a powerful incentive to good conduct is lost. It is to be feared that no adequate substitute for the hope of liberty can be devised. It is the love of liberty which lies nearest to a prisoner's heart, and which will ever be the cheapest and best reward for exemplary conduct." The opinion here expressed derives additional weight from its being in conformity with that of Colonel Jebb, Captain Crofton, and Captain Whitty, Directors of the Convict Prisons, appointments of high importance, offering a wide scope for observation on the habits, manners, and ways of thinking common to the criminal class.

These views, gentlemen, prevailed, and the principle of the bill was changed. But by this time the session was rapidly drawing to an end, and the requisite alterations in the clauses to bring them into harmony with the principle of encouragement, now become the characteristic of the proposed law, was but partially made. Probably it will be obvious to you, as it certainly was to the committee, that when a power was given to the prisoner himself to shorten his term of confinement, the ground for reducing the length of his original sentence was gone; nay, that inasmuch as the period of probation after discharge ought to be protracted until it becomes manifest that the training of the prison has secured as completely as it can be secured the permanent well-doing of the liberated prisoner, so far from shortening sentences, reason would rather seem to dictate the propriety of making them longer than ever. The committee, then, by recommending that convicts sentenced to penal servitude should be brought in practice within that privilege of tickets-of-leave to which they are so clearly entitled by law, and by further recommending that the present inadequate terms of penal servitude should be lengthened, have done what in them lies towards repairing the errors, both of the statute itself, and in its administration. But their advice goes further. They desire that new terms of penal servitude should be created suitable to a class of slighter offences than those now visited with that punishment, in order to give to minor offenders the benefits of the ticket-of-leave. Let us hope, gentlemen, that the progress of opinion will not be permanently stayed even at this point. Let us hope that no inmate of a prison will be left without incentives to do right. If the imprisonment to which he is adjudged is so short as not to admit of his being made the better for reformatory treatment, may not such a consequence furnish a more cogent reason for lengthening the period of his detention than for depriving him of the moral advantages conceded to those who are worse than himself? The remaining resolutions of the committee to which I would crave your attention, are as follows:—

"13.—That there has been much of misapprehension and exaggeration with regard to the conduct of persons released upon tickets-of-leave, who have been frequently confounded (even by several witnesses on this enquiry,) under one common designation of 'ticket-of-leave men,' with convicts whose sentences had fully and absolutely expired.

"14.—That there is reason to believe that the conduct of a large proportion of the whole number of persons discharged upon tickets-of-leave has hitherto been good; and that in other cases persons so discharged have relapsed into crime from the difficulty, arising from their former characters becoming known, of procuring or retaining honest employment in this country, a difficulty, however, which obviously applies to all persons once convicted, whether discharged upon tickets-of-leave, or absolutely at the expiration of their sentences.

" 15.—That to render this system of tickets-of-leave adapted both for the reformation of offenders and the interests of the public, the conditions endorsed upon the tickets-of-leave ought to be enforced more strictly than appears to have been hitherto the case.

" 16.—That every convict on his release with a ticket-of-leave, ought to be reported to the police of the town or district to which he is sent."

Gentlemen, it was to that confusion between convicts discharged on tickets of-leave, the period of whose sentences had not terminated, and convicts who had been freed absolutely, or if liberated with tickets-of-leave, had been out of prison so long that their sentences had expired, it was the confounding I say of these three descriptions of convicts and considering them all as ticket-of-leave men, which produced what I may fairly call the panic of the last winter; throwing the good people of England into a state of mind which placed in extreme danger the permanency of a measure having most assuredly the soundest foundation, whatever defects might weaken its superstructure. Happily the misapprehensions and the fears to which the committee advert have been dispelled. Our advance towards the rational treatment of criminals has been secured, and a peril has been averted, the magnitude of which we can scarcely over estimate. Nevertheless it cannot be denied that the public had very reasonable grounds for complaint and misgiving. The responsibility of the convict discharged on ticket-of-leave has been in practice little better than nominal. The rule was to send him to the town or district in which his offence had been committed, but no intimation of his return was conveyed to the police, and consequently they had no means of ascertaining whether he had come out of prison on a ticket-of-leave, or whether he had received an unconditional discharge. In the latter event he was subject to no control until he committed a fresh offence. In the former his ticket was liable to recall at the discretion of the Secretary of State, and by an endorsement on the ticket itself he was informed that "the power of revoking or altering the license of a convict will most certainly be exercised in case of his misconduct. If, therefore, he wishes to retain the privilege which, by his good behaviour under penal discipline, he has obtained, he must prove by his subsequent conduct that he is really worthy of her Majesty's clemency." Thus it appears that due notice is given to every ticket-of-leave man that any clear manifestation that he does not mean to follow a sober, honest, and industrious course of life, will consign him again to prison, such manifestation being taken as proof that when he left the gaol he was not in a fit state to be discharged.

This omission of notice to the police it is recommended by the committee, as you will have observed, should henceforth be supplied. And doubtless much will be done by acting on their advice; yet much will still remain to be accomplished. Since the establishment of railways individuals of the predatory class have gained a very great and pernicious facility for extending the circle of their depredations by moving quickly from place to place. This renders it necessary to devise some means by which the police may be able to recognise and identify convicts, whatever towns they may choose to visit. Practical difficulties will no doubt arise in framing such a plan; but I speak from good authority when I say that they may be overcome. I should encroach most unreasonably upon your time if I were to enter into details on this part of the subject. Its importance, however, cannot be denied, since without the means of identifying ticket-of-leave men, it is obviously impossible to hold any control over them, or to ascertain what proportion relapse again into crime. Let me present to you, as an example of how difficult it now is to ascertain who are and who are not at large under tickets-of-leave, the state of things in this town. At the beginning of the present year, judging from data which I laid before the committee in my evidence, and which have never been impugned, there must have been, as I calculated, eighty ticket-of-leave men at the least resident in Birmingham. I asked your Chief Superintendent for a list of all that could be found. He and his subordinate officers exerted themselves to comply with my request. After six weeks of enquiry and observation they presented me with the names of nineteen prisoners only, stating that there were many others whom they suspected belonged to this class, but of whom they had no specific knowledge. Of the nineteen, further observation disclosed an error as to five. These had never held tickets-of-leave, but had left their prisons upon unconditional discharges. I found subsequently that the police of Bristol were in a like state of doubt with regard to the criminal population of that city. Hence it follows that released ticket-of-leave men, as well as other convicts, often succeed in passing themselves on Courts as appearing at the bar for the first time, and thus it becomes impossible to distinguish with any degree of accuracy between the numbers of those on whom training has been effectual, and those on whom it has failed. But although I am compelled to withhold my confidence from all estimates which have appeared as to the relative proportions of those ticket-of-leave men who stand fast as compared with those who again relapse into criminal courses, nevertheless I rejoice to add, as I do from a variety of facts which have come to my own knowledge, that I believe the committee was fully justified in stating that the conduct of a large number of this class has been good. I believe too that the fall of many of those who have relapsed is rightly attributed to the reluctance which employers feel to engage the services of these unhappy persons. That reluctance, however, it may be fairly hoped will be greatly diminished when the master has a reasonable assurance that the reformation of the convict, which has gained for him his ticket-of-leave, is genuine and permanent. But before such a result can be conscientiously predicated of the class, however it may be true as regards individuals, much improvement will be required in our system of training prisoners.

I have spoken, gentlemen, of the necessity for passing the criminal, or rather for enabling him to pass himself, through progressive stages of improvement. The soundness of this principle indeed is recognised, and to a certain limited extent is now in action ; and so far as the Gaol authorities have brought it into use it is highly beneficial. But the stages are not sufficiently numerous, and what is a much greater defect, the convict does not win his way through them by dint of exertion. The right to pass onwards is gained by his remaining in each a given time. Such period it is true may be lengthened by signal misconduct on his part, but that is little to the purpose. Gentlemen, what I desire to see is that the convict should never be able to pass through a stage merely by conformity to rules for a certain number of months, weeks, or days, but that he should be held to proof that he has made a substantial advance towards reformation. Apply the proper test to his conduct, and then let him pass as quickly as he can. Give him plenty of work, and reward him according to the measure of his labour. Let him have the right to lay out some portion of his earnings in bettering his diet ; but give him a strong motive to use this right sparingly, by making his economy tell upon his progress towards freedom. Finally, let his faults, whether of omission or commission, retard his advancement, and when of sufficient magnitude let them thrust him back into a stage already passed. It is easy, gentlemen, to raise theoretic objections to this proposal. All I shall say is, that the obstacles against success, be they few or many, have been grappled with and overcome ; not in one gaol or one country, but in prisons separated by hundreds and thousands of miles from each other, and by governors acting on plans which each had framed for himself without being able to profit by the experience of his fellows. One fact, gentlemen, even if it stood alone, would suffice to show that the theory of the law is with us most imperfectly reduced to practice. It is this. Discharge on ticket-of-leave, as I have said, is given when the convict has endured a certain fraction of his punishment as measured by time, unless in excepted cases of flagrant misconduct, when he is detained for a somewhat longer period. Now it was proved before the committee that the number of such excepted cases is very small, and that the extra detention is very short. But, I put it to your common sense, gentlemen, whether such could be the operation of the measure if the convicts did in truth work themselves out of prison. Is it not self-evident that convicts commencing their imprisonment together, would on that supposition no more depart on the same day from the prison gates than that the horses starting together at a race will all at the same moment reach the winning post ? Here, then, is a need for improvement which demands the anxious attention of all who have the fate of the criminal class under their control. For if it be manifestly unjust to the public to permit criminals whose sentences have not expired to return into society unreformed, I hold it to be no less mischievous to the criminals themselves. Surely, gentlemen, liberty to him who will only use it to plunge himself deeper into guilt, is no blessing but a curse, whether we regard his welfare here or hereafter.

Gentlemen, I attribute the present very imperfect state of our prison discipline to no want of zeal and anxiety for good results in those to whom it is entrusted. I attribute it to their want of confidence in the possibility of thoroughly reforming a convict by any treatment of which he is susceptible while confined in prison. "The reason," said the present Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the House of Commons, "why a ticket-of-leave cannot fairly be regarded as a proof of reclamation is obvious. So long as a man is immured in a prison, where he is denied the opportunity of getting drunk, and of associating with those who might lead him into temptation, he is evidently so circumstanced that it is impossible for him to afford us the means of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to whether his repentance is genuine or affected." Gentlemen, the proposition thus enunciated by the Right Hon. Secretary is as undeniably true as it is clearly and forcibly expressed. Yet I am not prepared to accept the Minister's practical conclusion in favour of discharging unreformed criminals; because with the information derived from the evidence taken by the committee, of the excellent results which have followed a judicious relaxation in the restraints upon convicts during the latter stages of reformatory discipline, I cannot admit it to be a necessary condition of prison life that the will of the convict should be kept in that state of slavish repression which is here assumed. Gentlemen, the question which I am now examining underlies the whole theory of reformatory discipline. Even that amendment, imperfect as it is, which the stimulus afforded by the ticket-of-leave system has effected, is wrought out by a certain small measure of free action conceded to the prisoner. The punishment which is inflicted upon him for gross misconduct in gaol shows that he is held to have had it in his power to choose between right and wrong, and it is merely a careful and well-graduated enforcement of this principle which is required to accomplish all at which we aim. Personal reformation, as the term itself implies, is the acquisition of some faculty of action or endurance not possessed before. But every one of our acquirements is made by the repetition of efforts, the large majority of which are often unsuccessful. To learn to swim we cast ourselves on the water, and are apt scholars indeed if we are not obliged to repeat the process times out of number, before we can overcome our tendency to sink to the bottom. At last, however, we plunge and struggle ourselves into the capacity for keeping our heads above the surface. A story is told of a man who fondly hoped to acquire the art in comfort and safety, by placing himself on his dining table face downwards, and then vigorously striking out his arms and legs. But he discovered in the end that swimming could only be learnt by running the chances of sinking; and, gentlemen, as certain as it is that a swimmer taught on dry land will straightway go to the bottom the moment he ventures into the water, so sure it also is that the prisoner who returns into the world before he is in some sort inured to its dangers and its combats, will yield to the first temptation. He may, it is true, and not unfrequently does, rise again, renew the fight, and in the end is victorious. But how many, alas! become at once hopeless of their own capacity for resistance, and fall to rise no more. Gentlemen, we naturally shrink from exposing a man who has shown his weakness by the fact of his becoming a convict to any temptation while he remains under our protection and control. But this disposition, however laudable, must be overcome. We must reflect that it is not in our power, except by imprisoning him for life, to guard him against the host of temptations, which will throng upon him the moment he sets foot beyond the prison walls. Is it not, then, more than permissible? Is it not our duty to train him to bear the shock of these temptations while we are able at once to subject him to a renewed course of preparation, if upon experiment he is found incapable of encountering his danger in the mitigated form in which it will be presented to him? But, gentlemen, I need not detain you with speculations. By Montesinos, at Valencia, by Obermaier, at Munich, by the governors of many prisons in the United States, and last, not least, by Captain Crofton the Chairman of the Board of Directors of Convict Prisons in Ireland, has this difficulty, formidable as it is justly deemed, been met and surmounted. Gentlemen, it is the deep impression wrought on my mind by reflecting on this difficulty, which has led me to appreciate so highly the value of that additional responsibility under which the prisoner is placed when his discharge may be revoked in the event of his disappointing the expectations which his good conduct had raised of his permanent reclamation. It is the opinion of some, for whose knowledge and ability I entertain the highest respect, that a prisoner once dismissed should be restored, so far as the law can restore him, to the position of those who have never offended. And assuredly if any infallible test could be discovered by which to try the genuineness and the sufficiency of the change wrought in the moral state of the prisoner who has passed through all the stages of prison discipline, to keep any further hold on such an individual would be useless, and therefore could not be justified. But having regard to the hopelessness of discovering such a test, and to the well known fact that the early days of restored liberty are those when his temptations to take the wrong course are most difficult to resist, I cannot but agree most cordially with the committee in believing that the prisoner's discharge ought to be revocable, and I cannot but think that the term of his original sentence forms the shortest period at which he should be wholly relieved from the consequences of his offence.

Let me, gentlemen, now relieve you, who, although you have not offended, have been long detained. But not before I ask you to accept my sincere congratulations on the different aspect which the Reformatory question now presents to that which it assumed twelve months ago. The committee has performed a great service, and has the first title to our thanks. Yet we must not undervalue the support to the principles which they have laid down, afforded by the societies for instituting Reformatory schools, which are springing up all around us. True it is they confine their labours to the young. But the benefits which they confer on juvenile criminals can only be successfully defended when attacked, as attacked they often are, upon grounds which for the most part are common to all Reformatory systems, whether for the young or the old. Nor, gentlemen, ought we to pass by the assistance which we may hope to derive from the association lately founded in Birmingham for the aid of discharged prisoners. It has already, even in its infant state, shown its ability to guide, protect. and succour the objects of its care, at their perilous entrance on their new course of life, when the offices of Christian philanthropy, at all times precious, are more than ever needful. Gentlemen, I know you will join with me in fervent wishes that its members may hold fast to this noble work of charity, and that they may obtain the only reward they seek, by finding its utility commensurate with their labours and their benefactions.

THE GRAND JURY were dismissed about four o'clock yesterday afternoon. The Foreman, Mr. T. P. Salt, addressing the learned Recorder, said that he was desired to make a few observations on the part of the Grand Jury before they left the Court. The first remark was in reference to the very excellent charge which he had delivered to them. The Grand Jury viewed, as he did, the great importance of the subject to which their attention was attracted, and thought it becoming, in taking their discharge at his hands, to place on record their opinion in reference to it. Mr. Salt then read the presentment, which was couched in the following terms:—

"The Grand Jury, before being discharged from their duties, desire to express to the Recorder their sense of the importance of the subject brought under their notice in his charge, and to express a hope that such enlightened views upon the treatment of the criminal classes may receive that consideration from the Legislature which they demand."

TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.—Owen Owens, who was this morning convicted before the Recorder, at the General Quarter Sessions, of picking pockets, upon being called upon to say why judgment should not be passed upon him according to law, said: "I was sentenced in April, 1853, to seven years' transportation. I was first taken to the Borough Gaol at Leicester, where I was detained eleven months. I was then sent to the Defence Hulk, Woolwich, where I was kept for two years and one month. Then I received a ticket-of-leave, and was sent back to Birmingham. I found my father a cripple, and unable to support me, but I felt determined to lead a new life, and seek for employment. This I succeeded in doing, but I had only been at work a day when it became known that I was a ticket-of-leave man, and I was discharged immediately. Afterwards I procured work in two other places, but directly it was discovered I was a ticket-of-leave man I was discharged from my employment. What could I do then? I could not starve; and so I was compelled to steal to get my living. I hope your Honour will take these circumstances into consideration, and have mercy upon me." The Recorder in passing sentence, said: "Owen Owens, you have committed manifold crimes; but as you are what the law considers a great offender, you can be permitted to work yourself out of gaol by good conduct—a privilege the Legislature does not concede to the minor offender. If I was to sentence you to penal servitude you would not be allowed this privilege, therefore in mercy I sentence you to be transported for fourteen years."

THE CHAPLAIN'S REPORT.—The chaplain's annual report was an exceedingly comprehensive document. It commenced by showing by statistics, having reference to the number of committals to the gaols of Birmingham and other towns in the kingdom, that this borough, in a comparative point of view, was in a highly favourable moral condition. It then went on to say that of the 1,701 prisoners entered on the register during the year, 476 either remained in the prison on the 30th September, or were discharged soon after admission, in consequence of payment of fines or from other causes, and before they came under the care of the schoolmasters or schoolmistress. Moreover, some of the prisoners who remain for long terms are employed as cooks or bakers, or in other work about the prison; and are thus kept from attending the school classes. The average daily population of the prison during the year has been 359; the average number attending school classes was 200. Of these 51 attend only twice a week, and 64 three times a week. Out of a daily population, therefore, of 359, as many as 159 have not attended the school classes at all. Of these some are absent from the causes which I have specified, and some on account of the extreme shortness of their sentences.

The prevalence of short imprisonments in this, as in every other local prison, (said the Chaplain,) obstructs so seriously the success of a chaplain's ministrations as well as the progress of education, that it has not failed to occupy my most serious consideration. As I have adverted to this subject, I beg permission to guard myself against being understood to deprecate the prevalent system of summary convictions. Long periods of imprisonment would, no doubt, afford scope for more effective religious teaching. But I cannot lose sight of the amount of human suffering by which such a result would be accompanied. If the term of imprisonment awarded is proportioned, in point of justice, to the offence proved, as a minister of a religion whose chief characteristic is mercy, I could not wish the punishment carried beyond its present limit, in order to give time for more religious instruction. My personal intercourse with the prisoners inclines me to the opinion that short sentences, in some cases, operate with considerable effect, not solely by deterring from pain, but by inducing reflection and remorse. Continued observation confirms me in the opinion that, with some classes of offenders, great advantage would accrue from awarding shorter sentences than at present, provided the discipline were made strict in proportion. I venture to submit that something may be done to meet the case of these short imprisonments, by the prisoners being collected in classes for moral and religious instruction exclusively, at other times besides those at which they receive secular instruction. Last year, three cases of mental disease, out of four which were developed within the prison, occurred in prisoners in association in the infirmary. This year, one case only has occurred; and this man had been insane before. He grew worse when placed in association, and better when separated.

The following interesting letter from our good friend and fellow-laborer in the Reformatory Movement, the Rev. Henry J. Barton, Wicken Rectory, Stony Stratford, will be read with pleasure and advantage by all the members of The National Reformatory Union.—There is no more zealous and active member of the Union than Mr. Barton :—

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE SOCIETY.

To the Editor of the Irish Quarterly Review.

Wicken, November 3rd. 1856.

My dear Sir,

I send a slip from The Northampton Herald, containing a notice of the visit lately paid to our County Reformatory, by Mr. Baker, Sydney Turner, Bengough, &c., who came here for the purpose.*

* The following is the slip referred to :—

[From the Northampton Herald, 18th October, 1856.]

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

[From a Correspondent]

Our county reformatory has been visited this week by some of the most zealous and influential promoters of the reformatory cause, —T. B. L. Baker, Esq., Hardwicke Court; G. H. Bengough, Esq., Kingswood; the Rev. Sydney Turner, Red Hill, the Rev. D. Melville, Woodbury; J. G. Perry, Esq., her Majesty's Inspector of Prisons; the Rev. P. W. Trevelyan; and the Rev. R. N. Russell; and G. H. Bowyer, Esq., school inspector.

On Wednesday, the party visited Lois Weedon to examine the system of farming originated and carried out with such complete success by the Rector. They derived much gratification and instruction from what they saw; and Mr Sydney Turner, whose bailiff came from Red Hill for the purposes of inspecting it, determined at once to adopt the system on his own school farm. It appeared, not only to Mr. Turner, but to the other managers, so peculiarly well suited to the purpose and requirements of reformatory schools, that there can be no doubt of its being generally adopted.

On Thursday, our own reformatory at Tiffeld, was visited by these gentlemen, and examined by her Majesty's inspector; and we have the satisfaction to learn that it met with the entire approbation of those who are so well able, from their knowledge and experience to judge of its efficiency. The buildings were considered to be commodious and well suited to the purposes for which they were intended; and high praise was given to Mr. Dunkley for the reasonable cost and workmanlike manner in which they were executed. The situation was much admired; and the conduct of the boys, considering the short time most of them had been in the school, reflected the highest credit upon Mr. Julius Benn, the superintendent. The following is a copy of the minute entered upon the books, with the inspector's permission :—"Mr. Bowyer stated to the committee that he was particularly pleased with the general tone and manner of the boys, and the intelligence displayed by their answers on religious subjects."

We cannot help observing with some satisfaction, and with every good wish for the success of the institution, that the principle upon which it has been founded, differs materially from that of other

You will see that we are still anxious to put forward the great object which our county has in view, as distinguished hitherto from that of other counties. We feel more and more strongly the importance of impressing upon all who take an interest in the subject that prevention is better than cure. And we cordially agree with the remarks which fell from Mr. Commissioner Hill, at one of the Sectional Meetings, to the effect, that, as Reformatories are now the fashion, we must guard ourselves, as in all other fashions, against extremes,—and take care that in pressing forward the Reformatory cause we do not neglect the great duty of preventing crime, by training up and educating the poor man's honest children in sound moral and religious principles.

But we do not stop here; we believe that the moral regeneration of the masses of the people depends mainly upon the middle class,—and that if the middle class are left to be educated in Schools as void of sound principles as of sound knowledge,—it is in vain to educate or to attempt to reform the poor. The thew and sinew of our country, is in the middle classes, and if you neglect them you cannot—as it has been well expressed by one who is labouring day and night in the cause—you cannot expect to have either sound legislation, peaceable parishes, or the children of the poor successfully instructed. Whilst you leave untrained and uninstructed, this, the most numerous and influential body of the community, the training of the poor must prove to a great extent unsuccessful.

---

counties. The reformatory school forms a part only of the Northamptonshire Society's plan. The whole plan embraces, as some of our readers will remember, not only a reformatory, but training, middle, and what may be termed "industrial feeding schools;" and we hope that the time is not far distant, when the latter may be brought into operation in all the large towns. The subject of industrial feeding schools, we are glad to find, is now beginning to attract public attention. It is well known that the effect of these schools in Scotland, coupled with the operation of Dunlop's Act, have proved that a system of industrial education, adequately carried out, would in a great degree, cut off the sources of the criminal population, and thus prevent crime, to a great extent, for the future. And as the prevention of crime is a far more noble and necessary duty even than the reformation of the criminal, so we think that the Northamptonshire Society, by embracing both objects, is taking a larger and more enlightened view of the question, than those counties which are confining their efforts in the present movement to the subject of reformatories only. If it were not for this and the hope that other counties may be induced to follow the example, we confess that we should look with much misgiving upon the exertions which have been lately made, and the zealous co-operation which the reformatory cause has met with.

Highly as we think of all well-directed reformatory efforts, we trust that the great educational movement contemplated by the Northamptonshire Society will not be lost sight of, and that the zeal and liberality of its friends will be found equal to the accomplishment of their great undertaking.

With us, the children of the National and Parochial Schools remain but a short time; while with their masters in the middle classes, they spend a whole life; they hear their opinions on every subject, watch their habits and learn to think as they think, till at last they make common cause with them in their unfriendly feelings towards the Church, and the more sacred institutions of the State.

The education of the middle classes is after all the great question of the day;—but the public mind is not yet educated to receive it;—it is not yet the fashion. Like the Reformatory question some years ago, when the School at Stratten upon Dunsmore died an unnatural death from want of support, the question of Middle School is not yet taken up in earnest. But the Northamptonshire Society does not despair. The seed they believe is sown, the first step taken, and though it may require time, yet sooner or later the evil will be apparent,—“the sleeping images of things will be rolled to the light,” and some sound hearted Philanthropist will be raised up to remedy the evil of the present neglect. Though the cloud on the horizon may as yet be no bigger than a man’s hand, the Society, I am confident, will still persevere in the hope, that as Reformatory Schools have succeeded, so Middle Schools will succeed, and that it is only a question of time which earnest and untiring efforts will be sure to shorten. They have therefore embraced in their scheme for Reformatory Schools the improvement of Grammar Schools throughout the county and the establishment of additional schools for the middle classes where necessary.*

Industrial feeding schools for the employment of children in towns is another of the Society’s objects, and to this public attention seems now to be directed as a means of prevention, which they hope may lead to carrying out the principle in this respect for which they contend.

With the training school, which is slowly though they believe surely progressing, the Northamptonshire Society intends to combine Industrial—chiefly Agricultural—training so as to introduce it if possible into all the rural schools.

In connection with the views of the Society, I may be allowed to quote Sir John Pakington’s words at the late meeting of the Birmingham Discharged Prisoner’s Aid Society. “He wished the British public to regard that charity which they were now advocating, not as an isolated and separate question, but as one part, perhaps not the most important part, but as one part of a great movement which they saw rising in the country, and which he hoped by God’s blessing might gain strength and grow from day to day, for the elevation and improvement of the working classes. They must not forget while advocating the reformation of offenders, that there was another far greater, far more important and glorious object—the prevention of crime. He asked the men of Birmingham and every assembly of his fellow-country to press upon their fellow citizens and their government, that there should be brought home to every man's door, a sound, wholesome, liberal system of education," and so does the Northamptonshire Society ask, and earnestly hope for the same thing; not perhaps exactly in the same way that Sir John Pakington would propose, but rather in the way which has so effectually promoted the Reformatory cause :—viz. by voluntary agency, liberally supported by Government grants in aid.

---

* It might perhaps have been better instead of middle classes, to have adopted the expression lower middle, or operative classes, as by the former, a prejudice seems to have been created in some minds against the scheme,

Upon this principle, each County or each Diocese might confidently undertake the great business of education with every hope of success. As proposed in Northamptonshire, the Cathedral town would be the place for the training school; the county town or its neighbourhood, for the Reformatory, and in the large towns industrial feeding schools would be established; and grammar schools for the middle or rather for the operative classes, together with Parochial schools for the poor, would be founded. Add to this, constant supervision from Government and diocesan inspectors, and the assistance of general and special committees, consisting of an equal number of clerical and lay members, having the Lord Lieutenant of the county, and the Bishop of the diocese at their head.

I have extended this letter to an almost unpardonable length; but the subject is an important one, and believing that many great movements date their origin from small and unpretending pamphlets and letters, sanctioned by such authority as yours, rather than from long and expensive books, I venture to submit it to your consideration, I wish it might be the means of your taking up the subject; and I should then hope that the Northamptonshire plan of combining the great questions of Education and Reformation in one society under a committee of management consisting of an equal number of clerical and lay members, would be made known to the public, which is all that it requires to recommend it to their consideration, and through them to induce the Government to extend the same amount of assistance to a voluntary agency, in the matter of education generally, as they have already done in the case of Reformatory Schools.

Believe me, to be dear Sir,

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY J. BARTON.

The schools to which our esteemed friend refers are precisely such schools as the Christian Brothers conduct in Ireland. The religious element is mingled with the secular, but never so much as to become obtrusive. These are essentially Roman Catholic schools, just as our friend would have his Protestant schools: each religion educating its own children in its own creed, and surely Mr. Barton may not alone claim, but may command, our best efforts in support of this principle. Let the Voluntary System come to the aid of the foundation, the Voluntary aid and the Governmental aid come to the support of the school when founded; this is the system which shall have our best, most whole-hearted, and entire support, for it at once gives fair play to all, and solves the Religious Difficulty Question. We write this for Protestants; for Catholics, for Unitarians, for each and for all, and may God help us all: but surely it is not right that we should stay the progress of Education because all creeds will not accept the religious teaching, or phases of faith, of one creed, even though it be the creed by law established. We say, give to all freedom and support, that is extend, in education to all, the principle of toleration advocated and supported by the National Reformatory Union.

With regard to the Industrial branch, as developed in Northamptonshire, we are happy to find that our friends there are working the Industrial Feeding School point. Mr. Alfred Hill's paper on this subject, and showing the success of the system in Scotland under Dunlop's Act, has just appeared, and in our mind it is the best contribution to the literature of our question which has appeared for some months. We thought we had gutted, or, to use a slang phrase, "taken the shine" out of Mr. Alexander Thomson's Prevention Better than Cure; he was one of our earliest friends in opening up this RECORD, and we owe him many hours of pleasant correspondence and useful communication; but Mr. Hill has shown us points, and phases, and facts, and figures connected with the question which had escaped us, or which have been thrown out into strong relief by his energy, devotion, and ability.

This book should be returned to the Library on or before the last date stamped below.

A fine of five cents a day is incurred by retaining it beyond the specified time.

Please return promptly.

~~APR 22 1930~~

~~APR 23 1930~~

STALIN ODY

CHARGE

CANCELLED

